It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Chronology of Hansard's Debates.

The PARLIAMENTARY HISTORY contains all that can be collected of the Legislative History of this country from the Conquest to the close of the XVIIIth Century (1803), 36 vols. The chief sources whence these Debates are derived are the Constitutional History, 24 vols.; Sir Simonds D'Ewes' Journal: Debates of the Commons in 1620 and 1621; Chandler and Timberland's Debates, 22 vols.; Grey's Debates of the Commons, from 1667 to 1694, 10 vols.; Almon's Debates, 24 vols.; Debrett's Debates, 63 vols.; The Hardwicke Papers; Debates in Parliament by Dr. Johnson, &c., &c.

The PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES commence with the year 1803, and the contents are set forth in the following Chronological Table:—

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

LONDON STREETS (REMOVAL OF GATES) BILL

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY : My Lords, I rise to ask your Lordships to suspend the Standing Orders in order to give a Second Reading to the London Streets (Removal of Gates) Bill, and that is so simple a proposition that I should not think it necessary to trouble your Lordships with any remarks on the subject had it not been that I see a notice standing in the formidable name of my noble and learned Friend Lord Bramwell for the refusal of the Second Reading. I do not think it is usual to make long speeches about private Bills, and it is the less necessary in this case, because I of the nature of the obstruction which this Bill seeks to remove. In fact, I should have thought there could have been no opposition to a simple proposal of this kind. The wonder to me is that those obstructions should have been allowed to remain so long, and that in the middle, or towards the latter end, of the 19th century there should be a single district of London which is shut up for the night from 11 o'clock to 7 the next morning, and through which the passage of heavy traffic or vehicular traffic from different parts of the greatest city in the world is strictly forbidden by the existence of these bars. Well, as I have said, I should have thought there could have been no opposition ; but there has been a Petition filed in opposition to this measure, and I do not doubt that it is that Petition which my noble and learned Friend is prepared to support. But I do not see any opposition from the one quarter from which especially it might have been expected to come with some show of right, and that is from the noble Duke himself (the Duke of Bedford), whom I do not see in his place. The intervention in this matter is entirely on the part of persons who think their comfort will be affected by the removal of these bars, and, therefore, beg your Lordships to forbid the passing of this Bill. In the first place, I would venture to remark that these bars were not made for the protection of the repose or the protection of the comfort of the inhabitants of this district in the slightest degree. That is a proposition to which I have no difficulty whatever in asking the assent of my noble and learned Friend. I hold in my hand the copy of the Act under which these bars were set up, and it is set out very clearly and plainly what their object was. It was in no degree, as I have said, to protect the comfort of the inhabitants, but it was to protect the roads which had been made by the Paving Trust of that district from being invaded or utilised by the inhabitants of the neighbouring estates. That is set forth clearly enough in this Bill to which I refer. It hands over to the Paving Commissioners, as Trustees, the roads that had been made on this estate. It hands over to them the freehold, and appoints those Commissioners for five years, and then to be renewed at the end of five years. The clause that I think will throw most light on the object with which those bars were set up is the 63rd—

"And be it further enacted that nothing herein contained shall extend, or be construed, declared, or taken to extend, to prevent or preclude the said Duke of Bedford, his heirs and assigns, or the owner or owners for the time being of the said pieces or plots of ground from erecting or placing any posts, rails, or other obstructions at the end of any streets, squares, or places intended to be made in pursuance of this Act, which shall lead into the estates now or late the property of the Worshipful Company of Skinners, or of Hans Winthorpe Mortimer, Esq., so as to prevent any horses or carriages passing or re-passing through the said streets, squares, or places, into or upon the said estates now or lately in the hands of the Worshipful Company of Skinners, or of Hans Winthorpe Mortimer, Esq.," and so on. It is perfectly clear, therefore, that the object of those gates was what I have stated, and that the roads made on the adjoining estates being now quite as good as those on this estate, the reason for the existence of the gates has disappeared, and they are now simply a medieval anomaly in the middle of London at the end of the present 19th century. And here I would venture to remark that these Paving Commissioners to whom these roads were made over in freehold have disappeared, and that the Vestry have succeeded to their powers. The Vestry is the representative of those Commissioners. Have the Vestry petitioned against the removal of these gates? Not in the slightest degree. On the contrary, the Vestry petition for their removal. I only notice that in passing; but my point, which I was going to bring before your Lordships, is that if under these Paving Trusts it was intended that the gates and bars elsewhere should be kept up as they are now kept up in these four places, London would have been so hampered and harassed that its development would have been absolutely impossible. In 1865 there were 316 of these Trusts, and I ask your Lordships to consider what the condition of London would have been if the other 315 Trusts with powers of barring up the streets of London had been exercised as they have been in these four places. Then I would ask the further question, when has it ever been customary in London to give compensation for the introduction of new lines of traffic? I speak with great humility and deference in the presence of my noble and learned Friend, but I do not suppose that even he can produce one instance in which such compensation has been given. Your Lordships will remember an instance, which must be very familiar to you, where private property did sustain very signal damage by the admission of traffic for the purposes of public utility—I allude to Hamilton Place. That was one of the most agreeable residences, no doubt, in London. It was a cul de sac. The houses there were almost like country villas, with the park on one side, though they had the public street on the other. But suddenly public opinion demanded that Hamilton Place should be thrown open. Park Lane was opened, and Hamilton Place was roughly invaded by traffic. But I venture to say that not one farthing of compensation was paid for that damage to property. Again, at this moment, there has been a considerable introduction of heavy traffic into streets which hitherto have been free from it.

For example, of the west side of Grosvenor Square and South Audley Street, and that district which has hitherto been kept apart from public traffic, there is a perpetual and increasing stream of omnibuses and heavy traffic passing to and fro at all hours of the day; but I have yet to learn that the inhabitants of that district have come before your Lordships with an appeal on the ground that their repose has been in any degree interfered with. The honest and plain truth is, that putting all legal technicalities aside, my noble and learned Friend admits he cannot produce a case in which compensation has ever been paid for the introduction of traffic, and that if you live in the centre of the greatest city in the world you must take the drawbacks of that position as well as its conveniences. I do not believe if you brought a traveller to London and took him into this district and explained to him that, under the provisions of a private Act of Parliament passed in the year 1799, it was the prerogative of this district to be locked up in monastic seclusion from 11 o'clock at night to 7 o'clock in the morning, and to prevent the passing of traffic through that quarter, he would place the slightest credence in your assertion until he had learned the fact from experience. I believe that if there is any compensation to be paid, if compensation is due in any quarter, it is rather due from the inhabitants of these districts for the privilege they have so long enjoyed at the expense of the public than it is due from the public to the inhabitants of these districts. Then I would ask this: Is there anything in their covenants which gives them a right to expect any such redress? Have they, under the covenants of their houses, any claim for the preservation of these bars? I challenge my noble and learned Friend to produce such covenants. As a matter of fact, there is no such agreement, and they took their leases with the Act open before them under which these bars were fenced, and from which I venture to make a few quotations to your Lordships. Let me refer to another clause to prove what I say. It provides—

"That nothing shall prevent or hinder the said Francis, Duke of Bedford, his heirs or assigns, or the owner or owners of the said plots of ground for the time being, from removing the said fences, gates, posts, rails, or any of them at his or their free will or pleasure."

So far, therefore, from having a vested interest in these gates, the inhabitants of this district took their leases with the Act of Parliament open before them giving the ground landlord, at any time, at his own free disposition and arbitration, power to remove these gates, rails, and posts. I venture to think, under those circumstances, your Lordships will not refuse, at any rate, a Second Reading to this Bill, and that, in view of the large interests with regard to public convenience that are involved, in view of the fact that a Committee of the House of Commons patiently and laboriously investigated this matter and have passed the Bill unanimously, nothing could be more ill-judged than that your Lordships should at this day refuse a Second Reading of the Bill.

Moved, "That the Order made on the 10th day of March last, 'That no Private Bill brought from the House of Commons shall be read a second time after Friday the 20th day of June next,' be dispensed with, and that the Bill be now read 2^d."—(The Lord Rosebery, E. Rosebery.)

LORD BRAMWELL: My Lords, on behalf of the people who live within the district which is affected by this proposal, I ask your Lordships to reject the Bill. I have no authority to speak for the Duke of Bedford, but I know he has expressed himself as sorry for the position of these persons, of whom upwards of 200 have petitioned against this Bill. I suppose your Lordships know where this district is now, though some 50 or 60 years ago it was considered a good joke by Theodore Hook and some of his school to represent Bloomsbury as a terra incognita which people then knew nothing about. Less than 100 years ago this district was all fields; there were no houses upon it. But by the 39 & 40 George III., to which the noble Earl has referred, a scheme was recognised and means were given for carrying it into execution of erecting houses and making it a residential district, if I may use the expression. Your Lordships may possibly know that this was carried into execution, and that houses of a very good character, though not palatial—not as good as your Lordships find in Mayfair or Belgravia—but houses of a very good description, indeed, have been erected there, and are occupied by most respectable tenants. I am surprised to hear the noble Earl say that these barriers were not put up for the benefit of the district and of those who live there. They most manifestly were, and I will ask your Lordships' permission to refer to the Act in order to show it—

"That nothing shall prevent the said Francis, Duke of Bedford, his heirs and assigns, or the owner or owners for the time being of the said pieces or plots of ground from erecting posts, rails, and other restraints in order to prevent traffic passing over and through the said streets, squares, and places."

The noble Earl says the people in the district are at the mercy of the Duke, who could remove these bars if he thought fit. I think it is very likely he can. I am not instructed that there is anything in their leases which gives them the right to insist on the maintenance of these bars; but they are satisfied that the noble Duke and those who succeed him will, unless your Lordships prevent it, continue these bars for the purpose of adding to the comfort and convenience of those who inhabit the district. Instead of building on the ground where those barriers exist, the bars and gates have been erected and the space has been sacrificed upon which houses might have been built. So far as that has been done, they feel satisfied that these bars will be continued, as the property will thus remain more valuable both to the occupier and to the freeholder. So much for the region of these barriers. Seventy years ago, in the 57th year of the reign of George III., another Act of Parliament was passed which was intended for the better paving, improving, and regulating the streets of the Metropolis, and in that Act there was this clause—

"Nothing in this Act contained shall extend, or be construed to extend, to authorise the taking down or removing of any bars, gates, rails, or other fences fixed for preventing any thoroughfare into, or from, any square, street, place, or way, without the consent of the owner of the estate or property upon which such bars, gates, rails, and other restraints shall be situate."

It is true that by the original Act of Parliament Commissioners were appointed for the special purposes of rating the occupiers of these premises, and of paving and performing certain duties that were afterwards taken from them and transferred to the Vestry. It was an inconvenience, I dare say, as the noble Earl has said; but by the Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855, it was provided (I will not trouble your Lordships with the particular language of the Act) that those Commissioners should cease to exist, and that the Vestry should take upon themselves the duties which the Commissioners had formerly performed, and that the rating should be a rating by the Vestry instead of by the Commissioners. In that Act, which was not a private, but a public, Act of Parliament, there was this provision—

"Nothing in this Act shall extend or be construed to extend to authorise the taking down or removing any bar gate rail or other fence fixed for preventing any thoroughfare into any street square or way without the consent of the proprietor of the estate or property upon which such bar gate rail or fence or square street or place shall be situate."

So that the freeholder had the rights continued which he had by virtue of the private Act to which I have called your Lordships' attention, and which the noble Earl has referred to. They are continued to him by this public Act of Parliament. I suppose at that time it was hardly thought that the rights of owners could be taken away in the unceremonious way in which it is proposed by this Bill that they shall be. This, then, is the condition of things. Those are the rights which are given to these people by the law of the land—not merely by their having the property in the land, which they could apply for another purpose if they thought fit, because of course they could build upon it, but those are rights given to them, which they say, and which it cannot be denied, are useful to them for the purpose of preserving the privacy and quiet of their dwellings, and of preventing those inconveniences which will result from their being created an open thoroughfare. I agree that the public has a right to expropriate any property for public purposes. I entirely agree to that; every man who holds real property in this country holds it subject to the right on the part of the public to take it away from him. But upon what terms? Why, upon the terms of paying him for it, and upon no other terms. Your Lordships must know that the most careful provisions are found in all Acts of Parliament authorising the taking of land for railways, canals, or other public purposes. The most careful and scrupulous provisions are put in those Acts for the purpose of compensating every man whose land is so taken. That is not denied here, and why? The noble Earl says he is astonished that the inhabitants of this district should like the present condition of things. Well, I should be very much astonished if they did anything else, and I will take the noble Earl's own illustration. He says the west side of Grosvenor Square is now used as a thoroughfare for a line of omnibuses, and that the people there very much dislike it. I have no doubt they do. But he says they are entitled to no compensation. Why? Because they had no right to stop the omnibuses. They had no powers by which they could lawfully have prevented any portion of the public traffic which should take that direction. Your Lordships cannot doubt—I think it is impossible to doubt, and I wish your Lordships knew—probably you do not—what may be called the quiet and privacy of this neighbourhood; but it is to be invaded by traffic, and I suppose cattle are to go through it and lines of omnibuses, heavy trucks, and all traffic at all times of the day and night. I ought here to mention that the only traffic which is at all excluded is that of a heavy character, such as that I have mentioned to your Lordships, and also that it is only from 11 o'clock at night to 7 o'clock in the morning that the gates are closed to the light traffic of cabs and carriages. There cannot be a doubt that it will be a loss to these people. They say the result of it will be that, instead of the district being a residential one, it will become to a certain extent altered; that it will be lowered in its character, and they put forward this which I think is a matter eminently entitled to your Lordships consideration—they say they have leases, and that by their leases they are prohibited from turning the houses into shops or places of business. They must keep the houses as private residences, and they say the tendency of this Bill, if your Lordships pass it, will be to leave them saddled with their leases, under which they will be unable to continue to use their houses for the same purposes as those for which they at present use them, and which they can put to no other use.

Now, I want to ask this question: Supposing that those who laid out this estate, instead of paving the space on which the bars were put, had put houses there? Do your Lordships know why they did not do so? They did not put houses on these spaces that are occupied by the bars, but they put bars there instead, because they knew that the property would thereby be made more valuable than it would be if these spaces had been covered with houses. But would anybody have thought for a moment if that had been the case, if houses had been built there, that the houses ought to be pulled down now without compensation? Nobody would have ventured to suggest such a thing without compensation being made to those who had suffered from it; but because it is a bar it is to come down, although that bar is something which makes the property more valuable. It is to be taken down—and why? On account of the convenience to the public. But if the convenience to the public is worth causing loss which it will occasion to the tenants, the public ought to pay for it. If it is not worth that loss, then that loss ought not to be inflicted upon the people. It is a dilemma of a most undeniable character, as it seems to me. But, no; because the bars are there as a sort of invitation, if one may so say, to suggest to people that they should be pulled down, this proposition is quietly brought forward. When, as I have said, if houses had been placed there instead, nobody would have thought of it. It puts me in mind of a case that came before a very sagacious Judge, where the plaintiff complained that the defendant had got a brickfield very near to him. When the defendant was called upon for his defence, he said, "It is so convenient; that it was a convenient place where they were burning bricks." "Convenient to whom?" said the learned Judge, Mr. Justice Wightman, "not to the plaintiff?" "No," was the answer, "convenient to me," and the plaintiff got a verdict. And I trust your Lordships will here give the verdict to those who are in this situation. It is convenient to the public that these bars should be pulled down, not to those who will suffer, as I have no doubt they will from that being done. Let there be no mistake about it at all. The proposition is not that these bars should be taken down and compensation made to those who suffer, nor is there any suggestion that they will not suffer; but the Bill is that, whether they suffer or not, down must come the bars, and no compensation paid. That is the case that is laid before your Lordships. I want to know what is to be the result of it? Here is property being taken merely because it will be a convenience to the public without any compensation being made to those who are injured by it. What is the precedent for it? Are all the other bars in London to be taken down in the same way? Some of your Lordships know the convenience and comfort that such bars afford to those who live in the districts where they are. But if the reason put forward is a good one; if the requirements of civilisation in the greatest capital of Europe, as the noble Earl stated, necessitates this being done, it is a reason that would be equally applicable to every bar in the Metropolis, and it is a reason which, as far as I can see, should not stop at bars, but be extended to houses or to any other property standing in the way where it is proposed to open a thoroughfare. My Lords, I ask your Lordships to read this Bill a second time this day six months.

Amendment moved, to leave out ("now") and add at the end of the Motion ("this day three months.")—(The Lord Bramwell.)

LORD HERSCHELL: My Lords, I trust that notwithstanding the alarmist speech which has just been delivered by my noble and learned Friend you will give this Bill a Second Reading. In asking your Lordships to reject the Bill, my noble and learned Friend can only support that proposal if he can establish the proposition that in favour of those whose interests he has represented the interests of the public at large are to be absolutely disregarded. Of course, the reading of this Bill a second time does not preclude any of these petitioners from making out such a case as they can before a Select Committee for such compensation as the law may warrant or your Lordships' House may deem them entitled to. But my noble and learned Friend is not satisfied with that; he asks your Lordships to say that, because these bars have existed, and because their existence produces a certain amount of comfort to 200 people—

*LORD BRAMWELL: No, 2,000.

LORD HERSCHELL: I took the number which my noble and learned Friend himself stated. Because that is so, the interests of thousands in this Metropolis are to be thoroughly disregarded. The truth is, these bars are an anachronism, barring as they do the passage across this great Metropolis from one district to another, and from more than one important railway station, at inconvenient times in the day, making them inaccessible except by going round a very considerable distance. I should have thought that the right of the public to have their interests considered in this matter, and to have these bars removed, whatever claims any person might have to consideration, was absolutely clear. At the time their erection was sanctioned, the state of things which existed was something totally different from that which exists to-day. Since that time railways and railway stations have come into existence, and the vast amount of traffic has arisen in different parts of the Metropolis, owing to the extension of London, which finds its outlet and inlet by these railway stations. And when you look at the object with which those bars were erected, you will find that object was not one which had in contemplation this purpose for which it is now desired they should be maintained against the public. In those days the cost of paving and repairing the streets, the ownership of the streets being in the freeholder, was cast upon those living within the particular district, which was, practically speaking, really the estate where the streets were made and the bars erected; and the object of the bars was to prevent the owners of adjoining estates using the streets that had been made at the expense of those residing within the limited area for their purposes. That was the original object. But what has happened since then? It is obvious that, whilst the burden of paving and repairing streets is not cast upon the inhabitants generally, the Act of Parliament says that they shall not use those streets, but that these people shall have an exclusive right and control over them, and use of them, which no other part of the Metropolis possesses. If they want compensation—if my noble and learned Friend talks of what is just and fair—I say that during all those years they ought to have paid higher rates than the rest of the people in the Metropolis who have not enjoyed those advantages. It seems to me they have really during all those years been enjoying a very good quid pro quo for what is now asked of them. But the cost of repairing those streets is no longer cast upon the inhabitants of the district; the whole parish pays for it. They pay every penny of the cost of the repairs.

Lord Bramwell

LORD BRAMWELL: The people in these houses are rated for it.

LORD HERSCHELL: Yes, but they are only rated as everybody else is rated; and whilst they have, at all times of the day and night, the use of the streets for which the general public are rated, they ask that the public shall be restrained from using those streets which are within the area absolutely during the night.

LORD BRAMWELL: There has been less traffic over those streets, and, therefore, they have required less paving.

LORD HERSCHELL: They have required less paving to some extent, but, at the same time, nothing like the extent that would justify or give these people the right to say that these streets should not be made available to the inhabitants of the other parts of the parish. These streets are now vested in the Public Authorities for the use of the public, just as other streets are; and whatever rights the inhabitants may have to compensation—and I will say nothing about that at present, as that is a question for Committee, and not for your Lordships' House, upon the Second Reading of the Bill—I say that gives them no right to say that these streets shall not be made available for public use in the public interest, and to the full extent to which the public interest requires. I entirely concur that the Committee will have to consider that which the House of Commons Committee had to consider—that is to say, the question whether a right to compensation has been established by anybody. My noble Friend speaks of this as a most alarming proposition, as one which is destructive of the rights of property, and I know not what. But it is, I think, a very sad fact that such a lamentable measure has been passed, not by a Radical House of Commons at all, but passed unanimously by a Committee which had for its Chairman a respectable Conservative County Member. It is surely a shocking thing to think that we have come to such a pass that such a measure should have been sanctioned by a Committee presided over by a Conservative Chairman! But in addition to that, it has been passed by the other House, the majority of which can hardly be regarded, I think, at the present time as representative of Radical opinions. Therefore, it comes to your Lordships from a Body, and with an impress which ought to mitigate the alarm which otherwise my noble and learned Friend's speech might have been calculated to produce. The sole question is now: Ought your Lordships to read this Bill a second time? That must surely be decided quite apart from the question of compensation which will arise hereafter. It is a question simply whether there is a right in the interests of the public to remove a great obstruction to the public traffic, even though doing so should, to a limited extent, interfere with the comfort and convenience of the residents in the district. That is a proposition which I scarcely thought my noble and learned Friend would have disputed as regards compensation. I certainly do not mean either to trouble your Lordships with or to suggest to the London County Council an argument against the right of compensation to counterbalance the arguments which my noble and learned Friend has adduced in favour of the right of compensation. Those arguments will, no doubt, be put fully before the Committee of your Lordships' House by learned counsel representing both sides, and I think there would be no advantage in anticipating the able speeches which no doubt the learned advocates will be well prepared to deliver, and adequately and highly remunerated for, by addressing their arguments to those who are learned in the law in your Lordships' House. I think those arguments may be left for the consideration of the Committee. My noble and learned Friend has spoken of the petitioners in this neighbourhood. He did not very clearly define their position, but, as I understand, the petitioners are not confined to those who are residing in these particular streets which are protected by the bars, but some of the petitioners are persons residing in adjoining streets at some little distance who say that if you take down these bars, though they do not dwell in any street where the bars are, more traffic will pass into their streets from the protected streets. It is very difficult to draw the line and to say how far such claims shall extend, if they should be admitted at all. It is true they say:—"We do not live in these streets, but we relied incidentally upon the protection which we received from these bars, and the people who live in the streets themselves have no more legal right than we had, because they had no bargain with their freeholder that those bars should be kept up; and if you take down those bars, our houses will be rendered less convenient and comfortable, and, therefore, we also claim compensation." That danger, therefore, must be kept well in view in considering this question of compensation—that is to say, the extent to which it may go. My noble and learned Friend answered the case which was put by my noble and learned Friend Lord Rosebery, with regard to traffic coming where traffic had not come before, by saying that that did not arise from any change arising from the removal of the bars. But there have been numbers of cases where, owing to street improvements, streets which were formerly quiet streets, apart from everything but local traffic, have been made part of the public thoroughfare, along which the traffic has become very considerable. It seems to me that, if my noble and learned Friend is right, the principle for which he contends might be just as much relied on in the case I have put, although no such claim for compensation has ever yet been entertained or heard of, as far as I know. There have been many cases, as my noble and learned Friend knows perfectly well, where street improvements, authorised by Act of Parliament, have turned streets and portions of streets, which hitherto have been free from traffic, into thoroughfares for the public traffic. If you once acknowledge that compensation must be paid it would be difficult to argue that there would not be just as much right in those cases as in the present. I have not desired to prevent any argument upon the question, which will have to be discussed no doubt, as to whether any of the persons are entitled to compensation. If this Bill goes before a Committee of your Lordships' House. All I wish to do is to point out that the case is not so very simple as my noble and learned Friend seemed to suggest, and that such claims, even if any of them be legitimate, cannot be accepted wholesale; but there will need to be the greatest possible discrimination shown with regard to them, unless you wish hereafter to establish a doctrine which will hamper all Metropolitan improvements by making the ratepayers pay an enormous amount of compensation in satisfaction of claims which have never yet been heard of.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): My Lords, I should advise the noble and learned Lord opposite to accept the species of compromise which has been offered by the noble and learned Lord who has just sat down. He entirely admits that the question of compensation remains open, and if the question of compensation is not settled to the satisfaction of my noble and learned Friend, or of those who oppose this Bill, it would be entirely in the power of your Lordships' House to deal with that matter when the Bill comes back from Committee. The result of your Lordships' accepting the proposition which has been recommended by the noble and learned Lord (Lord Bramwell) would be that under no possible circumstances has the public any right to relief. I confess that is rather a difficult theory to substantiate—that under no possible circumstances has the public a right to be relieved from these obstructions to traffic. I feel that all the more keenly because I am a constant passenger by the Great Northern Railway, and I must say that I have never passed the sacred gates in going to the Great Northern Station without mental imprecations against the persons who originally set them up and the persons who have since maintained them there. The question whether they have a right to compensation is not now before your Lordships. The question whether compensation ought to be given is a question for the Committee, and it is one which must be examined into in detail. I thought the noble and learned Lord who has just sat down hardly kept his promise when he said he was not going to argue on the subject of compensation, and then proceeded to deliver a very subtle argument against it. He, however, drew our attention to the fact that it was the case of a legal opinion being given without pecuniary reward, and I trust he will forgive me for saying that in this case particularly a legal opinion is worth precisely what is given for it. But I would venture to submit to the noble and learned Lord who has just sat down that the whole question is with what view and under what understanding did the people who have acquired interests in these houses acquire them? Have they given more money, or consented to pay more rent, distinctly for the sake of this protection which they knew had come into existence in a legal manner and which they had every reason to believe would be perpetual? I do not see how you can avoid their claim to compensation. But I quite agree that any accommodation which people derive from the fact that traffic does not go through their streets is a right which is held upon a precarious tenure, and people in those circumstances have no right to complain of a change of condition in the Metropolis which may lead the traffic by their doors which they had previously been fortunate enough to escape from. Those are matters which would be better discussed in the whole House; and as the noble and learned Lord who has just sat down stated, examination must be made into each individual case, and each case will have to be dealt with upon its merits. There are questions here of common right depending upon the understanding upon which each man has entered into the bargain he has made, and I should be sorry if your Lordships were to prevent that examination from taking place by refusing to read the Bill a second time, and thus not allowing it to go before a Committee.

EARL GRANVILLE: I propose to add a few words in support of the appeal which the noble Marquess and my noble and learned Friend have made. I certainly will not say one word with regard to the merits of the question. I am quite satisfied with the way Lord Rosebery and Lord Herschell have put that, but I really think it is very important as a matter of procedure in this House. The noble and learned Lord admits that if there be a public advantage it is quite right to legislate in a sense to serve that public advantage, but with the reservation that some compensation should be paid to those who suffer. But the result of his Motion to-day would be, while postponing the question of compensation, to put an end to this obstruction, for the public advantage, which has been so strongly advocated by my noble Friends. I do not think anybody in this House can deny that those gates and bars are a very great inconvenience indeed to a large body of the public; but I am most anxious to point out that it is the constant practice of this House to refer questions of this sort to Committee, and to reserve to ourselves, if necessary, after the question has been dealt with in Committee, the power of dealing with it, without our being now called upon to pledge ourselves one way or the other. This question of traffic is one of pressing importance in London. It happened that a day or two ago a similar scheme was brought forward, and I do not say whether the Committee were right or not in rejecting it, but it was rejected; and now here is another proposition for relieving the traffic in London, and I should really feel sorry if we bound ourselves to be obliged to reject it in a summary way before the Committee has dealt with it. The noble and learned Lord (Lord Bramwell) quoted the Duke of Bedford, though he said he was not authorised to speak for him. I have, certainly, no authority to speak for the Duke of Bedford, and I do not know which way his desires would go; but if I were speaking as a landowner of London, I must say I should be very glad to be relieved from such a very invidious position as he occupies with regard to the convenience of the public. However, that is for the Duke of Bedford to judge of. He may appear before the Committee to support or to oppose the scheme, or he may abstain altogether; but I think the best conclusion for your Lordships to arrive at is, in conformity with your constant practice, to allow this Bill to be read a second time, not pledging yourselves for the future after it has been dealt with in the way to which my noble and learned Friend has referred.

EARL FORTESCUE: I would venture to support the appeal which has been made by the Prime Minister to my noble and learned Friend. It is quite true, as he has said, that everyone holds his property under the tenure of its being liable to be taken for the Public Service; but on payment of compensation; the whole question turns on the payment of compensation. No one can say it is of greater importance to the public that a thoroughfare should be opened to the North-Western and Great Northern Stations than that a battery should be erected for defending our Dockyards from attack; but I have never heard it suggested that the Government is to seize the land on which a battery is to stand on account of its great public importance, and of its being indispensable to the defence of the country without paying compensation. I must venture to claim for myself a little prescience with regard to the line which the London County Council have not hesitated to take. I ventured to say, in the Debate on the Local Government Bill, that I thought they would try to divert public attention from an expensive and not very efficient management of Metropolitan concerns by introducing Bills to conciliate popular favour at other peoples' expense. They quite lately brought in a Bill which was rejected by a Committee of the House of Commons, to introduce a new principle of betterment. They want to conciliate popular favour by improving the Metropolis, and they shrink from honestly paying, or inviting the rate-payers to pay, what is justly due to the parties affected. I felt convinced that before very long that line would be taken by that popularly-elected body, but I did not expect that my predictions would be verified within one year. This Bill, however, was introduced without any hint of compensation for any damage done, and without any suggestion that such a question could arise; and then the noble Earl, the late Chairman of the London County Council, gives us as an example of similar injustice done, and of reasonable facilities of communication being afforded to the public at the expense of the comfort of private individuals, the opening of Hamilton Place. But Hamilton Place was sealed at the end by Crown property. There was no question of any Act of Parliament sanctioning that impediment. I myself was the person who carried, through the Metropolitan Communications Committee of the House of Commons, some 40 years ago, I think, the recommendation that Hamilton Place should be opened to the public. A quarter of a century after that recommendation Hamilton Place was opened; and a very great convenience it has been, though an inconvenience to the persons whose houses are there. But there was no ground for compensation being paid to them, seeing that there were no bars existing there, but simply part of the Crown property, which was liable at any moment to be taken for public improvements. A more infelicitous illustration of the justice of the present claim I can hardly conceive. A real hardship arises to the parties who are resident within these bars in the fact that their existence has been confirmed and sanctioned distinctly by the Metropolitan Local Management Act. What the noble Earl proposes is practically to repeal a clause in the Metropolitan Local Management Act which was inserted simply as an act of justice, as a great deal of traffic was already at that time going in that direction between other parts of the Metropolis and these railway stations. It was inserted in consequence of the conviction of Parliament of the justice of the claim of the parties interested in its insertion.

LORD BRAMWELL: My Lords, I suppose I need scarcely say that after what has been said by the noble Marquess and the noble Earl on this side, I will, with your Lordships' leave, withdraw my Amendment. But permit me just to say that really I have attained my object. I am pretty sure that if compensation is to be paid, your Lordships will not be troubled with this Bill again. I did want to save your Lordships the trouble of discussing it in Select Committee and to save the parties that expense; but as it will now be an open question for the Committee, I feel pretty sure how it will be dealt with, and whether compensation will be paid. As that is the case I have no objection. The Lord Chancellor the other day quoted an opinion of an "old Parliamentary hand" that all the Second Reading of a Bill meant was that something was required to be done in the matter. Well, now, I am a young Parliamentary hand, but I should have thought there was another thing involved in it, which is this: That not only is there something which requires to be done, but that the something in the Bill was the right remedy. I do not see any indication in the Bill that people shall be paid for the loss they will sustain. However, as that is now possible, I will ask your Lordships' leave to withdraw my Amendment.

Amendment (by leave of the House) withdrawn; Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly; and committed: The Committee to be proposed by the Committee of Selection.

COMPANIES (WINDING-UP) BILL.
(No. 182.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE SECRETARY TO THE BOARD OF TRADE (Lord BALFOUR of BURLEIGH): My Lords, the Bill to which I ask your Lordships now to give a Second Reading, is one of very considerable importance, and, at the same time, of considerable complexity, and abounding in details of a highly technical and legal nature. As I do not anticipate that there will be any objection to giving the Bill a Second Reading in this House, I shall only detain your Lordships for a few moments in explaining in general terms what are the objects for which it is brought forward. The leading Act which settled the law and practice as regards Limited Liability Companies was, as your Lordships know, passed in the year 1862. It has been amended upon several subsequent occasions, notably in the years 1867, 1879, and 1880. But nearly all those amendments had much more relation to that part of the original Act which deals with the creation of companies and their formation than to the other parts, which are scarcely less important, dealing with the method by which those companies which have been formed are wound up and cease to exist. The object of this Bill is to amend the provisions of the Act of 1862, mainly as regards those parts which have to deal with the winding up of Limited Liability Companies. At the outset, I should like to mention one ground of objection which has been brought to this Bill as it at present stands. Objections have been taken to it that it does not attempt to codify and consolidate the existing law. I believe that the existing law as regards companies stands in considerable need of consolidation and codification; but I think it would be unwise to attempt at the same time so large a measure as codification and consolidation and this necessary amendment of the law. What is intended by this Bill is to amend the law as regards those parts of the Act which are thought to require amendment, leaving to be dealt with hereafter the question of consolidation and codification of the law as it will then stand. I wish simply to say that, because this is only an amended Bill, and it must not be thought there is any attempt at consolidation of the law as regards Limited Liability Companies. As regards these companies, I think it may be safely said that on all hands it is considered the existing law is inefficient, unsatisfactory, and requires amendment. At any rate, I am able to say that the commercial community have been loud in their demands for some amendment of the law. But I find that the complaints are rather as regards the delay which accompanies the present practice than as regards any inefficiency in the law in the proper and stricter sense of the term. The present method of winding up companies is exclusively under the control of the Court of Chancery. The Judges in the Court of Chancery are all hard-worked men. They all have full engagements, and whenever any matter regarding the winding up of companies has to be brought before them, they have to make an appointment in regard to it very often a fortnight or three weeks ahead. If for any reason that appointment is not sufficient, if everything is not done that may have been expected or required at that time, owing to some unforeseen difficulty, no other appointment can be got sometimes for another fortnight or three weeks, thus occasioning great delay. These constant delays, while irksome in themselves, lead to other difficulties, because they lead to a great increase of expense; and it is in the hope of avoiding not only the unnecessary delay, but the unnecessary expense, that this Bill for the amendment of the law is brought forward. I also venture to say that public opinion and public interest are alike in favour of as large publicity as possible being given to all proceedings as regards the winding up of companies, and there are in this Bill provisions for securing further publicity and advertisement in regard to certain matters which it is desirable should be more widely known than are known at the present time. I claim for the Bill that it carries out more effectually than the existing provisions of the law what was the real intention of the Legislature when they passed that Act. I believe this Bill will deal more effectually with the winding up of companies, and that the conditions which will be imposed upon those who are perhaps responsible for the solvency of some of these companies will have a deterrent effect upon the management of concerns which are not yet insolvent, but which may hereafter come under the provisions of Bankruptcy Law. I venture to say, and I have no doubt I shall carry the House with me when I say it, that there are two main objections to be kept in view in these matters. You have first to keep in view the necessity for a fair and proper administration of the bankrupt estate, so that you may effect a speedy and expeditious distribution of the assets, and at the same time the public interest demands in any case in which there is any suspicion of unfair dealing there shall be an independent investigation into the conduct of those concerned. The main objects of this Bill are, in the first place, to effect a certain transference of jurisdiction, so as to cheapen the proceedings in the winding up of the smaller companies, and to bring them more nearly into harmony with the practice of winding up individual bankrupt estates. There will, therefore, be a more efficient and thorough supervision of the judicial and administrative duties which have to be discharged in the winding up of these companies. Mainly, this Bill assimilates the practice in the case of winding up insolvent companies

to that which now obtains under the Act of 1883 in the case of estates of individual bankrupts. The Official Receiver under this Bill will be to some extent the officer of the Court, but he will be also in other capacities an officer of the Board of Trade in his administrative functions. Dealing with the assets of the company, he will be the officer of the Court, and he will still continue to act by and under the authority of the Court. But if questions arise as to the conduct of those who have had the management of the company he may make a report to the Court, and the Court will have power to act or not to act upon that report as far as regards a judicial investigation into the conduct of the persons concerned. I do not think I need say anything more as regards the general principles contained in this Bill, and I will mention very shortly one or two of the provisions in some of the most important clauses. The first three clauses deal entirely with measures of jurisdiction. The 4th clause contains certain provisions as to the liquidation. The 5th clause contains a power which is new in the administration of affairs of companies. That provision is that power is given to the Court upon the application of the Official Receiver to appoint a special manager to manage the estate or business of the company. The 6th clause is also new as regards the administration of insolvent companies. It makes provision that compulsory separate meetings of creditors and contributories shall be held to determine the appointment of an Official Liquidator in place of the Receiver, and the appointment and constitution of a Committee of Inspectors. If those two meetings, of classes whose interests are not, of course, identical, should happen to disagree, the Court will decide between them. The 7th clause is also important. It requires that a statement of the company's affairs shall be made out and submitted to the Official Referee. The statement is to be made by and in the name of one or more of the Directors, and by the Secretary, or such other persons as, being Directors, officers, and promoters, have acted within one year from the time when the winding up order has been made. Then there is also the 8th clause, which requires that certain reports shall be made from time to time by the Official Referee to the Court. He can, if he is dissatisfied with the first inquiry that is made, or if he thinks that there is a prima facie reason for taking proceedings in the case of any individual concerned, make a report to the Court asking for a further inquiry to be made. If, as the result of that inquiry, he comes to the conclusion that there is a ground for proceeding, he makes a report again to the Court to that effect, and the Court may thereupon take action upon that report. There are other provisions in the Bill for carrying out and applying more thoroughly the principles of the Act of 1883 to the winding up of companies. I think those are almost entirely matters of detail, and that they will be better considered by one of the Committees of your Lordship's House than on Second Reading. I will, therefore, say nothing more at this stage, but merely ask your Lordships now to read the Bill a second time.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord Balfour of Burleigh.)

LORD HERSCHELL: My Lords, I think the Bill which the noble Lord has introduced is likely to work well, and to be a great improvement in relation to the winding up of companies; the general scheme of it being to assimilate the provisions relating to the winding up of companies and to bring them into conformity with those which now exist in relation to bankruptcies. That scheme is, I think, a sound one. The only matter to which I would call the noble Lord's attention on that point is the danger of leaving measures of this description to officials, which always results in creating a tendency after a time to too rigid and cast iron a system. There comes to be a tendency to run in a groove and to assume, when the working of an Act is once started in a particular direction, that all is well, and to continue the same system without perhaps sufficiently considering whether it is not capable of improvement. What I was going to submit to the noble Lord was this, whether there would not be some advantage, having regard to the complaints which have been made of the working of the official part of the bankruptcy system in the Board of Trade, in appointing a small Departmental Committee to inquire into the administration of the Bankruptcy Act under the Board of Trade, with the view to ascertain whether improvements might not be brought about in the mode in which its details are carried out. It strikes me that the present time, when you are about already to enlarge this system by extending it to the winding up of companies, which obviously will entail a large addition to the work of the Department, and is a new departure, would be a good time to take advantage of the working of the Bankruptcy Act, of which there has been now seven years' experience. We are now going to apply it to another subject matter, and I think we should take advantage of this experience which has been gained by the seven years' working of that Act. I think a Departmental Inquiry of that sort would be likely to result in suggestions for improved working of the law in regard to winding up, and that if that is to be done it would be advisable to do so simultaneously with the proposal to extend the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act to these matters. That is with regard to the principle of the Bill. There are several matters of detail to which I will call the attention of the House at a later stage. There is, however, one which I would point out now. I cannot overlook the fact that the present Bill extends only to England and Wales, and does not extend to Scotch and Irish companies. Certain of the provisions of the Act of 1862 are repealed by this Bill, and repealed because others have been substituted for them which will, it is considered, be of a satisfactory character, but, as far as I have seen, the circumstance appears to have been overlooked that these intended provisions only apply to England and Wales. Obviously, for instance, you ought not to repeal altogether those provisions which exist with regard to malfeasances of Directors when the substituted provisions apply only to England and Wales, and not to Scotland and Ireland. I think the section also which contains the interpretations of the word "Court," and defines the Court for Scotland and Ireland as well as for England and Wales, ought not to have been repealed for a substituted definition applying only to England and Wales. I only desire to make these remarks at present, and I will not now trouble the House with further matters of detail.

*THE EARL OF SELBORNE: My Lords, I wish also to say that the principle of this Bill appears to me to be very sound as far as its object is to assimilate as much as possible the winding up jurisdiction to that in bankruptcy. The two subjects are obviously so nearly related to each other that they may almost be called identical, and the separation of the jurisdictions is purely arbitrary. I see that the Bill is a cautious Bill, because it enables the jurisdiction to be exercised either by Chancery Division Judges or by the special Judge in Bankruptcy. That, perhaps, is quite right. We know that the Judges of the Chancery Division have acquired great knowledge on the subject; and to withdraw all these cases from them at once may be unnecessary, and perhaps inexpedient. But the general principle appears to me to be entirely right. I must say at the time when I had personal experience of the administration in winding up in the Court of Chancery I did not think it satisfactory. It was a very long operation, the administration being left very much of necessity to Official Liquidators, whose expenses were extremely large. Without being able to anticipate how this Bill may work I think there was very considerable room for improvement in the administration of winding up matters, and I hope that improvement will take place under this Bill as it is framed. With regard to the suggestion of my noble and learned Friend, that there should be a departmental Commission appointed to inquire into the working of the latest Bankruptcy Act, certainly I see no objection whatever to the suggestion; but I am bound to say that, as far as I can judge, the present Bankruptcy Act has succeeded very much better than any of its predecessors. No Bankruptcy Act, and no winding up Act, ever will give satisfaction to creditors who are not paid, or to shareholders who are ruined, and such people there will always be to the end of the world. The most you can do is to aim at the least expensive mode of proceeding, and the one which shall, as far as possible, exclude the abuses which have been almost always incident to the unhappy state of things which leads to those proceedings: and if this measure of the Government should produce that effect in reference to winding up proceedings, I think they will be entitled to the public thanks.

LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH: My Lords, I should like to say at once that as regards the important point which has been brought before the House, as to repealing certain sections altogether of which the substitution is only as regards England and Wales, that matter, of course, must be looked into. The noble and learned Lord is perhaps aware that there is a Bankruptcy Bill for Scotland this year, but I see it has been withdrawn. However, the Secretary of State for Scotland has told me that if we will communicate with him, he will take care to get advice upon the Bill as it stands, so far as it has reference to Scotch Law. I can only say that I shall take care that objection does not arise. With regard to the departmental Committee to inquire into the operation of the Act of 1883, I will, of course, consider that point, and if the noble and learned Lord will allow me, we will communicate with him before the Bill leaves the House. With regard to the other remark, that perhaps officials, when discharging duties of this kind, have a tendency to run too much in the same groove, that may be an accusation which is not altogether without ground as regards officers of some of the public Departments, and if it is to be brought against officers of the Board of Trade, I think it must also be with regard to officers who have to perform public functions under the existing law.

On Question, agreed to.

Bill read 2^a accordingly; and committed to the Standing Committee for Bills relating to law, &c.

WESTERN AUSTRALIA CONSTITUTION BILL.—(No. 184.)

House in Committee (according to order); Bill reported without amendment; and to be read 3^a to-morrow.

METROPOLIS MANAGEMENT AND BUILDING ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

LORD MONKSWELL: My Lords, I am surprised to find that the Railway Companies have petitioned against this Bill. The matter has been well thrashed out by the House of Commons, and I have not been able to find out that the Railway Companies then expressed any dissatisfaction with the object of the measure now before the Committee. It is a Bill promoted by the London County Council at the instance of the Vestries and District Bodies. This Bill proposes to do away with some obvious defects in the law, in regard to the paving of roads and ways. The first two clauses merely define the purposes of the Act. By Clause 3 any Vestry or District Board may, from time to time, repair or pave roadways within their parishes or districts, although such roadways may not at the time of the work being done have become repairable by them. According to the Camberwell Vestry case, if a Vestry or District Board repairs a road, however slightly, they are held to have taken it over, and cannot afterwards recover the expense of paving the street. This is an unsatisfactory state of the law. It is sometimes necessary for District Boards or Vestries to pave streets partially, inasmuch as the inhabitants may squabble among themselves about it, and the road is left in an inefficient state of repair, but under this provision the Local Board may do the work and recover the expense of paving the street, when it shall become a new street under the Metropolis Management Act. By Clause 4 a penalty is provided for the commission of illegal acts in regard to sewers or drains made contrary to approved plans. By Clause 5 penalties are imposed for certain other illegal acts in regard to making connections in sewers. Clause 6 is for the purpose of enabling Vestries or District Boards to take portions of houses and property, as they may require, for purposes of improvement, if in the case of houses or buildings such portions can, in the opinion of the jury, be severed without material detriment to the rest of the property. Under the present law

Vestries and District Boards may be required or compelled to take thousands of pounds' worth of property for the purpose of carrying out an improvement, with the result that in many cases improvements are not effected which otherwise would be carried out. By Clause 7 the subsoil under a street or roadway and so on is not to be removed without the consent of the Vestry or District Board, and without complying with such conditions in regard to securing foundations and so on, as the Vestry or Local Board may impose. At present damage often arises from the method of filling up sites with rubbish. In that way have been caused subsidences of pipes, with resulting explosions. I may mention that this clause was carefully considered in the House of Commons when the clauses were gone through one by one. I need not trouble your Lordships with the remaining details of the measure, and I beg to move that the Bill be read a second time.

Bill read 2^a (according to order), and referred to a Select Committee.

INTESTATES ESTATES BILL.—(No. 148.)

House in Committee (on Re-commitment) (according to order).

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY: I hope your Lordships will not proceed with this Bill. Almost all the Peers belonging to Ireland are opposed to it as contrary to the customs and wishes of the agricultural classes in Ireland; and the same reasons that make it objectionable in Ireland make it objectionable to the agricultural classes in England, which furnish most of the intestates. No cause has been shown for altering the law, and it is a great objection to such changes, that it is a long time before such changes become generally known to intestates, whose intentions to abide by the actual law are thus frustrated.

LORD BRAMWELL: This is a speech against the Second Reading. As the noble Lord has said that all the Irish Peers are contented with it, and it is only an English Peer who is discontented, that certainly seems, if I may venture to say so, rather an Irish mode of objecting. I hope your Lordships will adhere to your opinion with regard to the Bill on Second Reading.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I must venture to demur to the doctrine of my noble and learned Friend who has just sat down with regard to Second Readings. The other night we were told by noble Lords that when a Bill is read a second time that is only meant to express agreement with a principle, and not giving a pledge that certain things ought to be done. If that doctrine is correct, and if we are now to be asked, as my noble and learned Friend asks us, when we get to this stage not to object on the ground that we have given our assent, it seems to me that our opportunity of objecting to Bills is reduced to very slender proportions. I do not object very strongly to this Bill, although I do not know why the widow should have exactly £500—why that should be the sum fixed—and although I do not know why no account should be taken of anything that has been done for her during the lifetime of her husband. However, I do not think it is a measure of very great importance, and I therefore do not offer any resistance.

Bill reported without further amendment; and to be read 3^a to-morrow.

BOILER EXPLOSIONS ACT, 1882, AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 164.)

Amendments reported (according to order); and Bill to be read 3^a to-morrow.

BARRACKS BILL.—(No. 163.)

Read 3^a (according to order), and passed.

CUSTODY OF CHILDREN BILL.
(No. 98.)

THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading read.

*THE EARL OF MEATH: My Lords, before this Bill finally passes from your Lordships' House I should like to return my thanks to the Lord Chancellor for having consented to carry out, what I proposed to do in another Bill which was referred to the same Committee, namely, the Protection of Children Bill. I desire also to thank the noble Lord for having practically permitted the addition to his Bill of clauses which were the principal ones in the Bill I had the honour to introduce into this House. It will be within your Lordships' recollection that I have, on several occasions, drawn the attention of your Lordships to the difficulties under which philanthropic persons and institutions labour under the present law, owing to unworthy persons taking away their children from them just at a critical age, and just at the time when they can earn money for those unworthy parents. By the introduction of this Bill by the Lord Chancellor, and owing to the inclusion of some of the clauses which I have proposed in the Protection of Children Bill, I hope that those institutions and benevolent persons will find it much easier to carry on their work than they did formerly. I feel that this Bill, going forth from your Lordships' House with the sanction and with the power of the Government at its back, it will be much more likely to succeed in passing the other House than it would have had if it had borne my name. I hope, therefore, the Government will do all they possibly can to pass this Bill through the other House, and that it may prove a very great benefit to the large class of persons and children who are interested in it.

Bill read 3^a (according to order), and passed, and sent to the Commons.

SCHEME CONFIRMATION BILL.—(No. 204.)

PUBLIC LIBRARIES ACTS AMENDMENT
BILL.—(No. 205.)

REMOVAL TERMS (SCOTLAND) ACT,

Brought from the Commons; read 1^a, and to be printed.

ADMINISTRATION OF THE LAW.

OBSERVATIONS.

*LORD ESHER, in rising to call attention to alleged defects in the administration of the law, and to ask Her Majesty's Government whether they will issue a Royal Commission to inquire into such alleged defects, and to propose remedies for such as are found to exist, with a view to immediate legislation, said: My Lords, with as little pleasure in doing it, as your Lordships will have in hearing it, I have undertaken to talk law for some quarter of an hour. Some 15 years ago the administration of the law was much altered by the passing of the Judicature

Acts; that the Judicature Acts have done much to ameliorate the administration of the law I think cannot be doubted, but some defects are alleged still to continue, and some defects are said to be even increased by the working of the Judicature Act. These alleged defects are put forward by people of weight and consequence, and I think ought to be carefully considered. I propose to name several alleged defects and to examine into them shortly, and to say that, as far as I am concerned, I think some of them will be found not to be established, but that some of them, and those very important defects, are established. Still, I cannot propose to act upon my own opinion, from which other people may differ; and what I ask, therefore, is that those allegations should be inquired into. Now, one great defect which it is said exists is the delay of the trials of disputes between parties, and that there is a considerable delay in some parts of the administration of the law I think is clearly made out. I am happy to say that in the Court to which I belong there really is at present no delay and no arrear. I think that in the Appeal Court there is no case coming from the Queen's Bench Division which is more than four months old, and the number of appeals yet untried are not more than 24. From the Chancery Division the number of appeals yet untried are not more than 16. I think that, considering some years ago the arrears from the Queen's Bench Division were some 260 appeals, and that some of them were more than two years old, the way in which they have been worked down cannot be held to be otherwise than satisfactory; but with regard to the Chancery Division and the Queen's Bench Division the case does not stand so well. In the Queen's Bench Division itself, taking the cases before the Divisional Courts, I do not think there is any considerable arrear; but with regard to the cases to be tried by Judges with juries, or by Judges alone, there is, most unfortunately, a very great arrear. There are arrears in London and Middlesex of trials by special juries at the present time 280 cases, and of Common Juries 176 cases, and of non-jury cases, that is cases to be tried by a Judge without a jury, 440. So that the total arrear of causes at present in the Queen's Bench Division amounts to 896. But it should be recollected that in the Queen's Bench Division the number of Judges who would have had to try these causes has, for the last year or more, unfortunately been very much diminished. There were two Judges taken off for nearly a year for a Commission, which is now famous, and there have been, unfortunately, since that time two more of the Judges absolutely disabled for a time during illness. Still, that is a great arrear. Then, in the Chancery Division, there are at the present time to be tried, that is for the purpose of the trial which is to fix the rights of the parties, 456 witness actions and 101 other actions, making 557 yet untried. The oldest of those causes was entered in January of this year, and many of them date back as far as June of this year. I think that is a painful arrear, and that matter, I think, therefore, should be inquired into. Now, one great allegation against the administration of the law is that appeals are too numerous, and, therefore, oppressive. It is very popularly said there are four appeals. The instance always given is, that you first take a case before a Master, then before a Judge, then before a Divisional Court, then before the Court of Appeal, and then to the House of Lords. It is generally so stated, as if that were the case in almost every instance of an appeal. Now, I have had a Return made of a number of summonses in Chambers, which is the first step, during a year, and I take the year 1888-89. In the Queen's Bench Division there were before the Masters in that year 37,400 summonses heard. Of those there was that which is hardly an appeal—that is to say, a reference to a Judge in Chambers—in only 3,636 cases. Going from the Master to the Judge in Chambers is not an expensive thing; we never call that an appeal, and really it is not expensive at all. Now, of those 3,636 cases heard by the Judge in Chambers 634 only went to the Divisional Court, and of those 634 which were taken to the Divisional Court only 85 came to the Court of Appeal. Therefore, so far from it being a common thing that every summons before the Master—or nearly everyone—goes from the Master to the Judge, and from the Judge to the Divisional Court, and from the Divisional Court to the Court of Appeal, the truth is that out of 37,400 summonses in one year—and in almost every year it is about the same—heard before the Master only 85 go to the Court of Appeal. With regard to going on to the House of Lords, I believe the fact is that there has been only one such case in five years which went to the House of Lords, and in that case the House of Lords overruled the decision of all the other Courts. Therefore, as it seems to me, the case alleged of too numerous appeals is hardly made out. Then there is another matter to which I must refer, that is, that in those 83 cases, out of the 37,400 which have come to the Court of Appeal the appeal was by no means frivolous; although upon some point of practice it was very often a point of very great importance. It might involve the construction of the Rules, which are not always easy to construe, but it very often concerns a matter of the greatest importance. Suppose that an Order has been made for a Commission to go to China or Japan or India. If that Commission goes out it costs hundreds of pounds, and causes a delay of months; and if the Order has been inadvertently passed by the Master and the Court of Appeal is applied to, and reverses the Order for the Commission, there is an end of it, and the Court of Appeal has saved the parties some hundreds of pounds and a delay of months. So much with regard to the practice appeals. Now with regard to appeals from trials, there were in one year in London and Middlesex 1,179 cases tried by the Judge or the Judge and jury, and 844 on the Circuits; that is to say, there are 2,023 causes tried in the year. With regard to those causes which have been tried to the extent of 2,000, some of them are tried by a Judge without a jury, and some of them are tried by a Judge with a jury. With regard to those tried by a Judge without a jury, the appeal has been and is direct to the Court of Appeal. It does not go to a Divisional Court, and then to the Court of Appeal; it goes straight to the Court of Appeal. Those tried by a Judge and jury, up to this time, have gone to the Divisional Court, and from the Divisional Court there has been a second appeal to the Court of Appeal. In the year in regard to these 2,000 causes, there were appeals direct to the Court of Appeal in 137 cases; that is to say, there were 137 appeals direct to the Court of Appeal where the case had been tried by a Judge without a jury, and of those tried by a Judge and jury, there were 118 motions for a new trial of them in the Queen's Bench Division. Of those causes, 63 were appealed from the Divisional Court to the Court of Appeal. So that the appeals out of those 2,000 causes that have been heard in both Courts together are 255, and of those, up to the present time, there has been a double appeal in only 63 cases. Now by the Bill which is before your Lordships' House, which was brought in the House of Commons by Mr. Finlay, those 118 appeals in regard to new trials which went to the Divisional Court would come straight to the Court of Appeal. So that out of the 2,000 cases which are tried in the course of a year, there will be 255 appeals direct to the Court of Appeal, and, therefore, only one appeal, unless they go on to the House of Lords. How many cases come to the House of Lords I am not prepared to say; many noble Lords here will know that much better than I do; but I apprehend myself, there are not more than about 20 in the course of the year. So that I cannot think the allegation of too numerous appeals is really made out. And I may say this, that I do not think an appeal to the Court of Appeal is a very expensive matter. I have inquired into it carefully, from practitioners in London and elsewhere, and I do not find that is the expensive part of litigation; other people may have different opinions; I have given mine, that neither as to practice cases, nor as to other trials, are the appeals frivolous, and I do not think, after that statement which I have made to your Lordships, they can be said to be exceedingly numerous. Now, the next and most important allegation in regard to the administration of the Civil Law seems to me this: that the expense of actions is far too great, and it is further said that the expense of actions has been increased since the Judicature Act came into operation instead of being diminished. I have come to the conclusion myself that that allegation is true, and that the expense of actions is far greater than it ought to be. When I come to consider what the cause of it is, the very first fact is the fact that I have mentioned, namely, that amongst the summonses, of which there are 37,400, before the Master, I cannot help thinking that there must be a great many more summonses that there ought to be. Opportunities for summonses are given in the hope that those summonses may do good; but we find in practice that wherever parties have an opportunity of making any movement in a Court they are sure to make it, and the numerous opportunities for summonses which were instituted under the Judicature Act, in the hope of shortening cases, have been invariably used to their full extent, and have lengthened causes, and caused great expense and delay. The chief cause of expense in summonses has been the constant use in Common Law actions of summonses for discovery, and the use of summonses for the purpose of interrogating parties. The truth is that in the Court of Chancery a great part of their administrative system was carried out by discovery and inspection of documents and by interrogatories, and when the Judicature Act was passed a person of great influence, that is to say, the late Master of the Rolls, Sir George Jessel, was strong enough to carry into the new rules the Chancery system, not merely the Chancery principles, but the Chancery procedure in Common Law actions. In my opinion that system is not fit for Common Law actions, and I think it causes great oppression. It is just this. Take the case of a dispute between two merchants in the City of London about the construction of a contract, or about the delivery of goods or the non-acceptance of goods. The parties begin on both sides by asking for discovery, the meaning of which is that each party asks the other, "What books do you keep, and how many books did you keep with regard to this matter," and then, having obtained an answer to that from the other party, you are obliged to go to the merchant and get an affidavit as to that. Then the next thing is to say, "We want to inspect the merchant's books," and then the attorney or the attorney's clerk goes to the merchant's office and ransacks his ledgers and letter books, and I do not know what, not only to the expense, but to the disgust of the merchant, who does not like to have his books gone into in that way, and very little good ever comes of it, for in almost every case it comes to nothing. Then, as to the administration of interrogatories. The system of administering interrogatories in an ordinary case is a system of the most oppressive kind. It is almost invariably used, because it can be used, and, therefore, if your baker brings an action against you he first asks you whether you keep a diary, and then if you do he asks to see it, and then he asks to see his own bills which he has given you, and then he interrogates you upon them, and the interrogatories go sometimes really to matters which would not be allowed to be asked even at the trial. In the City of London I am told this is a great cause of the increased expense of causes, and it is a cause of the greatest possible irritation; that instead of the dispute between two merchants being managed until it comes to trial by their solicitors, the merchants themselves are tormented by having to make discovery and make affidavits and answer interrogatories, which they generally have to answer by saying they know nothing about it. But then if they say that, there is at once an application made for what is called a further and better answer. Why for that purpose the Chancery practice is to be used in ordinary common law or mercantile causes I cannot understand, although I say again other people may be of a different opinion. It is considered to be expensive, oppressive, and to cause infinite delay. I think that is a grievance which ought to be inquired into and, if possible, met. Then the next complaint is in regard to the delay in trials. I have shown your Lordships already that there is a delay in trials both in the Common Law Courts and in the Chancery Division. That delay, of course, is the result of many causes, but one of the very first causes is this multitude of summonses, because if you have a multitude of summonses one after another, and more particularly these summonses as to discovery and interrogatories, until after all that has been got rid of and passed through at great expense and with great delay of course the trial cannot go on. Those summonses, therefore, are the cause of a great part of the delay. Well, another thing which causes delay in London and Middlesex is said to be the want of a sufficient attendance of Judges in London. The want of a sufficient attendance of Judges in London has been the result up to the present time, first, as I have said, of the illness of some of them; and, secondly, of the employment of some of them upon other matters. But there are other reasons. The Judges are bound to go circuit. The number of circuits have been increased, and therefore every time you increase the number of circuits you, of course, increase the time during which a certain number of Judges are absent from London. Can this part of the cause of the delay be cured? I have already suggested that the quantity of summonses can be cured, because I think, after looking into the matter carefully, that a vast number of them can be got rid of altogether. With regard to these interrogatories and summonses for discovery they must be bridled and limited by some rule or other, so that they shall only be used in cases where they are really wanted. But with regard to the absence of Judges on account of going circuit, I cannot help thinking that it is worth while to consider whether at the present time there are not too many circuits. There are three or four circuits now—I forget which at the moment—for the trial of prisoners. The Judges are obliged to go to every county for the trial of civil causes. In many of the counties the number of civil causes has become very small indeed, and yet the Judges are obliged to go there to be ready to try them. One mode of obviating the necessity of Judges having to go to each county for the trial of a very small number of civil causes would be this: The railway system has brought the Assize towns practically much closer to each other than they were in former times; and many of those who have had to consider this matter (as far as I know, all of them) have come to the conclusion that one mode of saving time would be to, what has been called, "group" the trials of civil causes on Assizes, or, in other words, to take the central towns as representative of those immediately round, and to decide all the civil cases there, taking care that the parties to them and their witnesses are not brought too far; that is to say, instead of trying civil causes in each town, to try them in some representative or district town. I think there was a resolution of the Judges that it was advisable that it should be carried out, but it has not been acted upon, and I should like that point to be further considered. Then as to the number of Criminal Assizes. It has been proposed that there should be a less number of Criminal Assizes, while, to meet the difficulty that would be presented of keeping prisoners too long in prison waiting for trial, if there were only a few of them, it was suggested by many of the Judges at one time that in each county the Quarter Sessions should be held half-way between the Assizes. We should thus have got rid of many of the criminals, who many of the Judges think ought all to be tried at the Assizes whenever there are any in prison at the time. It was objected on behalf of the counties, and I think it was a weighty objection, that that would call the Justices together at Quarter Sessions at inconvenient times when not necessary for the county business; but at the present time the Justices have been relieved of many of their duties in reference to the county business by the County Councils, and there would be nothing unfair to them in such a proposition in regard to the criminal business; and I think we could now get the country gentlemen to take the Criminal Sessions half-way between the Assizes. One or two of the Justices would, I think, be willing to act for that purpose. If that were done, you would have in most counties only two or three Criminal Assizes, and you would consequently have the Judges kept out of London for a much shorter time. Then there is another thing as to criminal procedure which might well be done now. A man is put into prison and kept there before trial. In certain cases he might be let out, but people will not go bail for him, and he cannot get bail. In the old condition of things in England if a criminal were not imprisoned until trial, he might get out of the way and you might never see him again; but I cannot help thinking that in the present condition of England that is next door to impossible; and I think a great number of prisoners might be let out on small bail, or without bail, on condition that if he moved away from his ordinary residence or left the district without giving notice to the police he might be re-apprehended and put into prison. That would secure their appearance if they attempted to get out of the way. By those means you could diminish the number of Criminal Assizes, and you would have the Judges kept out of town a less time for the purpose of trying prisoners at them. Of course, the more you succeed in doing that the more you would obtain the services of the Judges in London. Those are methods which I think in the Common Law Division you would be able to keep the Common Law Judges longer in London than they are now, and they would, of course, be able to deal with the cases to be tried in a more satisfactory manner. Now, it has been suggested that there should be an increase in the number of Judges in the Queen's Bench Division. I have considered that matter also. Everybody must be of opinion, I should think, that it is not well to have too many Judges; and I have come to the opinion myself that if these other arrangements were made, there is no occasion in the Common Law Division to increase the number of Judges. There is another grievance as to the mode in which the civil cases are dealt with in the Queen's Bench Division. It is difficult to make out where a case will be really tried when there are a good many Judges trying causes, and there are now a great many more than there used to be. Of course, there is but one Judge trying each list of cases before him. Those cases are put down for trial before that particular Judge in their order. But if the Judge who has those cases in his paper on one day does not try them all, they are not left to be tried before him, or even in the same Court, but they are very likely transferred on the next day into another Court for trial before another Judge. The result is, that your case may be put into the list in Court I. It is at the bottom of that list. All the cases before yours are tried. If your case remained in that Court it would be the first in the next day's list; but that is not the way it is done. It is taken into another

Court, and, instead of being first in the list and tried at once, you may be kept there all day, because perhaps it is the last in the list in the next Court. That has been the cause of a great deal of irritation; and I think it might be cured by some arrangement for consultation as to the mode in which the lists of cases are to be managed. As to the mercantile cases, it has been said by people of considerable weight in the City that they are driven out of the Queen's Courts and into arbitration, or forced to settle their cases because they cannot get them satisfactorily tried in the Queen's Courts. There was a great grievance felt about that. Their cases were put into the general list. You might, therefore, have a mercantile case between merchants placed in the list in one Court, but, as I have stated, not reached, and the parties would be brought from the City into another Court on another day, and, considering the nature of their business, and what a burden it is for them to be present for two days in Court with their witnesses, that was recognised to be a great hardship and inconvenience; but by arrangement with the Lord Chief Justice, having regard to the practice in the City, this grievance has almost vanished; the City causes are put into a list by themselves, and they are called on one after another; but in the City these formal applications which I have mentioned as oppressive upon mercantile men, with regard to inspection of books, answering interrogatories, making affidavits, and so on, affect them very much, and for these reasons they have a disinclination to go to law. Now, I come to the Chancery Division. There are grievances with regard to the Chancery Division. That matter was inquired into in 1875 by a Committee over which I presided, not composed of Judges or lawyers alone, but of Judges, lawyers, and some merchants. That Committee reported to the Lord Chancellor that there were grievances as to the mode in which the business of the Courts of Chancery was conducted. The defects there are said to be these: In the Chancery Division cases are now tried with witnesses instead of an affidavit. They are called witness-causes, and they may be taken before any of the Chancery Judges. A case is not transferred except under particular circumstances from the Judge in whose Court it is. If, therefore, he has witness-causes to try, he can only give a certain number of days in the week to the trial of witness-causes. The result is, that he may be trying a cause with witnesses on the two days in the week that he may give to hearing such causes. He has not then finished the cause, but he does not go on the next day until he finishes it; he postpones it until the next week, and the parties who may have come from a distance must go away with their witnesses, and come up again the following week. That system has caused very great inconvenience, and constantly causes very great expense. There is one Judge in the Chancery Division who tries witness-causes only, and the hearing of the causes put down for trial before him goes on one day after another until they are finished; but causes of that description may be put down before the other Judges, and, if so, they are taken in that way. Another cause of complaint in the Chancery Division is this: When the case after the decree is pronounced has to be worked out, that has to be done in the Judge's Chambers before the chief clerk, and the way they proceed, necessitated, I suppose, by the magnitude of their business, is this: The chief clerk generally gives an appointment to the parties for an hour only, and when the matter goes before him, therefore, the hour is up before much has been done, or, at all events, before the matter is finished, and he stops that case in order to go on with another. He is then asked by the parties when they are to come again; and he tells them they must go down to the bottom of his appointments. So that after having been before the chief clerk with their witnesses for an hour, the matter, so far from being finished, has hardly been begun, and the parties are sent away. But they do not go on the next day; they have to take an appointment at the bottom of his list, which may throw them over a month. They then have to come up again with their witnesses for another hour; they cannot finish then, and they are sent away again. That seems to me to be a matter which ought to be cured, and which can be cured. I will say no more than that. An elaborate Report was made by that Committee upon the subject, and when you look at the large business that is done in the Chancery Division, notwithstanding the Judges have worked extremely hard, as it is well known they have, your Lordships will not be surprised when you see the arrears as compared with those which I read at first. At the present moment there are 557 cases in the Chancery Division which are not heard, and they are practically 9 or 10 months in arrear. We came to the conclusion then that we ought to have another Judge added to the Chancery Division, and I should like to have that well considered now; not adding one to the Queen's Bench or taking away any, for there is not one too many, but adding another Judge in the Chancery Division with a proper staff. We might then have two Judges in the Chancery Division trying what they call witness cases. There is another matter in regard to the Chancery Division. A great many of the cases which are now brought in the Court of Chancery are really Common Law cases—real pure Common Law cases. It is said, but I cannot vouch for the fact, that costs are more liberally allowed in the Chancery Division than in the Common Law Division; and that that induces some people to take a case into the Chancery Division. If that be true, the matter ought to be looked into. We ought to look into the costs of both Divisions, and see whether with regard to the very same kind of action the costs ought not to be the same, so that that temptation may be taken away, and then the cases should be sent where they ought to go, that is to say, to the Common Law Division. Now, so far, I have gone into the question of the administration of the law in civil actions. I do not pretend that I have exhausted it, but I have shown heads which I think justify inquiry, and which ought to have speedy treatment. But now I come to one of the most important things in my view, that is, the criminal administration, and I cannot help thinking that the burning question with regard to that is the question whether there ought not to be a Court of Criminal Appeal. If there is to be a Court of Criminal Appeal what ought to be considered about it with regard to the extent to which the appeal ought to be allowed? There has arisen a state of things which I cannot help thinking is most dangerous with regard to the administration of the Criminal Law.

Now-a-days, the moment a prisoner is condemned to death or to any severe punishment, that is done which never was done before, the attorney for the prisoner endeavours to get it set aside. Up to a very late date, according to my recollection, and as far as I have ever known, the two people who could not interfere during the trial of a prisoner either on his behalf or against him were his counsel and his attorney. But now the constant practice is that the moment a prisoner is convicted and sentenced to a heavy punishment his or her attorney immediately begins to set about to get up petitions in favour of his client. It must be and is well known that he gets the petitions signed by people who cannot possibly know anything about the case. Multitudes of people sign a petition which is drawn up by a prisoner's attorney before they see it—without seeing what the petition states they sign their names. Then the next point is to get a Member of Parliament to ask a question of the Home Secretary in the House of Commons, and pressure is then put upon the Home Secretary. If that is allowed to go on it will practically produce an appeal to the House of Commons in each case. The Home Secretary used hardly ever to be invoked unless for the purpose of mere mercy; but now he is invoked on almost every occasion, and asked to consider whether the verdict of the jury and the sentence of the Court were both right. It has become a question of an appeal to the Home Secretary, it is nothing else. It is not the exercise of the prerogative of mercy now, it is an appeal to the Home Secretary to revise and overlook the verdicts of juries and the sentences of Judges. In my opinion it is in many cases necessary, and it is well recognised, I think, that the verdicts of juries in criminal cases ought to be re-considered, and that the sentences of Judges ought to be re-considered; but I say that to leave those two things or either of them to be done by one man is throwing a greater weight upon that one man, however high his character or great his ability, than he is able to bear. I, therefore, for one, suggest that there should be a Court of Criminal Appeal created, and that it should be empowered to deal to the same extent as the Home Secretary is able to deal now with criminal verdicts and sentences, that is to say, that they should re-consider them carefully and investigate with the utmost patience, in order to see whether the verdict may not unhappily have gone wrong, and that they should have the power of advising that sentences should be altered and to what extent. Of course, that there should ever be a new trial of a prisoner who has been acquitted is contrary to the law of England. In my opinion, the Court of Appeal might absolutely set aside a conviction if satisfied that there had been a wrong conviction; but to try a prisoner over again would be contrary to every principle of English law. It is also contrary, in my opinion, to every idea and principle of English law, that a sentence which has been passed by a Judge should be increased. But a sentence which is too severe may be diminished. I cannot see how that can injure anybody, and it is no more than justice to the prisoner. My suggestion for a Court of Criminal Appeal is not that it should be a changing Court as in our present Courts, with the Judges changing from day to day, but that there should be a permanent Court of experienced Judges nominated by the Crown, and that that Court of Criminal Appeal should have the power of setting aside a conviction when they came to a clear conclusion that it had been wrong, instead of the matter going before the Home Secretary, upon whom the burden cast is too great, and also that they should have the power of diminishing sentences when they thought those sentences had been too severe; and that for the purpose of doing either they should not be confined to the strict laws of evidence, or to any other strict law, but that they should be allowed to take into consideration, as the Home Secretary now does, any circumstance, either before or after the trial. They should take into consideration any circumstance which might be brought before them. But, nevertheless, the institution of a Court of Criminal Appeal should in no way interfere with the exercise of the prerogative of the Crown in dispensing mercy, either before or after an inquiry by the Court of Appeal, but such mercy should not be extended on the ground of either a wrong conviction or a wrong sentence, those being questions left for the determination of the Court. That prerogative should be exercised by the Crown just as it is now. Then it may be said there might be a difficulty in getting this Court of Criminal Appeal to meet. My suggestion is, that the Judges nominated on that Court should undertake—it will be a fresh burden upon them, but they must undertake it—to hear any criminal appeal within, say, three weeks, or such other time as might be limited, but a very short time after the trial, when it was desired to revise the sentence. At any time of the year they must be ready to attend the Court, for promptitude in these cases is a matter of essential importance. My Lords, these are matters in the administration of the law which I cannot help thinking of great importance all of them. They are defects which it may be made out—they are all alleged defects—which ought to be inquired into, and if they are found to exist they ought to have a remedy applied to them. I have thought that the best way of getting people to consent to be convinced that some of them were, perhaps, not well founded, and as to those which might be found to be existing, the best way to consult upon their remedy, and to suggest a remedy, was to have a Royal Commission, a Commission not of Judges alone, not of lawyers alone, but of persons of experience in business, in country life, and in London life; and then, if they come to an accord, I have thought myself that any legislation would be greatly facilitated if brought forward by the Lord Chancellor. As has been said by a noble and learned Lord (Lord Bramwell) to-day of himself as a young Parliamentary hand, I do not pretend to have any experience as to Parliamentary procedure. I find myself generally wrong if I attempt to do anything in the Parliamentary way, and if my noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack thinks there is any other mode of getting at the facts and carrying out this inquiry, of suggesting a remedy and getting that remedy carried out in any better way than by a Royal Commission, I am quite ready to accede to that. But this I will say, that having brought my mind that at all events some of these things would be for the benefit of the law, as far as I am concerned, I will never stay my hand until I have had the matter fully inquired into, and until I have either through a Royal Commission or in some other way secured a suggestion for remedies which I think may be carried out by the Legislature.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I do not suppose there is any one of your Lordships who will deny the importance of the several topics to which the noble and learned Lord has called attention. The difficulty one has in following him is that the topics are so wide and so important, and have been spread over such a considerable field, that, with regard to some of them, it is impossible to suppose they are proper subjects of inquiry. They are subjects of high State policy, upon which we are quite prepared to consider any legislation which my noble and learned Friend may think proper to bring forward. I shall have a word or two presently to say upon the other points in his speech; but upon the subject of his last observations in regard to a Court of Criminal Appeal, I have only to point out to him that an increase would be necessary in the number of Judges. He says there is already considerable arrear in the performance of their duties by Judges of first instance in the Queen's Bench Division, and the creation of a Court of Criminal Appeal, would involve the necessity of adding other Judges, increasing their labours by the necessity of sitting within three weeks of the conviction appealed from. A prisoner could not be worse off, and might be better off, by an appeal, and it would not be unnatural, therefore, to suppose that everybody who is convicted would like to take his chance of getting off rather than he would remain under the sentence of the Judge who convicted him. I only point that out to my noble and learned Friend as showing the difficulty which arises from spreading over so wide a field matters, some of which might need inquiry, and others might be made the subject of legislation, if my noble and learned Friend thinks proper to bring it forward. I cannot help thinking that in the latter part of his speech, he, to some extent, filled the character of Balaam; because, having begun by showing defects in the administration of the law—

LORD ESHER*: May I ask my noble and learned Friend to forgive me? I said "alleged defects."

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I am not quite certain that one gets rid of an observation by introducing a qualification of that sort. I am at a loss to know what is meant by an alleged defect, which is not a defect, for which a remedy is desired. He has at all events suggested to your Lordships that, so far as the Court of Appeal is concerned, it gets through its work extremely well, and is in a highly satisfactory condition. Of course one is glad to hear that thus there is a sort of favourable contrast with other Courts. But there was one factor in that problem which he omitted to notice. The Judges of the Court of Appeal are supposed to have undertaken to go circuit if necessary, but they have been relieved from that necessity; and they have thus escaped duties which have now to be discharged exclusively by Judges of the Queen's Bench Division. It is not unnatural, under those circumstances, that the Judges of the Queen's Bench Division have not been able to get through their work. Therefore, it is not a full statement of the case to say that the Judges of the Queen's Bench have not been able to get through all their work, while the Judges of the Court of Appeal have done so, because there has been a transference of work from one set of Judges to the other. Now, with reference to the alleged defect by reason of delay, I think my noble and learned Friend has hardly done justice to the course of legislation as affecting our administration of the law in later years. For very sufficient reasons I think the Legislature has determined that parties should be admissible witnesses, and also that in the Courts of Chancery oral testimony should be substituted for written proceedings in the trial of causes. The inevitable effect of these two changes has been that causes last a great deal longer than they used to do. What is known as a "short cause" has almost disappeared; wherever there is a question in dispute plaintiff and defendant and their witnesses have to be called to contradict each other, and the natural consequence is that the hearing of causes is prolonged. In spite of these changes, however, the work of the Courts is done more quickly, and judgments are arrived at more rapidly, than they used to be in times past. My principal objection to the suggestion that we should institute an inquiry as regards many of the matters mentioned by my noble and learned Friend is that, if the defects exist as he states them, the facts are susceptible of being ascertained by the Rule Committee, of which the noble and learned Lord, like myself, is a member. If there are these great defects, two of them to which he gave the adherence of his own weighty opinion, namely, the abuse of the system of interrogatories, and of the inspection of documents, summonses, and so forth, are defects which would be manifest upon very short inquiry by himself and the other members of that Committee, and they are susceptible of being removed by the Committee. They have complete jurisdiction, and the Rule Committee was intended by the Judicature Acts to have complete jurisdiction in order to get rid of any defects in the administration of justice which might be found to exist. During the last five years, I can answer for it, my noble and learned Friend has not brought before the Rule Committee or suggested any rule or order with the object of remedying any of these alleged defects. I can assure him, as far as I am concerned, and I think I can answer for the other members of the Rule Committee, that the Committee will now gladly receive and consider any suggestion he may make for the purpose of removing these defects. Then my noble and learned Friend referred to the Committee over which he presided; but he does not seem to be aware that out of 41 suggestions that have been reported by that Committee, it has been my pleasure and privilege to carry 21 of them into effect, and that the whole of them would have been, at all events, attempted—I do not say successfully—to be carried into effect but for the difficulty of procuring the assent of Parliament to the appointment of a sixth Judge in Chancery, as he recommends. That is also a question capable of being brought before the House. Are we to suppose that the inquiry already made before my noble and learned Friend and his Committee is to be thrown away, and that we are to begin again de novo to inquire into the subject as if there had been no such inquiry? I have here the Report of the Committee, which extends over 108 pages. A great many witnesses were examined, and the Committee came to the conclusion I have referred to. All that the Committee recommended which could be carried into effect has been done. I may remind the noble and learned Lord that he was himself a party, a short time since, to making a new rule or order that would have a considerable effect in saving costs, and which was made for the purpose of rendering the costs in the different divisions of the Courts the same. That has not been so long ago as that one can safely say yet that it has failed. Then, with regard to the only complaint as to our usual administration of justice, which my noble and learned Friend put forward as being a necessary subject for inquiry, I think it will be found that the noble and learned Lord has, on more than one occasion, admitted that, according to his judgment, from the inquiries he has made, many of the complaints that have been made against the administration of justice are unfounded. I think if, with his experience and his knowledge of the subject, he thinks they are unfounded, and says so, it cannot be said to be desirable that a Royal Commission should be appointed to inquire into them when we have his own authoritative statement that they are not so well-founded as some people imagine. Then, as to the Circuits, the noble and learned Lord thinks that the Circuits ought to be diminished, but except in particular counties where the number of the population has been supposed to render it necessary to maintain them, he must be aware that the number of the Circuits has been diminished. That change was made not so very long ago. A Bill was passed last year with the object of relieving her Majesty's Judges when on circuit from the trial of certain classes of heavy cases which had hitherto almost exclusively occupied their time, and which had occupied them longer on circuit than they need be. At this moment I have not the number of criminal cases which they have been relieved from, but it has been not inconsiderable, but the Bill passed last year has been a relief in the same direction. Then, with reference to the suggested relief which my noble and learned Friend mentions as to the sittings of the Courts of Quarter Sessions, I am not aware that any inconvenience is felt in the present condition of things after the passing of that Bill which it is not now perfectly easy to remove without any legislation and without any inquiry. If inconveniences are supposed to exist nothing can be easier than to call attention to them and to endeavour to remove them. My noble and learned Friend has also said that I attempted to carry into effect a resolution of the Judges, to which he has referred, passed with the view of better apportioning the work of the circuits, that is, with reference to the grouping of certain centres of population, and not sending the Judges of Assize to each county in turn. Why, I was met by protests from every county in England, and the opposition to my proposal was headed by the Lord Chief Justice, who is particularly conversant with those matters, and who thought it his duty to publicly protest against the carrying out of the resolution of the Judges. Of course, in the face of such opposition, both by the counties and the head of the Common Law Division, it was impossible for me to attempt to carry that resolution of the Judges into effect by legislation. In such circumstances what possible good could further inquiry do? What further inquiry is wanted on the subject?—because that seems to be the point of my noble Friend's observations. We know what the facts are. If you have only a certain number of Judges, with more for them to do than they can do, the causes must either be delayed or you must increase the number of Judges. My noble and learned Friend is against increasing the number of Judges, at all events in the Common Law Division, and for the purpose of diminishing the difficulties which consequently exist, as he says, at present, he proposes to cast new duties upon them. I do not think it would be quite desirable to proceed to examine the whole of our Common Law administration, either by Royal Commission or even by extending such observations as I am addressing to your Lordships to-night. Now, turning to the remarks that have fallen from the noble and learned Lord in reference to the administration of the Criminal Law, I think the observations made by my noble and learned Friend as to the desirability of bail being allowed, are perfectly well-founded; but the answer which I have to make is this. I wish to point out that it lies entirely within the discretion of the Magistrates whether prisoners shall be let out on bail or not, and I confess that in these days, when railways and the electric telegraph make it so difficult for persons out on bail to escape from justice, I cannot understand the reluctance of Magistrates to allow prisoners out on bail. The Magistrates can do it if they like, and, as far as I am concerned, I have over and over again protested against the reluctance of some of the Magistrates in this country to admit people to bail, even on their own recognizances. They can do it if they please, and if they think it right to do so. It is only right to observe that at Common Law a misdemeanant is entitled to bail. For reasons which seemed good to the Legislature not so very long ago the law was altered, and it was left to the discretion of the Magistrates whether misdemeanants should be entitled to give bail or not. But that is a condition of things which no inquiry by a Royal Commission could alter. No alteration of the law is required in that respect. It depends upon the modes in which the Magistrates think it right to administer the law personally. I entirely agree with my noble and learned Friend that it is the idlest thing in the world in the present day, when it is so difficult for people to move from place to place without being detected, for Magistrates to manifest so much reluctance to admit to bail, but at present I cannot see why any Royal Commission should be appointed to make a difference in the law, the Magistrates having now full power in the matter. With regard to the creation of a Court of Criminal Appeal, I am afraid I cannot concur with my noble and learned Friend in the observations he has made. For instance, I cannot understand his objection on the ground of novelty to the solicitors of prisoners petitioning the Home Secretary in the interest of their clients. I do not think it is so entirely novel a proceeding that the solicitor of a person who has been convicted of a capital crime should interfere after the sentence and attempt to obtain mercy, as my noble and learned Friend supposes. I suspect that was always done; and why the solicitors or even the advocate for the prisoner should be prevented from doing that I have not the least notion. Lord Esher says there was a rule against it. I never heard of any such rule, nor do I think such a rule every prevailed. I can only say that I know a great many cases in which it has been done, and I doubt whether the practice of their doing so is much more common than it was formerly, although, no doubt, such cases are brought more prominently before the public now in consequence of the increase of sensational literature. That has, no doubt, increased very much, and public attention has been of late years addressed to such topics much more than it used to be; but why the solicitor who has defended a convicted person should not be allowed to send in Petitions to the Home Secretary, if he pleases to do so, I cannot understand. Neither do I agree with the noble and learned Lord that it would be the duty of a Court of Criminal Appeal only to decrease, and not to increase, sentences, if deemed necessary. On the contrary, in my opinion, it would be the duty of such a Court to pronounce the sentence that the Court below ought in the first instance to have pronounced. I have no desire to make invidious distinctions, but I can remember one very remarkable instance in which, when, in consequence of a case having been tried in the Court of Queen's Bench, it was possible for a new trial to be had, a man who had been indicted was tried before Sir Cresswell Cresswell, and sentenced on his first trial to seven years' transportation. A new trial was ordered, though the Privy Council afterwards held that the Court had gone beyond its functions in doing so; but when the man was tried a second time and convicted, his sentence was not the same, for, instead of seven years' he was sentenced on the second occasion to ten years' penal servitude. That certainly does not show that it is contrary to the law of England that a sentence should be increased. I rather think my noble and learned Friend has been somewhat misled in this matter, having regard to the confirmation and increase of sentences in Ireland. It is quite true that according to the summary jurisdiction in England you cannot increase sentences; but the Irish Act is differently framed, and there is a difference, therefore, with regard to dealing with the sentences of Magistrates in Ireland and England.

Now, on the whole, the only thing I can say to my noble and learned Friend is this: That a great many of the defects in the administration of the law to which he has referred, are, I think, susceptible of remedy, if they exist, under the existing law. Whether they exist or not must be within the knowledge of the learned Judges of the Court of which he is a member; and if the noble and learned Lord will bring forward these matters before the Rule Committee, and make any proposals for amending the administration of the law, I will undertake to say that they will receive the most thorough and careful consideration, with the utmost desire on the part of myself and the other members of that Committee to remedy, and then when we have done all we can, and exhausted that means of remedying the defects which he perceives, and it is found that legislation or inquiry is desirable in addition, in order to do more than we have been able to do by our existing powers, I think then the time will have come when my noble Friend will be entitled to say we have exhausted all our powers, and yet there are defects to be remedied in the English law, and that he calls for a Royal Commission. But until that time has arrived, until he has exhausted that very practical mode of operation, I think it is undesirable and unwise to tear up the Judicature Act of 1875 by the roots to see how the plant is growing. Until then I cannot give the noble and learned Lord any encouragement in the notion that the Government will consent to the appointment of the Commission he asks for.

*THE EARL OF SELBORNE: My noble and learned Friend opposite has made an important, useful, and interesting speech, but I cannot help agreeing with the Lord Chancellor that he has not made out a case for the appointment of a Royal Commission, though I should be the last person to deny that there may be cases which are best met in that way. But when certain definite allegations are made upon the subjects of delay and of expense, I think it ought to be shown that there is reason to believe that those evils, as far as they really exist, are so connected with the general system of judicature established by law as not to be capable of having remedies applied to them, either by existing authority or by new legislation, as experience may suggest, without taking a step, which, as it seems to me, might involve a general revision of the whole system for which there is no necessity. That, in my judgment, would be an evil, unless there were a necessity for it. I quite concur with my noble and learned Friend in thinking that such evils as unnecessary delay in trial, unnecessary details of procedure which contribute to delay and expense, and unnecessary expense generally, are evils to which the minds of everyone connected with the administration of justice ought to be addressed. But I must say that as to some things which my noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack has adverted, the Council of Judges, or, if necessary, a Departmental Commission such as my noble and learned Friend presided over, have quite adequate powers to obtain the needed information and to suggest the necessary remedies, and I should not feel confident that such a mixed Commission as has been suggested would, as to many things which are so very technical, have equal weight with the other modes of inquiry. Therefore, I cannot but hope that these matters will be dealt with without that elaborate and large machinery. I do not like travelling into the numerous and interesting topics to which my noble and learned Friend has adverted; but I am tempted to say a word or two as to his views of a Court of Criminal Appeal. I shall not say anything as to the abstract desirableness of having some more effective Court of Criminal Appeal than we have at present; but I do think it is necessary, when that matter is considered, that its consequences should be thoroughly considered too. If there were such a Court of Appeal as my noble and learned Friend has suggested, it seems to me there would be a great probability of the criminal work of the Courts being very largely increased, so as to make their existing strength for the trial of civil and criminal cases quite inadequate. If the conditions were such as my noble and learned Friend has suggested; if, as the Lord Chancellor has said, the prisoners may possibly gain, and could not possibly lose, I should imagine that, subject to the consideration of expense which might operate in some cases, it would be the almost universal practice, in important cases, to make such an appeal. The mere delay entailed would, in cases of capital importance, be a sufficient inducement for an appeal, and would render the carrying out the sentence improbable; because, after a considerable delay, and one or more protracted investigations, there would be very little probability of the capital sentence being carried into effect in any case. But I must go a little further and say, if there is to be such a Court of Criminal Appeal, I think it would never do to give it both the functions of a Court of Law and the discretion of the Home Secretary. If I did not misunderstand my noble and learned Friend, he suggested that a Court of Criminal Appeal should not be bound by the rules of evidence. Now, I do think that is a departure from the principle of a Court of Appeal. The Court of Appeal may be very competent to determine whether there has been a satisfactory trial of a prisoner, or whether there has been a proper sentence passed upon him, and, if necessary, to direct a new trial, or, in some cases, even to reverse a sentence; but to do that as a Court of Appeal, not acting upon ordinary judicial rules, but by way of departure from them, seems to me to be a confusion of functions essentially discordant. And further, I do not believe that the applications to the Home Secretary when the appeal had been heard, and had failed, would be at all less numerous, or that the way of dealing with them would be at all different in its character from what it now is. There must always be a tribunal capable of advising the Crown as to the prerogative of mercy, as my noble and learned Friend himself said; and you cannot exclude, and ought not to exclude, from the consideration of that tribunal matters which are not to be judged by the strict rules of evidence, matters which go to mercy, and which do not go to the correctness or incorrectness of the verdict or sentence. The two processes must, in my judgment, be kept distinct; and I feel tolerably sure that those who imagine that the functions of the Home Secretary and his duties would be materially limited by the establishment of such a Court of Appeal are mistaken. It may be that the reasons for the establishment of such a Court are sufficient to justify all the delays, and all the inconveniences, which, I think, would inevitably arise from it. But, for my part, I am not dissatisfied, from all I can learn, with the way in which the functions of the Home Secretary have been exercised. I agree it is a very onerous duty, but it is a duty which must be discharged. I greatly doubt whether prisoners in general would gain anything by appealing if sentences could be increased; and I am not satisfied that if you had an appeal in criminal cases—I agree, of course, that a man who has been acquitted is not to be tried again—that there is any just or sound reason why, whatever ought to have been the sentence passed in the first instance, whether it be more or less than that actually given, should not be pronounced.

LOED HERSCHELL: My Lords, I should judge from the state of the Benches that this legal discussion has not proved very attractive or exhilarating to the Members of your Lordships' House. Nevertheless I feel it only right to add a few observations, even if it detain your Lordships somewhat longer. The sum and substance of the speech of the Lord Chancellor appears to be this—everything is in most perfect and satisfactory condition; inquiry is not wanted, because we are perfectly acquainted with all the facts; that as to most of the complaints made we have the Rule Committee, which could remedy them at once, eager and anxious to act; and that as to the remainder we have a Legislature prepared to deal with them with great readiness. But, unfortunately, some of these evils have been existing for a long time now, and the Rule Committee does not act, and Parliament does not legislate, and we are left where we were with these evils still unremedied and with the complaints still as serious as ever they were. Now, I quite sympathise with some of the objections which my noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack has urged against the inquiry asked for; but, on the other hand, I think he under-estimates one great advantage which would be derived from such an inquiry. It would bring to a definite point the complaints that are made and the allegations that are levelled against particular parts of our judicial procedure. There would be forthcoming an authoritative and definite statement as to the existence or non-existence of the alleged evils, and as to the remedies which are desirable or possible; and and that having been done, it would not be so easy for those who have the power of dealing with the matter to hold their hands and do nothing. I am not making any complaint against either the Rule Committee or Parliament. We know the natural indisposition to inaugurate and start any considerable change. There is a certain amount of scepticism as to the existence of the evil and doubts as to whether alterations would be really likely to remove the complaints; and in the absence of something which points definitely to the evils and to the remedies those even who have the power to deal with the matter are indisposed to move. I cannot help thinking that some form of inquiry—it might be by a Departmental Committee—into these matters to ascertain the existence of the evils and to deal with the remedies would be of real value. On one point I cannot agree with my noble and learned Friend who has just sat down, as to the institution of a Departmental inquiry. I think that the addition to the Departmental Committee of one or two gentleman outside the body of the law would be of distinct advantage and would add to the probability of the recommendations being carried into effect. Departmental Committees have been appointed which have had upon them others than lawyers. Take one matter to which my noble and learned Friend opposite alluded, the question of increasing by one the number of the Chancery Division Judges. I think if we had a layman about whom no sort of suspicion could arise, it would be difficult to resist such a recommendation. It is true that was recommended by the Departmental Committee over which my noble and learned Friend presided, but I am afraid there is a little indisposition on the part of Parliament to accept the views of Judges upon the question of additions to their number. There is an idea—I believe it myself to be quite an unfounded idea—that they would be likely to urge additions to their number, with the view of lightening their work. My experience in the House of Commons has told me that that is certainly the impression entertained; and I cannot help thinking that if such a recommendation came with the additional opinion of a layman, it would come with such a weight of authority as would be difficult to resist.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: If I am right, that recommendation had the additional weight of a layman's opinion, the Member of the Committee representing the Treasury.

LORD HERSCHELL: I am aware it came with that additional weight of being a recommendation by a Member of the Treasury. I cannot help thinking that the addition upon the Committee of a man versed in public affairs would add considerably to the confidence felt in their Report, and consequently to the probability of the recommendations of the Committee being adopted. I am not going in detail into the matters to which my noble and learned Friend has called attention. I quite agree with him that these questions of discovery of documents and administration of interrogatories broadcast in every action demand serious and immediate attention. I am quite satisfied that with all the advantages which I believe have resulted from the Judicature Acts, they have brought with them, as was inevitable in a great change of that description, certain mischiefs which have been a drawback to the general advantage. But after a system has been in work for a considerable number of years, as this has, those drawbacks become manifest, and you have acquired sufficient experience to gauge their importance and to determine whether they should or not be grappled with. The expense attending ordinary Common Law actions has been very greatly increased, undoubtedly owing to the new system of procedure which has been adopted; and that is, of course, a very great evil. One matter to which I should like to call the attention of the Lord Chancellor is the large number of appeals from inferior Courts to the Divisional Courts. This is a great part of the work of the Queen's Bench Division, and a very important part. The tendency has been constantly—and I do not complain at all of it—to send more and more work to the inferior tribunals of this country, and appeals from their decisions are brought to the Queen's Bench. But those appeals are so numerous and often raise such important questions, that the Court of Appeal in such cases should certainly be of a satisfactory character; and, except in cases where there has been a further appeal, sufficient attention has not been paid to the importance of making that Court of Appeal one of a satisfactory character. At present a Divisional Court is formed on no particular principle; any two Judges available at the time may sit as an Appeal Court from the decisions of the inferior Courts—to-day these two Judges, to-morrow other two Judges—and very often matters of great importance are determined by them conclusively without appeal. I venture to suggest that this Court of Appeal from the inferior Courts ought to be a tribunal constituted for the purpose, and selected from among the Judges, with, of course, power to substitute one for another should occasion require it for this purpose; so that it should be understood to be the regular Court of Appeal from the inferior Courts, and selected of Judges whose decisions would command general satisfaction and reliance. If you were to do that, I believe you would greatly improve your judicial system; for I cannot help thinking that, while you are sending these cases more and more to the inferior Courts, it is necessary that you should have an Appeal Court that will be satisfactory. As matters stand at present, if a man has sufficient means, he may rely on getting his case thoroughly and satisfactorily tried; but I do not feel altogether the same amount of certainty in the case of a man who had not those means, and whose case may be dealt with in a different fashion. So that I think if cases are to be sent to the County Courts, it would be much more satisfactory that you should provide a really reliable Court of Appeal from those tribunals. It is not only a question of the County Courts, but there are the Justices' Courts, among others, from which the Crown cases come for determination. This work which has become important enough of late years requires to be specially dealt with. Then, with regard to the circuits, I do not think you would gain very much by the proposal to concentrate the circuit work in particular towns, when you weigh the inconvenience that would arise from witnesses having to be brought considerable distances, and the dissatisfaction that would be produced by making the trials less local, against the possibility of a few days saved in the circuit. I will not pursue the inquiry into the further questions which my noble and learned Friend has touched upon except the last, as to the creation of a Court of Appeal, which is of so important a character that I think it would be wrong for me to be silent upon it, inasmuch as I agree very much with what my noble and learned Friend has said, and have the misfortune to differ very completely from both my noble and learned Friends who followed him. I have always felt it to be utterly discreditable to our jurisprudence that we should have no Court of Appeal in criminal cases. I cannot see how, on principle, this state of things can be justified. If there is a £10 note at issue in a case, the Legislature provides abundance of appeals to secure that neither shall a jury wrongfully fix a man's liability nor the law determine wrongly against him, yet in a matter of life and death there is no such provision. If a man's liberty for the rest of his days or for a lengthened period, or even his life is at stake, the decision of the jury and the sentence of the Judge are to be regarded as absolutely conclusive. That state of things has always appeared to me to be entirely unjustifiable, and only to be excused if the evils of introducing a system of appeal were shown to be so overwhelming as to render it undesirable to do so. It seems to me the burden is on those who opposed such a proposal to show that it is practically impossible to carry it into effect. My noble and learned Friend who has just spoken said that the way in which our Home Secretaries have from time to time discharged the onerous duties resting upon them is deserving of all praise, and I quite agree with him. It is a most distasteful task that the Home Secretary in such cases has to perform, and I believe that every Home Secretary has brought to bear upon it the greatest possible pains and care to do only that which is right and just in the discharge of the onerous duties connected with the exercise of the prerogative of mercy. Nevertheless, we cannot shut our eyes to the fact that the public are taking an increasing interest in the administration of justice, particularly in criminal cases; and in a particular case recently the conduct of the Home Secretary was canvassed to an extent which never occurred before; and not only is that the case, but his determination is even felt to affect the Government of which he is a Member. It is quite conceivable that cases might arise—recent occurrences have shown, indeed, that it may actually so happen—where the position of a Government may be seriously affected by the decision of the Home Secretary in dealing with this question of prerogative in particular cases. I cannot help thinking that nothing could be more unfortunate than that that state of things should exist. The prerogative of mercy, of course, must remain in the Crown, and the intervention of the Home Secretary will have to be in some cases sought; but the unfortunate state of things which I have mentioned ought as far as possible to be remedied, and I cannot doubt that in many cases the trouble would be avoided altogether if there were a Court of Criminal Appeal. If you had some tribunal to which an appeal could legitimately be made, you would stop the kind of public agitation which now supervenes after sentence is pronounced and when the matter is brought before the Home Secretary for his consideration. Now, the objections that have been urged are: that if you were to allow this to be done, and if such a Court were in existence, you would be overwhelmed with these appeals, and your Judges would have more than they could do. That seems to me at the outset to be an objection which should not be considered for a moment. If this is a right thing to be done in the administration of justice, and if the present number of Judges is not enough for the work, then the country is bound to add sufficiently to the number of Judges to enable this important work to be done, and ought not to refuse to have right and justice done because the present number of Judges is not sufficient to compass the work. For myself, I very much doubt, however, whether the objection is not to a large extent imaginary. I doubt whether there would be anything like the number of appeals which are alleged as a reason for inducing us to refrain from making this change. I arrive at that conclusion for several reasons, and partly from analogy to civil cases. In civil matters where people might appeal there are numberless cases where they do not do so, but submit to the judgments against them, in a certain number of cases, no doubt, partly on account of the expense, but in many cases, because they feel that an appeal would be hopeless; and I believe that which operates as a deterrent from appeals in civil cases would be practically found to be sufficient in criminal cases too. I do not think, therefore, you would have, as has been said, appeals in every case. A vast number of those appeals certainly might be easily and rapidly disposed of. In another country, I have myself seen a Court of Criminal Appeal at work; and except for two or three serious appeals, where there was really a question to be argued and fought out, the majority of the cases were disposed of in a few minutes, it being seen at once that there was nothing in them at all. I believe this fear is greatly exaggerated, and it does not seem to me to be a sufficient ground for refusing to do that which I think has long been felt by many to be needed in, at all events, some cases. I feel certain that if where necessary you had the matter after the verdict of the jury again calmly argued out before a Court of Appeal, these public agitations would subside. It would be seen that the matter had been re-considered by persons who were entirely independent and unaffected by the passing influences of the moment, which may be sometimes attributed to the Judge who presided at the trial and to the jury who tried the prisoner; and you would consequently find an absence of that agitation which now is manifested in particular cases. I think, also, that you may gain these advantages without suffering the inconveniences which some apprehend and deprecate. One thing further only I would say in reference to what my noble and learned Friend has said. I agree that this Court must be a Court of Appeal; but, at the same time, I do not think there would be anything unreasonable or inconsistent with sound principle in permitting that Court of Appeal to lend its ears to any information which had been derived since the date of the trial—any further facts which could be brought to their attention—anything, in short, which might be properly considered for the purpose of showing that the judgment arrived at should not have been arrived at, or would not have been arrived at, if all the circumstances had been known. My Lords, I have thought it right, although of course it can have no practical effect, as this matter has been broached to trouble your Lordships with my views upon it; because I have long been strongly of opinion that this is one of the reforms which is most urgently needed in our administration of justice.

House adjourned at twenty-five minutes past Seven o'clock, till To-morrow, a quarter past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 17th July, 1890.

QUESTIONS

FORTIFICATIONS AT CAPE TOWN.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether an agreement was made some years ago between the Imperial Government and the Cape Government that guns should be supplied from England for the fortifications at Cape Town; if he can inform the House how many guns have been provided; and what steps are being taken to carry out the agreement on the part of the Government?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (MR. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): I beg to refer my hon. Friend to my reply of the 3rd instant to the hon. Member for Preston.

DECAPITATION OF DACOITS IN BURMA.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether his attention has been called to the following statement telegraphed from Rangoon by the Times correspondent on the 12th inst.:—

"In accordance with the promise made in Parliament peremptory instructions were issued two years ago by the Government of India forbidding the continuance of the barbarous practice of decapitating Dacoits and carrying the head through the country. This order has been openly disregarded. Two heads, each alleged to be the head of Bohkyawah, have been brought into Ayah within a fortnight. The Local Government have taken no steps to enforce these orders, or punish their subordinates for disobeying them;"

and whether he will inquire into the truth of this statement, and, if it be found true, will take such steps as may be necessary to prevent British Administration in Burmah being further disgraced by the practices described?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (SIR J. GORST, Chatham): If the statement of the Times correspondent is true, the distinct orders of the Chief Commissioner contained in a Circular of the 5th of March, 1887, have been violated. The Secretary of State will inquire into the truth of the statement.

ASSISTANT SURGEONS IN INDIA.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether, under the Circular, No. 50, of the 15th of September, 1868, which lays down strictly the procedure to be followed in the examination of Assistant Surgeons, any power is given to Dr. Hilson, the Inspector General of Civil Hospitals, Bengal, to reverse the decision of the Examining Committee, and to order further examination, as was done in the case of the three assistant surgeons who had been regularly examined in May, 1889, before Drs. Coates, Raye, Joubert, Mackenzie, and Saunders?

*SIR J. GORST: The Secretary of State thinks that the hon. Member must have been misinformed, because the examination of the two assistant surgeons referred to in the question was held, not under the Circular of the 15th of September, 1868, but under the later orders of the 13th of October, 1880. The Secretary of State will be glad to show the Papers to the hon. Member, and if he thinks them of sufficient importance to be produced they may then be laid on the Table.

NUMBER OF TROOPS IN BURMA.

MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India what is the number of troops now employed in Upper Burma; and what is their number as compared with the population in India and Upper Burma respectively?

*SIR J. GORST: The number of troops is 11,000; being '00004 of the population of India, and '0022 of the population of Burma.

SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): Is there not practically a large Municipal Army in addition to the troops?

*SIR J. GORST: In Burma, as well as in every other civilised community in the world, there are police as well as military.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: Are there not police retained independently for military purposes?

*SIR J. GORST: No, Sir; the military in Burma are military, and the police are police.

MR. SUMMERS: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India what is the total cost of the Burmese war up to date?

SIR J. GORST: The cost of the Burmese war up to date is Rx. 4,524,700.

INDIAN MERCHANTS IN THE ORANGE FREE STATE.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he is aware that a law has recently been promulgated in the Orange Free State prohibiting, after the lapse of two months, the residence and trade in such State of Indian merchants, British subjects; and whether the Government propose to take any action in the matter?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de Worms, Liverpool, East Toxteth): Perhaps I may be allowed to answer this question. I have heard that a law has been passed in the Orange Free State prohibiting residence, except by permission, and prohibiting the acquisition of fixed property there in the case of all Asiatic races, other than Cape Malays, but I have not heard that it has been promulgated. The period of grace in the draft law was 12, and not two months. The High Commissioner, acting under instructions from the High Commissioner, has made, and is making, representations to the Orange Free State Government against the provisions of the law.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: I received a telegram late last night signed "Shepstone," from Durban, stating that a law was promulgated on the 15th prohibiting trade and residence of Indian merchants which is to take effect in two months. That is my only ground for putting the question.

KING'S CROSS BRANCH POST OFFICE.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether any complaints have reached him with reference to the alleged unsanitary or unhealthy condition of the King's Cross Branch Office, Caledonian Road; and whether, in view of the fact that it has been closed twice owing to the prevalence of fever, and that there is rarely a full staff of clerks owing to absence by reason of illness, the Post Office Authorities will inquire into the matter?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): The King's Cross Branch Post Office was closed in 1881 and 1887 in consequence of the children of the tenants of the upper floors, and of the caretaker respectively, having scarlet fever. In neither case was there any reason to think that the disease was caught in the house. The premises have been specially examined by the Chief Medical Officer to the Department, who reports the sanitary condition to be very fair. The rate of sick absence among the staff has not been above the average. There is at present one clerk absent with typhoid fever, but the cause is not attributed to any defects in the office.

ADMIRAL FREEMANTLE.

MR. GOURLEY (Sunderland): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if he can explain how it happened that Admiral Freemantle, during the recent Anglo-German Blockade on the coast of Africa, hired a small steamer called the Somali, at a cost of £25 per day, costing for about nine months' hire a total sum of £5,000, although he could have purchased the vessel when he chartered her for £4,000; and whether it is true that he has again chartered the vessel for a further period of 12 months at £20 per day, or a total sum of £7,300?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): The facts of the case are as follows:—The Somali fully found and equipped was hired at £25 a day from May to October, 1889, and then for three months further to the end of January, 1890, at the reduced rate of £12 10s. a day. On the termination of this period it was found necessary to charter her for 12 months further at an increased rate of £20 a day, the owners having represented that the rate of £12 10s. a day had been accepted under the impression that the Admiralty would purchase the vessel at the end of the first 12 months. The charter up to January 31 cost £5,275, and the second charter, if continued for the full 12 months, will cost £7,300. I am not aware that there was any possibility of purchasing the Somali for £4,000. The first charter included an option to purchase the vessel after 12 months' hire for £12,000.

RUNCORN POOR LAW GUARDIANS.

MR. BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been called to irregularities in connection with the last election of Guardians of the poor for the township of Runcorn; whether he is aware that a considerable number of qualified electors received no voting papers; that many mistakes in the distribution and collection of voting papers occurred owing to the fact that the numbers of the houses in any street were not entered on the papers; and that the persons employed by the Returning Officer to assist in the counting of the voting papers were two of his own sons and the Workhouse Master, who had been for many years his own clerk; whether the irregularities affected the result of the election; and whether the Local Government Board made inquiry into the conduct of the election so as to fix the responsibility for and prevent the recurrence of such irregularities?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I have received complaints as to irregularities in connection with the last election of Guardians for the township of Runcorn. At the election five Guardians were to be elected, and there were nine candidates. I am not able to give the precise number of persons who were entitled to vote in the election, but it must have been very large, as one candidate received as many as 946 votes. In communications which I have received from one of the candidates it is alleged that in 37 cases there was a failure either to distribute or to collect voting papers. I have made inquiry as to each of these cases, and find that in some of them a satisfactory explanation has been given. For instance, there are cases where persons had left the house in respect of which they were assessed prior to the election. In others the collectors were unable to obtain an answer when they called with the voting papers. There are other cases in which mistakes have occurred through inadvertence in preparing the voting papers or otherwise. It is, however, to be observed that in the public notice which is given of the election the attention of the electors is distinctly called to the fact that if any voter fails to receive a voting paper on the day of the distribution, or if any voting paper is not collected through the default of the Returning Officer, or any person employed to collect the voting papers, the voter is entitled to attend at the place fixed by the Returning Officer, and there personally hand in a voting paper filled up by him. I learn from the Returning Officer that in one case a messenger, who asked for voting papers for certain electors, was informed that if the electors wished to vote it would be necessary that they should attend before the Returning Officer for the purpose. In none of the cases, however, did the elector avail himself of this right. It is impossible for me to say whether the result of the election would have been affected if the persons in the cases referred to had availed themselves of the right to which I have alluded. I have no definite information as to whether or not the sons of the Returning Officer and the Workhouse Master assisted the Returning Officer in counting the votes, but the officer was entitled to have assistance in this duty, and it does not appear to me that there was any objection to the employment of these persons. It is a matter for regret that irregularity should have occurred in any of these cases, but I am not satisfied that there was any wilful neglect, and after full consideration the Local Government Board arrived at the conclusion that the circumstances were not such as to require that the heavy expense of a new election should be incurred.

PARISH BOUNDARIES IN SCOTLAND.

MR. CRAWFORD (Lanark, N.E.): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether he is aware that doubts have arisen as to the powers of the Boundary Commissioners under "The Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889," to alter the boundaries of parishes; and whether he would have any objection to state, for the satisfaction of Local Authorities, to whom litigation would be a serious matter, whether the Commissioners have any power to detach a portion of a parish lying entirely in one county for the purpose of connecting the detached portions of another parish, also wholly in the same county?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): From information which the hon. and learned Gentleman was good enough to give me, I find that this question is specifically before the Boundary Commissioners at the present time. He will, therefore, not misunderstand me if I say that I do not think I can, with propriety, express an opinion on the subject.

PAUPER ALIENS.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if his attention has been directed to the letter of Mr. Arnold White in the Times of 15th July (page 5), upon "The Invasion of Pauper Aliens"; and whether the aliens arriving by 128 ships out of 261 have not been subjected to the statistical control now being exercised; and, in such case, if he will take steps to ensure that Parliament shall be made fully conversant with the extent to which foreign labour is brought to this country to compete with national labour?

MR. BRUNNER: Before the right hon. Gentleman answers the question, may I ask if he will be good enough to ascertain and inform the House to what extent Englishmen go to foreign countries and compete with native labour?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): I have no doubt that that occurs to a large extent, but it scarcely seems to bear upon the question upon the Paper, and I am afraid it would not be possible to obtain statistics. My answer to the question is in the affirmative. My attention has been directed to the letter referred to by the hon. Member. The Returns of aliens arriving by the 128 ships to which my hon. Friend refers were not subjected to the same statistical control as is now exercised over such Returns, because the ships arrived before the new arrangements of which I have already informed the House were put in force.

Mr. Ritchie

COLONIAL DEFENCES.

MR. JAMES MACLEAN (Oldham): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he will lay upon the Table of the House the following Papers relating to an increase in the Military contribution proposed to be levied on the Straits Settlements, namely, the Despatch from the Colonial Office of the 13th December, 1889, to the Governor of the Straits Settlements containing the demand of Her Majesty's Government for an increased Military contribution; the Proceedings of the Legislative Council of the Straits Settlements in connection with that Despatch; the Governor's Despatch forwarding the Proceedings of the Legislative Council to the Secretary of State for the Colonies; together with any other Papers bearing on the subject which are already in hand, so that the House may have an opportunity of forming a judgment on the proposed action in this matter?

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: I have also to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether Her Majesty's Government are at present endeavouring to arrange for a more adequate contribution for military defence from those Colonies which are garrisoned by Her Majesty's troops borne on the British Estimates; whether such contribution is required from colonies with a good revenue, which have hitherto paid little or nothing, as well as from those which have hitherto made considerable contributions; whether the rich Colony of Ceylon is resisting the demand made upon it; whether Her Majesty's Government propose to insist on a demand put to this country in the case of Ceylon, Natal, and other colonies which have hitherto contributed too little; and whether the representatives of the taxpayers of the British Colonies will be given an opportunity of expressing an opinion as well as the Colonies?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: In reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, I am afraid I cannot add anything to the answer which I gave on the 19th ult. to a similar question from my hon. Friend the Member for Greenock. As regards the question put by the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy, Her Majesty's Government have given much consideration to this subject, and have determined that the military contributions of the colonies must be increased where such contributions are inadequate. No demand, except for the present year, has yet been made upon Ceylon or Mauritius, the amount to be claimed being under discussion. No question has been raised as to Natal. An increased contribution has been demanded from the Straits Settlements and Hong Kong.

THE RIVER CLWYD.

MR. J. ROBERTS (Flint, &c.): I had intended to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that Major Rowley Conway, who is a member of the Board of Conservators of the Rivers Clwyd and Elwy, has caused large stones to be placed in that part of the River Clwyd known as the Junction Pool, which is admittedly tidal and navigable, so as to prevent the netting of it by licensed fishermen; whether he is aware that criminal proceedings have twice been taken, by him against the fishermen for netting, and that on both occasions the Justices considered their jurisdiction to be ousted by a bond fide claim of right; and whether the Board of Trade will, in the interests of the navigation of the river and of the fishermen, take steps to cause these stones to be removed? At the request of the right hon. Gentleman I beg to postpone the question.

FLASHING SIGNALS—ADMIRAL COLOMB'S INVENTION.

MR. KIMBER (Wandsworth): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether the £1,000 stated to have been paid to Admiral Colomb was made up of £750 from the Admiralty, and £250 from the War Office; whether of the £750 paid by the Admiralty, £500 was paid in January, 1868, in recognition of his services in perfecting the plans of flashing signals for use in Her Majesty's ships; whether the remaining £250 was paid by the Admiralty in 1871, in respect of signals for joint Naval and Military use; whether the £250 paid by the War Office in January, 1871, was on account of signal arrangements for land service only; and what was the total cost incurred for the purchase of Admiral Colomb's signal apparatus supplied to the whole of Her Majesty's ships during the period the supply of the signal apparatus to Her Majesty's Fleet was left in Admiral Colomb's hands, namely, from 1864 to 1888, and what percentage of such total cost do the Admiralty estimate Admiral Colomb's profits to have been?

*LORD G. HAMILTON: The £1,000 was made up of two distinct sums of £500 each. The first £500 was on account of the service to the Navy alone. The second £500 was on account of services in perfecting the system of signalling between the Army and Navy, and was charged in equal portions between Army and Navy funds. The terms of the receipts given by Admiral Colomb were respectively—

"In full discharge of all claims connected with the introduction into Her Majesty's ships of his plan of flashing signals, and expenses attendant thereon:"

"In discharge of all claims on Her Majesty's Government on account of signal arrangements for land service, and in respect of a code of signals for joint Naval and Military use."

The total cost of the apparatus purchased by the Admiralty from Admiral Colomb between 1864 and 1888 cannot be definitely stated without a close scrutiny of the old Admiralty ledgers, but the value of the orders given between 1879-80 and 1888-9 amounted to about £6,000. As Admiral Colomb made his own arrangements with the firms who manufactured the apparatus the Admiralty are not in a position to state what profits he may have actually made on his contracts with the Government.

THE HOUSE DUTY.

MR. STOREY (Sunderland): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether it was intended by the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, recently passed, to exempt from House Duty houses with one front door yet with two or more tenements each of less than £20 per annum; and, if so, will he explain why the Somerset House officials and certain Inland Revenue officials in the country state that such houses are not included in the exemption; and whether, as this rendering of the Act would deprive of exemption many thousands of owners of such houses, he will give instructions securing to them what the House intended?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): Houses such as those described by the hon. Member would be exempt from House Duty, irrespective of the question whether they have one or more front doors, if they fall within the conditions laid down in Sub-section 2 of Section 26 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1890, namely, that they are constructed for the sole purpose of providing separate dwellings at rents not exceeding 7s. 6d. a week and are approved by the Medical Officer of Health. No such statement as that ascribed to the Inland Revenue officials has been made with the sanction of the Board of Inland Revenue; but the Act has, of course, no retrospective effect, and several applications as regards the year 1889-90 have been refused as not being within the Treasury concession then in force.

THE NAVAL MANŒUVRES.

MR. GOURLEY: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty about what time he intends holding the forthcoming Naval Manœuvres; how many and what type of ships are to be mobilised, and whether it is correct that the date has been postponed owing to many of the vessels having to be longer under repair than anticipated; and whether, with the large addition to the Navy of ocean cruisers, he will consent to extend the scope of the experimental operations to the protection of the leading food and cotton ocean routes, notifying to commanders of British shipping that they will be expected to avoid, as far as practicable, nominal capture by hostile experimental cruisers?

LORD G. HAMILTON: The date of mobilisation will not be communicated to the ports until the last moment. It has not been postponed on account of the unpreparedness of the vessels for commission. Fifty-six ships and 24 torpedo boats will be employed during the manœuvres, comprising 18 battle ships, four belted cruisers, five armoured coast defence ships, 19 unarmoured cruisers, one torpedo depôt ship, and nine small craft, besides torpedo boats. The proposal contained in the last part of the question is not practicable.

LETTERS FROM EDINBURGH TO THURSO.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he can explain why it is that letters from Edinburgh to Thurso, a distance of over 300 miles, are carried in about 13 hours, while from Thurso to Reay, a distance of 11 miles further, they take an additional 15 hours; whether he is aware that coaches run every day from Thurso to Reay; and whether something can be done to accelerate the delivery of letters in this district?

MR. RAIKES: The passenger car for Reay, which carries the mails, leaves Thurso in the morning and returns the same day. Hence, letters for Reay arriving overnight are necessarily detained until the next morning. The coach referred to could not be made available—the hour at which it runs being unsuitable for mail purposes. On the whole, the present arrangements seem best calculated to meet the requirements of the locality.

THE WINTER SESSION.

MR. BECKETT (York, N.R., Whitby): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether, in view of the House sitting hereafter through the greater part of the winter months, he will consider the desirability of providing some protection from the weather in Palace Yard for Members alighting at or departing from the House; and whether he will instruct an architect to prepare perspective drawings of what might be done, and have them exhibited in the House before the prorogation, so as to admit of the other 669 Members of the House, whose comfort and health may be affected, expressing their opinion with regard to it; and, if he will not do this latter, whether there is any objection to a private Member doing it?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. PLUNKET, Dublin University): A few years ago we did provide in the Star Chamber Court a shelter for Members alighting at and departing from the House of Commons. I do not know whether my hon. Friend has used this shelter, but I believe the other 669 Members mentioned in my hon. Friend's question do avail themselves of it. I do not myself think that it would be well to risk disfiguring the front of Westminster Hall by erecting any further shelter in Palace Yard; but if my hon. Friend or any other Member desires to have such a perspective drawing as is suggested in the question prepared at his own expense, I do not suppose there would be any objection to its being exhibited in the Tea Room.

MR. LEA (Londonderry, S.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if the Standing Order, which gives precedence to private Members' Bills, passed through the greatest number of stages after Whitsuntide, will be altered to suit the new condition of things caused by the earlier meeting of Parliament?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I think the proposal of the hon. Member one well worthy of consideration, and I will undertake that it shall be considered.

EXCESSIVE SENTENCE.

MR. PHILIPPS (Lanark, Mid): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether it is the case that the men sentenced by Sheriff Balfour to £5 fine or 14 days' imprisonment for killing a rabbit were unable to pay the fine, and have been in prison since 12th July; and whether the Secretary for Scotland has yet been able to obtain their release?

*MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: The two men referred to failed to pay the fine imposed within the time allowed by the Sheriff. One surrendered himself on Saturday, July 12, and is now in prison, the other has not yet been found. The Secretary for Scotland has inquired into the case, and sees no reason for interfering with the sentence of the Court. The offence was not, as stated in the question, the killing one rabbit, although one rabbit was killed. The accused were found guilty of night poaching, which, by Statute, is severely punishable, not on account of the game destroyed, but from serious dangers to the peace and to life which attend such night expeditions. In the case referred to the circumstances were not favourable, and some violence was used. The penalties imposed were largely within the statutory limits.

PROHIBITION OF PUBLIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

MR. PHILIPPS: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether he is aware that public meetings are held at Wishaw Cross every week of the year, even on Saturdays and Sundays, and that no meeting there was ever prohibited by the Magistrates till the anti-compensation meeting was advertised to be held; and whether he can now state under what Statute the Wishaw Magistrates have power to "prohibit" a meeting "either at the Cross, or on or adjacent to the public streets of the burghs"?

*MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: I am not aware whether the statements in the first paragraph of the question are correct. I answered the whole of the last paragraph on Monday.

BEHRING SEA FISHERIES.

MR. GOURLEY: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he has seen a cable message transmitted from New York, by Reuter, to the Globe newspaper, and dated 16th July, stating that President Harrison, in reply to a Despatch from Lord Salisbury relative to the Behring Sea Seal Fishery negotiations, had stated that he thought it the duty of the United States, under the Act of Congress, to go on dealing summarily with British sealers; if so, will he state whether the message is correct, and the reply of Lord Salisbury; and whether the two Governments have yet arranged a close time for the capture of seals, and when Despatches down to date will be in the hands of Members?

SIR J. GORST: I have been requested by my right hon. Friend to answer the question. Her Majesty's Government have received no Report of such a statement having been made by President Harrison. The negotiations have not yet been brought to a close. Papers are being prepared as rapidly as possible.

THE INSUBORDINATION OF THE GRENADIER GUARDS.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he will state the result of the inquiry into the causes of the recent act of insubordination in the 2nd Battalion of the Grenadier Guards?

MR. E. STANHOPE: No, Sir; in the interest of the Service I must decline to make public the result of the inquiry which has been held.

MR. PICKERSGILL: Is there any statement in the finding of the Court with respect to the allegation that these men have for the last three months been subjected to excessive and oppressive duties?

MR. E. STANHOPE: From the answer I have already given, the hon. Member will see that I cannot say more.

MR. PICKERSGILL: Is there not a long series of precedents justifying such questions as that which stands in my name on the Paper?

MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): What particular officer is responsible for the fact that so important an event as that referred to in the hon. Member's question had not been brought to the notice of the Minister for War at 3 o'clock in the afternoon?

MR. E. STANHOPE: As I have already explained, the Military Authorities were inquiring into the matter during the day. I was busily engaged myself, and so they did not inform me of the circumstances before I was obliged to come down to the House.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: Is it true that the Grenadier Guards are to be ordered on foreign service?

MR. E. STANHOPE: I have no answer whatever to give on that subject.

CHATHAM DOCKYARD.

MR. EDWARD KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Rochester): I had intended to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether any great amount of extra time has recently been worked in the Clerical Department of Her Majesty's Dockyard, Chatham; whether the regulations provide that, when continuous overtime is thus being worked, the Admiralty should be informed, with a view to steps being taken to remove such strain upon the staff; and whether, in this instance, such information has been received? but, at the request of the hon. Gentleman, I will postpone the question.

AGRICULTURAL TENANTS.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I beg to ask the Attorney General whether he is aware that many resolutions have been passed by Farmers' Clubs and Chambers of Agriculture in support of the principle that the tenant of an agricultural holding under mortgage should have the same right of claiming compensation from a foreclosing mortgagee as from his original landlord, the mortgagor; whether he is aware that the Chester Farmers' Club unanimously passed a resolution in favour of the honourable and gallant Member for the Wirral Division's (Colonel Cotton's) Tenants Compensation Bill, with the addition of the Amendments of the honourable Member for East Northampton (Mr. Channing), to extend the protection in case of mortgaged farms to rights to compensation under the "custom of the country" and for crops; whether his attention has been given to the Amendments put on the Paper in pursuance of an understanding arrived at between both sides of the House at the Second Reading of the Bill to carry out these objects; and whether, having regard to the period of the Session, and to the large number of agricultural tenants of mortgaged holdings, who need this protection, he will either place these Amendments on the Order Paper without delay, or accept the Amendments now standing in the name of the honourable Member for East Northampton?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): I am informed that considerable interest is felt in the matter referred to by the question of the hon. Member, though the circumstances out of which the matter arose are very exceptional. The question has received the most careful consideration of my right hon. Friend the Minister for Agriculture and of myself, but having regard to the difficulties which surround it, I doubt whether it will be possible to carry through satisfactory legislation during the present Session, but the matter is more for the Minister of Agriculture than for me.

*MR. CHANNING: The hon. and learned Gentleman is aware of the arrangement come to some time ago as to these Amendments. Are we to understand now that Her Majesty's Government are going to offer no aid in passing a Bill giving a protection urgently needed by many tenant farmers?

*SIR R. WEBSTER: The hon. Gentleman is to understand nothing of the kind, but owing to the numerous suggestions which have been made by a variety of people it has not been found possible to deal with the question hitherto.

*MR. CHANNING: Will it be dealt with this Session?

*SIR R. WEBSTER: The hon. Gentleman had better address that question to the Minister of Agriculture.

*MR. CHANNING: Then I will ask the Minister of Agriculture if he intends to have the Amendments put on the Paper in time to enable the Bill to be dealt with this Session?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): I do not know what the Amendments are which the hon. Gentleman refers to.

*MR. CHANNING: I refer to the Amendments drawn up by the Attorney General and agreed to between the promoters of the Bill and myself with the cognizance of the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. CHAPLIN: At present I have no information to give.

THE ANGLO-GERMAN AGREEMENT.

MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether his attention has been called to the misdescription of the German Emperor as the Emperor of Germany in the Queen's Speech of the present Session, in the Schedule to the Anglo-German Agreement Confirmation Bill, and in the English version of the Anglo-German Agreement; and whether he will take steps to prevent such misdescription from recurring in English official documents?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The description given in the Anglo-German Agreement was desired by the German Foreign Office, but it is probable that the title of German Emperor will hereafter be used in this country.

"HANSARDS DEBATES."

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he is aware that no questions addressed to Ministers are reported in Hansard unless Ministers send their answers in manuscript to the Hansard room; and whether arrangements will be made either to have all answers sent in manuscript to be reported, or to have the answers to questions, which are often very important, reported otherwise?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I believe that the facts stated by the hon. Member are practically correct, but I cannot admit that Ministers are bound to send copies of their answers to the Reporters' Gallery; indeed, it would often be impossible to do so, many of the answers given being unwritten, and there being, therefore, no copies to send. I am strongly of opinion that the reporting of all questions and answers is essential to a proper official record of the proceedings of this House, and Hansard have always shown themselves so willing to meet the requirements of Parliament that I am sure, now their attention has been drawn to the matter, there will be no further cause for complaint.

ANGLO-TUNISIAN TREATY OF COMMERCE.

MR. SUMMERS: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he will undertake that the British Chambers of Commerce shall be consulted before the assent of the Government is given to any modification or surrender of the commercial privileges which we enjoy under the Anglo-Tunisian Treaty of Commerce of 19th July, 1875?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: If it should become necessary, under the provisions of the Treaty in question, to enter into negotiations for any change in the existing arrangements, the Government will, of course, take all necessary steps to provide themselves with requisite information as to the interests affected.

HELIGOLAND.

MR. SUMMERS: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury when the Papers relating to Heligoland that were promised on 24th June will be laid upon the Table of the House?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Copies of the Capitulations respecting Heligoland will be laid on the Table and probably distributed on Saturday. We have not at present any other Papers that can be laid before the House.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether Her Majesty's Government will be in a position to make, before the Second Reading of the Bill for the Cession of Heligoland, a statement regarding the negotiations which Lord Salisbury has stated to be now pending between this country and France on the subject of Zanzibar?

MR. HANBURY (Preston): When will the Bill be taken?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Probably on Thursday. I have already answered the question of the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Bryce). The negotiations between the two Governments are proceeding in a perfectly friendly spirit on both sides, and while I cannot now undertake that any statement shall be made with regard to them on the Second Reading of the Bill, Her Majesty's Government will gladly give any information which it may be in their power to afford without detriment to public interests.

IRISH RESIDENT MAGISTRATES.

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what are the names of the Resident Magistrates appointed since 1st October, 1886?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The names of the Resident Magistrates appointed since 1st October, 1886, are as follows:—Mr. N. L. Townsend, Mr. J. Preston, Mr. O'N. Segrave (since resigned), Mr. C. Roche, Mr. U. Bourke, Lieutenant-Colonel M. S. Tynte, Mr. F. G. Hodder, Colonel H. Caddell, Mr. W. H. Joyce, Mr. G. Shannon, Mr. E. F. Hickson, Mr. J. McLean, Mr. H. Bruen, and Mr. G. B. Butler.

MR. J. E. ELLIS: How many in all?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Fourteen.

MR. J. E. ELLIS: How many have been retired?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: None have been retired.

Mr. Summers

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): Did not Captain Segrave resign?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes; that was so.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): Do I understand the right hon. Gentleman to say that no members of the staff have been retired?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have not asked for that information, but I will procure it.

THE GAELIC ATHLETIC ASSOCIATION.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether officials of the National Board of Education object to teachers being members of the Gaelic Athletic Association; and what is the rule on this subject?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Commissioners of National Education report that teachers are not prohibited from being members of the Gaelic Athletic Association, unless by reason of such membership they take part in politics, in which event the rules which prohibit the attendance of a teacher at meetings held for political purposes would be violated.

BAIL PRISONERS.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether Mr. Patrick Staunton, having appealed from the decision of a Court held at Castlemartyr, County Cork, on the 24th February last, had his sentence increased by one month by Mr. J. Hamilton, the Cork Recorder; and whether the extra month imposed by Mr. Hamilton was given subsequent to the confirmation of the original sentence, for alleged contempt of Court; and, if so, whether Mr. Staunton will be treated during the additional period of imprisonment as a bail prisoner?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN, Dublin University): I must ask the hon. Member to postpone the question until Monday.

THE CORK UNION.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland if he can explain why the Local Government Board have refused to sanction the bonus of £50 granted by the paid Guardians in the Cork Union to Mr. Cotter, the assistant clerk to the Union; whether he is aware that Mr. Cotter had for some months past a considerable amount of extra work thrown on him, which he performed to the complete satisfaction of everybody; and what are the reasons for refusing the bonus?

MR. MADDEN: The Local Government Board, having considered the amount of extra work thrown upon the assistant clerk by reason of the illness of the clerk of the Union, were of opinion that the merits of the case would be met by the award of a gratuity of £40 instead of the £50 proposed. They accordingly sanctioned payment of the former sum.

LICENSING IN IRELAND.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will inquire what foundation there is for the suggestion that the refusal of the Lurgan Bench of Magistrates to renew the licence of Mr. Patrick Blayney, after 70 years' uninterrupted user, was grounded on the "unsuitability of the premises;" did the police oppose the application; whether he is aware that the house is one of the largest and most respectable in Lurgan, situated in the centre of the town, being three storey, slated premises, with a frontage of 30 feet, a capacious rear and yard, stabling for 30 horses, and an acre of ground attached, all held in fee-simple; and if these facts are substantially accurate, do the Government intend to persist with the Licensing Clauses of the Local Taxation (Customs and Excise) Duties Bill, which would prevent for ever the possibility of Mr. Blayney's licence being renewed because, by a majority of one, a Bench exclusively Protestant held them "unsuitable"?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am informed that the foundation for the statement as to the ground upon which the Magistrates refused the application for a transfer of the licence in question is the fact that that ground was publicly announced in Court. The police did give notice to oppose the transfer on the same ground, but as some structural alterations were subsequently made they left the question as to the sufficiency of these alterations to the Magistrates. The house is not one of the largest and most respectable in Lurgan. It is represented to be a small, low, three storey house. It has not a frontage of 30 feet. Its total frontage including the doorway is only 13 feet. There is an adjoining open gateway into which an objectionable side-door opens. The open gateway and yard at rear are common to all the tenants. It had not stabling for 30 horses. On the contrary, it had no stabling accommodation available heretofore, but stabling, it is stated, has now been provided to a small extent. The ground referred to as being attached consists of an open unfenced potato garden situated at a considerable distance from the house, and approached by a mere right of way. The statements in the question, therefore, do not appear to be substantially accurate.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Do the Government intend to go on with legislation at present, which will have the effect of preventing a man who has been improperly deprived of his licence from ever obtaining a chance of a renewal?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: As that is a question which relates to the construction of the Bill, I think it ought to be put to my right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Treasury.

MR. T. M. HEALY: The opposition of the hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell) has practically compelled me to withdraw my Bill, and if the Government persist in their licensing proposals in reference to Ireland without affording an opportunity for renewal to a man who has been deprived of a licence upon special grounds, I shall certainly oppose them as strenuously as I can.

POLICE "SHADOWING."

MR. FLYNN: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether his attention has been called to the reports in the Cork papers, from which it appears that two brothers, Edmond and David Kent, were at Fermoy fair on 6th instant, engaged in selling some lambs, when a constable came and "shadowed" David Kent for a considerable time; that this man, David Kent, then went and stood beside District Inspector Ball, and followed the Inspector about the fair, he himself being followed meanwhile by the constable; that District Inspector Ball spoke to Mr. Kent, and said, "If you persist in following me I will have you arrested;" and that Kent replied that he had been prevented from doing his business by the Constable shadowing him, and that if the Inspector withdrew the constable he would not follow the Inspector; if it is true, as reported, that the Inspector thereupon ordered the shadowing constable to arrest Mr. Kent, who was kept in custody from 9 a.m. until 3.30, and then summoned; and whether he can state under what authority was Mr. Kent arrested, and why was he shadowed in the manner described?

MR. MADDEN: The Constabulary Authorities report that David Kent was not shadowed, or in any way interfered with, while engaged with his brother in selling lambs. But, upon his subsequently leaving the place where the lambs were and proceeding through the fair, his movements were watched, as the police had reason to believe, from previous actions of the man, that he would endeavour to prevent the sale of some lambs belonging to a person boycotted for taking an evicted farm, and in connection with whose boycotting David Kent had, on a former occasion, been convicted. The District Inspectors did, after warning Kent twice, order his arrest, his conduct being such as to interfere with the officer in the discharge of his duty. He was detained in custody until the arrival of the Resident Magistrate, who was at once telegraphed for, and who remanded him on bail. The case has since been heard in Court, and it appears that Kent was discharged on giving an undertaking not to so offend again.

MR. SEXTON: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware of the fact that the constable prevented the sale of the lambs, and that the Magistrate declared the course he took to be highly improper? The buyer went up while the bargain was being made, and the buyer walked away, thus producing the very effect which the Chief Secretary so strongly condemns, of preventing a man from earning his living.

MR. MADDEN: Those alleged facts are not before me.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): May I ask why, if it was illegal for David Kent to follow Mr. Ball, it was legal for the constable to follow David Kent; also under what law, common, statute, or otherwise, is it legal for a constable in plain clothes to dog and tread on the heels of any man while the man himself may not follow the constable's superior officer?

MR. MADDEN: I gave a very full answer to that question some days ago. In my opinion the following a constable in plain clothes, who is performing detective duty, from place to place, and pointing him out as a constable, may be carried to such an extent as to amount to the offence of obstructing that constable in the performance of his duty.

MR. DILLON: There is no question in this case of a constable in plain clothes. The man followed a constable in uniform.

MR. MADDEN: No.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I wish to point out that the Government are obliged by statute to take down the evidence in writing when the case is heard. Is the right hon. Gentleman giving an account of what took place from his own speculations or has he the depositions before him?

MR. MADDEN: No, Sir; I am not giving my own speculations, but I have answered from the best information I could obtain. There has been no time to get the depositions.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Then the right hon. Gentleman has given an answer of a purely speculative character, without knowing what the evidence was?

MR. MADDEN: No, Sir. I stated that I had before me a Report of what occurred in Court. I stated also that I had not seen the depositions. If the hon. Gentleman wishes to pursue the matter further he had better put down a question.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I fail to see what time is required to obtain a copy of the depositions. The Petty Sessions clerk could copy them out in 10 minutes [Cries of "Order!"] Hon. Gentlemen seem to think I know nothing about my daily work. The right hon. Gentleman ought to have made his statement from the sworn evidence.

MR. MADDEN: I have stated that the Court only discharged Kent on his undertaking not to offend again. That was an admission on his part that an offence had been committed. I do not know what the entry in the book was, but I will inquire.

MR. T. M. HEALY: The matter will come up in Supply to-night, and the Irish Members expect to gather information upon it from the answer to the question.

MR. W. O'BRIEN (Cork, N.E.): May I ask the Attorney General whether all the information he has given to the House upon the subject is not derived from District Inspector Ball, and whether that officer is not a man against whom a Coroner's Jury returned a verdict of wilful murder?

MR. MADDEN: I have no information from Inspector Ball.

MR. DILLON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether Dr. J. F. Gibbon, an American gentleman travelling in Ireland, was shadowed by the police, when visiting the town of Tipperary, on 12th July; whether the police constables persisted in listening whenever he conversed with friends in the street; and for what reason Dr. Gibbon was so beset?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am informed that the gentleman referred to was not shadowed. It appears that he spoke to Cullinane, who was shadowed, and it may be that upon that foundation he formed the erroneous impression that he was shadowed himself.

MR. ROCHE (Galway, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that Mr. Thomas Hayes, of Portumna, on leaving his house on Sunday the 11th of May, to attend evening service, was shadowed by Constable Murphy, who, when Mr. Hayes met two of his friends and stood to speak to them, stepped in between the three men, and ordered Mr. Hayes who was smoking at the time, to stop doing so; that, upon Mr. Hayes' refusal to obey the order, and telling the constable that if he did not like the smoke he could easily get rid of it by walking away, he was arrested, brought to the barrack, searched, and £87 found in his pocket; that, although Mr. Hayes told the police he had sent on 15 cattle to the fair of Woodford, which was to be held on the following day, and requested that he should be brought before a Magistrate that evening, or early in the morning, so as to allow him to attend to the sale of his cattle, his request was refused, and he was kept in custody until 12 o'clock noon on Monday, and lost the sale of his cattle; whether Constable Murphy is the same man against whom both Mr. Fahy and Mr. Morrissey obtained decrees for £5 and £2 at last Quarter Sessions, held at Gort, for false arrest; can he explain how it happened that, although Mr. Hayes was arrested on the 11th of May, the matter was allowed to drop until Fahy and Morrissey had obtained decrees against the constable; whether he has seen that it was proved at the trial that the constable had taken several pints of porter before he arrested Mr. Hayes, and that, after a full hearing, the case was dismissed; and, if so, what compensation is Mr. Hayes to get; and what action he proposes to take in reference to the constable?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I must ask the hon. Gentleman to defer the question until Monday. I have not yet received information upon it.

VICE GUARDIANS.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what Irish Poor Law Unions were administered by Vice Guardians during the years 1886, 1887, 1888, and 1889, or any of those years?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Unions administered by Vice Guardians during the years 1886, 1887, 1888, 1889, have been as follows:—New Ross, Belmullet, Swineford, Ballinasloe, Athy, Dungarvan, Ballyvaughan, Portumna, and Cork.

BEER AND SPIRIT DUTIES.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he can now communicate to the House the information obtained in his further inquiry as to the incidence of the Beer and Spirit Duties, and whether he intends to present a Supplementary Estimate; whether he proposes to transfer this Session, as contemplated by the Land Purchase Bill, the charge of £5,000 for improving the breed of horses and cattle in Ireland from the Irish Local Taxation Account of the Estimates; and whether he intends to legislate this Session to secure to Ireland in the present financial year the Exchequer contribution of £40,000 to which she is entitled?

MR. GOSCHEN: With regard to the first question—namely, as to the incidence of the Beer Duty—the inquiries which I have made result in a remarkable agreement with the figures on page 4 of the Return of May 7 last. That Return gave the duty on beer exported from Ireland to England in 1888-9 as £190,000. The actual figures for 1889-90 have now been carefully examined and taken from the bills of entry for the Port of Dublin. The value of the duty paid on beer exported from England to Ireland is, as near as possible, £190,000. With regard to the duty on beer exported from England to Ireland I have learned nothing to show that the figure of £35,000 was under the mark. Here is the difficulty—that there are neither official nor commercial Returns, as the exports from English ports to Irish ports are not entered or tabulated by the Customs. I am still making inquiries, but it seems that the amount of beer sent to Ireland from England is not likely to be larger than, and is possibly inferior to, the amount given in the Return in question. Regarding foreign spirits no record was previously kept of the parts of the United Kingdom where they were consumed, but a system has now been established for following them up similar to that pursued in the case of home spirits. The few weeks during which it has been in operation show no ground for believing that the calculations in the Return of May 7 were incorrect, but the time is too short to afford any really fresh knowledge. So far, then, as my investigation has proceeded there is nothing to change the figures submitted last May, so that there is no question of Supplementary Estimate at present. I do not propose to legislate this Session for the transfer of the charge of £5,000 for improving the breed of horses and cattle in Ireland from the Irish Local Taxation Account to the Estimates. There is no reason for doing so till the Land Purchase Bill is passed. With regard to the last question, legislation will not be necessary to secure to Ireland the contribution of £40,000 referred to by the hon. Member, but he may take it as certain that I will introduce a Supplementary Estimate to secure this sum to Ireland during the present financial year.

DEATH IN A LUNATIC ASYLUM.

MR. W. CORBET (Wicklow, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Inspectors of Lunatics have made any report on any death of Christopher O'Connor in the Richmond District Lunatic Asylum; and, if so, what is its purport?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Inspectors of Lunatic Asylums report that they have addressed the Board of Governors of the Richmond Asylum on the subject of O'Connor's death, who have appointed a special meeting, on the 22nd instant, for the purpose of further investigating the matter.

MR. M. WELD O'CONNOR.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the report of the Judgment of Mr. Justice Monroe, re "King's Estate," in the Dublin papers of 4th July, dismissing Mr. Matthew Weld O'Connor from the Receivership, and commenting strongly on his conduct in allowing four tenants to be sued for £27 2s., rents they had already paid, and surcharging him therewith, and with other sums, amounting to £181 13s., "verified" by Mr. O'Connor to have been spent on police huts and emergency men; whether Mr. O'Connor is a Magistrate for the three counties of Longford, Cavan, and Meath, and will be retained in the Commission of the Peace; whether he has observed that Judge Monroe also condemned the conduct of an under agent, named Francis Cooke, of whom his Lordship remarked that his form of receipt was "a curiosity," but "Did not feel at liberty in holding on mere suspicion that Cooke had been guilty of perjury and fraud;"

whether Cooke is barony cess collector, process server, and summons server in Longford or Leitrim; will Government take any steps to have him removed from these positions; will a secret inquiry, under Section 1 of the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act, be held to obtain evidence to prosecute Cooke in case that existing already is not considered sufficient; if not, is the suspicion of "perjury and fraud" considered insufficient to ground such inquiry; and is Cooke the same person who was tried for shooting a girl in Mohill, and got off on the plea of self-defence?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I beg to refer the hon. and learned Member to the reply given to this question when down some days ago, so far as it relates to the case of Mr. O'Connor. With respect to the case of Cooke, he appears to hold in the County Leitrim the positions mentioned in the fourth paragraph. As, however, such appointments are not made by the Irish Government, they have no power to consider the propriety of his continuing to hold them, or otherwise. There does not appear to be any ground for the course suggested in the sixth paragraph. In the absence of any positive direction from the Judge, the proper course would appear to be for the aggrieved party to make complaint on oath, whereupon the necessity for criminal proceedings would be considered. Cooke had on a former occasion been returned for trial as stated in the last paragraph, but the Grand Jury found "No bill" in the case.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Is not the estate in Chancery, and, if so, is it not the Court of Receivers who are the aggrieved persons? Seeing that the Judge suggests a suspicion of perjury and fraud, is it not a case for a prosecution?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I will make an inquiry into the facts of the case.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I will repeat the question on Monday.

DUBLIN HOSPITALS.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether, having regard to the proposal made last year in the Dublin Hospitals Bill of the Government, and the fact that the Bill has not been pressed forward this year, as promised, the Government will take steps, pending a permanent settlement of the question, to effect the purpose of the Bill by distributing the amount of the annual grant among the several Dublin hospitals, according to the relative extent and value of public service rendered?

*THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): Although it has not been possible to introduce a Bill this Session, I hope that some agreement may be arrived at as to details, &c.; a Bill may be introduced next Session. In the meantime I do not think it would be possible, seeing that the present system has been in existence for more than 30 years, to make a re-apportionment.

MR. SEXTON: I think it is quite possible, and I would suggest the propriety of passing a Vote in bulk, without defining the amount to be appropriated to the different institutions.

MR. JACKSON: I understand that a Bill is absolutely necessary.

DUBLIN COLLECTOR GENERAL OF RATES OFFICE.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland with reference to the fact that since the introduction, this Session, of a Bill containing provisions for transferring the collection of certain local rates to the Corporation of Dublin, Robert Henchy and William Perry, to the office of the Collector General of Rates Dublin, have been retired, by the Lord Lieutenant, upon pensions of £311 0s.1d. and £40 respectively, chargeable to the city of Dublin; and Robert J. Henchy (son of the before-named Robert Henchy), Robert M. Richardson, and William Welsh, have been appointed by the Lord Lieutenant to the staff of the Collector General's Office, at salaries of £170, £130, and £110 respectively, mainly chargeable to the city of Dublin; can he state what were the salaries, ages, and terms of service respectively of Robert Henchy and William Perry; why two warrant officers were appointed in place of one retired; what were the occupations of Robert J. Henchy, Robert M. Richardson, and William Welsh, before their appointment to the Collector General's office; whether they were recommended by the Collector General, and their appointments declared to be requisite; and whether he is aware that Mr. Richardson and Mr. Welsh are 50 years of age, and will he explain why they have been appointed at such an age to offices bearing a right of pensions chargeable to the funds of the city?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Mr. Robert Henchy's pensionable emoluments as a collector in the Collector General's Office consisted of poundage, bonus, and salary, the average of which, for the three years preceding his retirement, amounted to £466 10s. 2d. His age at time of retirement was 68, and he had a service of 37 years. Mr. Perry had emoluments, consisting of salary and poundage, amounting to an average of £240 a year. His age was 65, and he had completed 10 years service in the Collector General's Department. Two warrant officers were appointed in place of one (Mr. Perry), on the recommendation of the Collector General. In connection with Mr. Perry's retirement the Collector General reported that when Mr. Perry was appointed in August, 1879, he was required by Mr. Byrne, the then Collector General, to appoint a deputy, whom he paid out of his income as warrant officer. The Collector General reported that for some time he had thought it would be necessary to make a change in that department of his office, and that the proper course would be to appoint two warrant officers, one for the south and the other for the north side—the emoluments of the two not to exceed the £240 a year heretofore paid to the one officer, who had to appoint and pay a deputy. Mr. Robert J. Henchy assisted his father in the general work connected with the collection of rates, and was employed as a temporary clerk in the Collector General's Office. Mr. Robert M. Richardson was the deputy warrant officer employed by Mr. Perry. Mr. W. Welsh was secretary to a club. They were recommended by the Collector General, and the appointments declared to be requisite. Both gentlemen are, I believe, 50 years of age. There has been no regulation laid down as to the age for warrant officers. Both these gentlemen have been informed that they can only hold their appointments while they are able actively to carry out the duties. They will not be entitled to pensions till they have completed 10 years' service, and then only to 10-60ths of their emoluments. Mr. Richardson's temporary service will not count towards pension. An additional sixtieth would be added to the pension for each additional year's service after 10.

MR. SEXTON: Can the right hon. Gentleman cite any precedent for the appointment of persons of 50 years of age to posts which carry a high rate of pension, and does he consider it decent of the Irish Government to make changes involving charges of £300 for pension and £400 for salary upon the City of Dublin at a time when the decision of Parliament is being sought by a Bill on this very question?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am not aware of the circumstances relating to the appointments to which the hon. Gentleman refers, and must ask for notice of the question.

MR. SEXTON: Is the right hon. Gentleman not aware—has he not appeared by his agent, Sir Richard Wyatt, before the Committee on the Bill, and by counsel? Surely he must be aware of his own action.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am perfectly cognisant of the action taken by the Irish Government with regard to the Bill before the House. What I said I was not cognisant of were the details relating to the appointment of these gentlemen.

MR. SEXTON: At the very moment we were seeking the decision of Parliament on the future of this office, does the right hon. Gentleman justify the Irish Government in interfering and making appointments which will throw charges amounting to £700 a year on the City of Dublin?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: My reply to the question as to whether the course which has been taken in this matter was proper or improper is, that it is not one on which I should be asked to give an opinion if I say I am not acquainted with the details of the action of the officials in this case. I must ask for notice of the question before being asked to give a judgment upon it.

MR. T. M. HEALY: As the right hon. Gentleman instructed Sir Richard Wyatt to make the allegation both before the Commons' Committee and the Lords' Committee, that if the Dublin Corporation got this office into its hands it would use it for political purposes and prevent Conservatives getting votes, I will ask whether Mr. Welsh, who has just been appointed, is not the Tory agent on the revision of voters' claims in the City of Dublin; and is it decent to put a pronounced partisan of that kind into an office connected with the franchise?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I must have notice of that question.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury when the Bill relating to Heligoland will be taken? I wish also to ask the right hon. Gentleman a question as to Malta and the mission of Sir Lintorn Simmons. That is distinctly a question for discussion on the Colonial Vote, on which it is understood we may ask for information or make any remarks we have to make. I hope he will be able to hold out a prospect of an early day being fixed for that Vote. The question I have referred to is of great interest to the Irish Members, and it would be hard upon them to be kept waiting for the discussion to come on.

MR. W. H. SMITH: The right hon. Gentleman will understand that I am not able to say on what day that Vote will be taken. I hope it may be possible to complete Irish Supply to-morrow, and, in that case, we shall be in a position to forecast the course of public business. On Monday I shall be able, probably, to state when we shall take the Colonial Vote.

MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-on-Tyne): After what hour will the Votes in Class 4 not be taken, and what will be the business on Monday?

MR. W. H. SMITH: Class 4 will not be entered upon after 11 o'clock unless with the concurrence of hon. Members. In regard to the question of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, the subject he referred to can be raised, not on the Colonial, but on the Foreign Office Vote. On Monday the Committee on the Housing of the Working Classes Bill, and the Second Reading of the Census Bills will be taken.

MR. T. M. HEALY: The Irish Members have shown that they do not desire to delay the Irish Votes, but I hope the right hon. Gentleman will make arrangements for continuing the Irish Votes on Monday, as on Friday the Secretary to the Treasury will have to make an important statement on the subject of Light Railways.

MR. W. H. SMITH: Her Majesty's Government have set apart a fortnight for the Irish Votes, and other business must be proceeded with on Monday.

VOL. CCCXLVII. [THIRD SERIES.]

MR. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside): What is proposed to be done with regard to the Reformatory Schools Bill and the Industrial Schools Bill?

MR. W. H. SMITH: I have already stated that if those Bills are opposed it will not be possible to proceed with them this Session. As several notices of opposition appear on the Paper, I fear they will have to be postponed until next Session. The responsibility for the postponement must rest upon those who have given the notices.

MR. DILLON: Will the Chief Secretary consent to postpone the Report of Supply on the Land Commission Vote? I refrained from discussing the land purchase branch of the Land Commission yesterday, in order that the Vote might be taken, though I might have talked it out. Under these circumstances, I will ask the Chief Secretary not to take Report of the Land Commission Vote until such time as a reasonable opportunity for further discussion might be available.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I cannot at present say more than that the Report of this Vote will not be taken to-night.

LAND COMMISSION—IRVINESTOWN.

MR. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he will explain why the Land Commission is to hear the Irvinestown cases in Enniskillen, instead of at Irvinestown, in view of the great inconvenience which the change will cause to the farmers of Irvinestown, who will have to travel 18 miles to Enniskillen in order to have their rents fixed?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Land Commissioners state that the Chairman of the Sub-Commission referred to reports that, at the request of the solicitors for the landlords and tenants, the Sub-Commission arranged to take up such Irvinestown cases as could be conveniently heard at Enniskillen in that town, on the 22nd, 23rd, and 24th instants, provided both sides agreed to appear there on these days, and with regard to any such cases which could not be conveniently heard at Enniskillen the Sub-Commission announced their intention of taking them up on some later day at such place as the hearing could be more conveniently held.

THE CASE OF MR. EDWARD ATTHILL.

MR. W. REDMOND: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether Mr. Edward Atthill, of Advarney House, Ederney, County Fermanagh, who was arrested and lodged in Sligo Gaol on a charge of forgery, is a Magistrate for Fermanagh; and, if so, is he to be allowed to retain the Commission of the Peace?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am informed that Mr. Atthill was not arrested on a charge of forgery, but was imprisoned for contempt of Court. The Report before me does not show when this occurred; but if the matter has not been already before the Lord Chancellor I have no doubt it will receive his consideration.

IRISH VOTES.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury in what class can be found the Vote for the Ulster King at Arms and the Knight of St. Patrick?

*MR. JACKSON: In Class VII.

MR. MAC NEILL: Why are they not in the same class as formerly?

*MR. JACKSON: Because in the re-arrangement of the Votes it was found convenient to put several of these small Votes together.

THE IRISH CENSUS BILL.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I wish to ask the Chief Secretary whether the Irish Census Bill will provide for ascertaining the exact proportion the loyal minority in Ireland bears to the whole population?

MR. E. HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.): And will he consider the desirability of including in the Census Returns statistics showing the number of evicted tenants?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am afraid I cannot do anything of the kind.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

COLONIAL COURTS OF ADMIRALTY BILL [LORDS].—(No. 260.)

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

Clause 2.

(4.45.) MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): This Bill appears to me to be very strangely drafted. There is a clause at the end which apparently was introduced as an afterthought, and by it Vice Admiralty Courts throughout the British possessions are abolished. Yet in Clause 9 there is power given to establish Vice Admiralty Courts; and, therefore, it seems to me a most difficult matter to construe this Bill, having regard to Clauses 9 and 17.

*(4.46.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): The Bill was prepared as far back as 1885, and has been the subject of most careful negotiation between the colonies and the Colonial Office. The power of establishing Vice Admiralty Courts, to which the hon. Member has drawn attention, is merely for the purpose of enabling them to be established in small colonies where the ordinary provisions do not apply.
The scheme is one to secure that there are Courts of Admiralty in all British possessions.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 17.

(4.48.) MR. A. O'CONNOR: This is the clause which abolishes Vice Admirality Courts throughout the whole of the British possessions. Now, under the Interpretation Act of last year the words "British possessions" were held to include "all possessions of the Crown, whether self-governing colonies or not."
Under Sub-section 3 of this clause all officers of Vice Admiralty Courts who sustain any pecuniary loss in consequence of the abolition of the Courts are to receive reasonable compensation.
Where, I want to know, does the Government claim to obtain the Constitutional right of imposing a money charge upon self-governing colonies in respect of officers whose functions are brought to an end, not by the action of the colony in the first instance, but by the action of the Imperial Parliament?
I submit that this is a very questionable proceeding in point of Constitutional Law.

*(4.50.) SIR R. WEBSTER: I understand the hon. Member to raise this point so far as it affects the self-governing colonies. I may inform him that the Bill was specially referred to those colonies, and their consent obtained to the Bill. I do not think there is anything unconstitutional in inserting the provision.

(4.51.) MR. A. O'CONNOR: If the consent of the self-governing colonies has been obtained, would it not be proper to set that fact forth in the Preamble, and thus save the Constitutional rights of these Governments?

*(452.) SIR R. WEBSTER: I do not think it is either necessary or usual.

Clause agreed to.

Bill reported, with an Amendment; as amended, to be considered to-morrow.

SHREWSBURY AND HOLYHEAD ROAD
(ANGLESEA AND CARNARVON)
BILL.—(No. 377.)

Bill considered in Committee, and reported, without Amendment; read the third time, and passed.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES,
1890-91.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

CLASS III.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £82,766, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1891, for the Salaries, Allowances, and Expenses and Pensions of various County Court Officers, of Divisional Commissioners and Magistrates in Ireland, and the expenses of Revision."

(455.) MR. W. O'BRIEN (Cork, N.E.): If the Irish Members were to insist on discussing in anything like detail all the complaints they have to make against the Divisional and Resident Magistrates whose salaries are included in this Vote, there would not be much probability of the First Lord of the Treasury realising his anticipation of concluding the Irish Estimates to-morrow. I propose to allude briefly to one specimen of these Removable Magistrates. I want to call attention to the conduct of an ex-Indian official, Colonel Caddell, whose only qualification for his office is his churlish insolence to every one who addresses him. For nearly nine months this gentleman has been ruling in Tipperary with as much unbridled power as if he were a Turkish Pasha. He is one day commanding the police when dispersing a meeting, and the very next day sitting in judgment upon their conduct. Colonel Caddell was one of my Judges at Clonakilty. On that occasion I was cross-examining a police note-taker, named Garvey, who had taken bodily out of a newspaper my speech and the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for West Cork, but swore that he had taken them down while they were being delivered. Garvey's evidence was so evidently perjured that, though my hon. Friend was sentenced to two months' imprisonment, the Government never dared to meet the case in a Superior Court, and the sentence on my hon. Friend has never yet been enforced, although I myself went through four months' imprisonment on the evidence of this policeman. I was cross-examining this policeman when Colonel Caddell came to his rescue and said that if the man had copied the speech correctly from the Freeman's Journal it was the newspaper, and not the witness, that I should accuse of perjury. That is a sample of Colonel Caddell's intelligence; he failed altogether to appreciate the difference between a man swearing that he had taken a note of a speech and copying it from a public newspaper. He did not know the difference between a newspaper reporter taking a note honestly for his paper and a police shorthand writer stealing that report and swearing it was his own note. That is a fair specimen of Colonel Caddell's intelligence, but I am glad to say that the condition of this gentleman's liver has a great deal more to do with his government of Tipperary than his intelligence. Here is another illustration of the double function Colonel Caddell fulfils in Tipperary, first as a policeman, and then as a Magistrate—

"Constable King appeared on the table to prosecute Miss Hogan and Mrs. Nunan, and John Hennessey, William O'Brien Street, for groaning at the police on the day the evicting party knocked down Mr. O'Brien-Dalton's mill. Mr. O'Dwyer, LL.D., appeared for the defendants—"

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN, Dublin University): What is the date?

MR. W. O'BRIEN: The date is the 15th February last. It is the case of two ladies, Miss Hogan and Mrs. Nunan, respectable shopkeepers in the town, who were prosecuted for groaning at the police, but that is not the point I am on. Mr. O'Dwyer, their solicitor, called Colonel Caddell's attention to the fact that he (Colonel Caddell) had been in command of the Police Force upon the day in question, and asked him would he undertake to adjudicate in the present proceedings? Colonel Caddell replied that on the occasion referred to he was acting ministerially, and that in the present instance he was acting judicially. Here you have a distinct and naked claim, which he has repeatedly enforced, on the part of Colonel Caddell—that Colonel Caddell the Magistrate can sit in judgment upon Colonel Caddell the policeman and his subordinates. The people of Tipperary are expected to reverence the law that is administered by such an insulting—I do not hesitate to call him so—jackanapes as this gentleman who, when a clergyman addresses him in the streets of Tipperary, sticks out his tongue at him, and who has never to this day apologised or explained—I invite the Chief Secretary to explain it if he can—the indecent, filthy language which he addressed to a respectable poor young girl in Youghal who was at the time in the custody of his policemen. This is the sort of thing that goes on every week, almost every day, in Tipperary, and it is into the hands of persons like Caddell—I venture to say again, an ignorant, insulting, and incompetent little tyrant—it is into his hands that the peace of Tipperary and the lives of a whole community have been committed for the last nine months. Let me give another specimen of the conduct of this Magistrate. It was Colonel Caddell who superintended, and is responsible for, the outrage that was perpetrated over poor Michael O'Dwyer's grave; and we are not going to allow that outrage to pass without reminding this House and the English people of it again and again. The Chief Secretary complained the other night that we repeat our charges. Well, Sir, we do, and we will; and we will not only repeat them in this House, but we will repeat them from end to end of England, and I rather think the right hon. Gentleman's complaint is not so much against us as against the English constituencies, who have repeated again and again their verdicts upon those charges. It is not surprising that their verdicts are beginning to be a little monotonous to the right hon. Gentleman. But what are the facts of the outrage in the graveyard at Tipperary? Mr. O'Dwyer was one of the most respectable men in the whole town—a splendid young man about 30 years of age. He was under a notice of eviction by Mr. Smith-Barry. His little baby had died a short time before, and his wife was on the point of death. He was being buried, and actually, while the coffin was being brought out of the church in Tipperary, a body of policemen came up, and posted on the gates of the church a proclamation signed by Colonel Caddell proclaiming the funeral as an illegal assembly. The town was crammed with policemen that day. Huge bodies of them armed with rifles moved about in the funeral procession, and a force of them galloped to the head of the procession—shadowing the dead. When we came to the graveyard we found Caddell and a body of policemen drawn up outside it, and they stood there while that solemn ceremony was going on, Caddell with an insulting smirk upon his face. He was not satisfied with that, and, acting on his orders, a body of policemen rushed into the graveyard and forced their way within a few feet of where the coffin was lying. These policemen had not the common decency to take off their spiked helmets while the funeral service was being performed. They remained there throughout, the people being maddened and outraged by their presence, and the moment there was a word of protest uttered by my hon. Friend the Member for East Tipperary, instantly the police note-taker brought out his note book and took down what was said. I want to know is it possible to imagine any proceeding that was better calculated to wound and to outrage the deepest and the dearest feelings of the people than the conduct which I have described? Because the people are so patient, we see what use is made of their patience. The very same thing happened at the grave of my poor Friend Matthew Harris, the late Member for East Galway. The police then again forced their way into the graveyard, stood by the grave, took a note of what was said there, and I believe that was claimed to be a perfectly proper proceeding on their part, because the people did not take the ruffians by the neck and throw them out of the graveyard. But the police pursued poor Michael O'Dwyer beyond the grave. Three or four days after his interment, when his wife had struggled up to open the shop, the first person who came into it was a policeman with a notice that he meant to oppose her licence at the next Sessions—that is say, the police would try to deprive her of her only means of livelihood simply because she had refused to supply an emergency man when he was brought into her shop by some policemen with the deliberate purpose of entrapping her into a refusal. Because she would not facilitate Mr. Smith-Barry in provisioning his garrison in Tipperary the poor woman, broken-hearted as she was, is told by the police that her last means of livelihood are to be taken away from her. That is only another specimen. I could give hundreds and thousands of them if necessary. I ask any Member on either side of the House how long he would be prepared to tolerate such a state of things? I venture to say our people would be the veriest slaves and hounds, and should be justly considered so, if they did not loathe the law and order that is associated with men like this Caddell. The only reply we get in this House when we mention these things is that crime is common in Tipperary. I venture to say that the only crime in Tipperary is that which is encouraged by Caddell and his policemen. A struggle has been going on in that town now for 12 months, and two vast estates have been cleared, and I defy the Chief Secretary to name one single act of bloodshed that has been committed by the people. I could name acts of bloodshed on the other side, and I venture to say there never was a people—and they a hot-blooded people—who conducted themselves so crimelessly, so peacefully, and so marvellously in the face of insults like those this man Caddell has heaped upon them day after day. And what is the result? You have achieved the maximum as regards outraging the people's feelings, and you have accomplished only the minimum as far as your own purposes are concerned. This condition of affairs in Tipperary, if it were not so horrible in many ways, would be downright ridiculous and disastrous. For nearly nine months Colonel Caddell has had at his back about 130 policemen and 600 or 700 soldiers. He has absolutely limitless power both as a police bravo and a Police Magistrate under the Crimes Act. He has done all that a man could do—all that I verily believe a demon with all his ingenuity could do—to exasperate the people into riot and disturbance, and what is the result? At this moment the combination against which you are in vain fighting, and the legality of which the Chief Secretary was practically obliged to acknowledge the other night, is as firmly rooted as the Rock of Cashel. Notwithstanding all the horrible shadowing that has been going on, Colonel Caddell has not succeeded in establishing a single successful prosecution for boycotting. Although priests are dogged from day to day, and every prominent man is dogged by policemen, I venture to say the only thing he has succeeded in has been acquitting policemen who jostled men they were shadowing, and in punishing men who remonstrated with the police. At this moment he is an utter failure in Tipperary, and still he is allowed to remain there, day after day, as a constant source of outrage and insult to the whole community. I only wonder that he has not been actually promoted for his services in Tipperary. He is the best of all types of the Resident Magistrate, who is promoted actually in proportion to his brutality to the people of Ireland. There is scarcely a man who has so distinguished himself who has not found the results in speedy promotion. There is Mr. Cecil Roche. I saw him beat with a stick a man in Tralee, who had the temerity to salute me, and he afterwards gave him three months in gaol. His salary has been increased by several hundred pounds since, and I am told that at this moment he is indignant because more has not been given to him. I am also told that there has been a good deal of indignation and heart-burning on the part of Caddell, because he has not been promoted to a Divisional Commissionership. All I can say is, if these are the sort of men the Government have pinned their faith to, we need not object except for the sake of the unfortunate people who are subjected to their outrages. These men are doing our work. They are exemplifying the hatefulness and the impossibility of the present system of government in Ireland, and all I can say is we have not the least objection that you should choose such instruments in Ireland so long as you carry on a system of coercing and oppressing the Irish people. It is quite another thing how these proceedings will be regarded in England, and I venture to say the longer you continue this system in Ireland the surer you are, in the first place, to cement our Union in Ireland and the combination of the Irish tenants; and, in the second place, to meet condemnation here where you fear it most.

(6.20.) MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): This subject of the Irish Magistrates has been frequently and fully brought before the House. We have proved on many previous occasions that the personnel of the Irish Resident Magistracy would be a disgrace to any Government in the world. It has been shown, I regret to say, and no one has attempted to contradict it, that successive Governments—and I do not blame the present Government more than its predecessors—have made it a custom to appoint to these most important posts in Ireland men with absolutely no qualifications for the position; men not only without any experience of civil administration, but the whole course of whose lives has been such as to unfit them for the delicate task which they have to perform. I am speaking now from the point of view of the Chief Secretary himself. We have Returns before the House in which the antecedents of all these gentlemen are set forth, and as well as I can remember now, and I have not the Returns by me, three-fourths of the Resident Magistrates of Ireland are retired military men; and when we look into the personnel of the remainder, we find that with few exceptions there is little more to recommend the civilians than the military men. We find for the most part that they are broken-down “ne’er-do-wells” of county families in Ireland, whom their relatives will not support, and who are utterly unable to make their own way in the world—men of no education or knowledge but of hunting, shooting, fishing, and hare coursing. On one occasion an interesting collection of letters fell into our hands at an auction in Dublin, letters of application to the Lords Lieutenant, in which the most ludicrous reasons were set forth as justification for their application for appointment as Resident Magistrates. Well, the result has been the appointment of men with no sort of qualification for the duties and difficulties of the position. I intend to explain fully the reasons why we Irish Nationalists think the office of Irish Resident Magistrate is an office that ought not to exist under any Government, and I will explain that in a few minutes. It must be admitted by all sections that the duties under a Coercion Administration are of a peculiarly difficult and delicate character; and that, in order to secure the due discharge of those duties, even from the point of view of the Chief Secretary and his supporters, men should be selected who are well experienced in civil administration, trained, and who may be expected to restrain their temper with rigid self-control under difficult circumstances, and who are somewhat versed in the Criminal Law. Now, I need not go at length into the matter, for I do not think it is contended that these qualifications are in any considerable number of cases possessed by the present occupants of the posts of Resident Magistrates. It is a scandalous condition of things. There is not a man on these Benches, nor do I think there is an Irish Representative opposite, who has not witnessed the scandalous behaviour of these men at Petty Sessions. I recollect perfectly well, before the late agitations arose, in my own district in East Mayo a Resident Magistrate, a retired Army Officer, who was in the habit of drinking too much; and I know that day after day he attended the Petty Sessions Court under the influence of drink, and frequently he did not attend at all. There was no remedy. I have watched the unfortunate people coming in with their solicitors from a distance, for there was at that time no solicitor in the town. I have seen them waiting for hours, losing their time and their solicitors’ fees, and no Magistrate came. When on the Bench his bearing, his language, was that of a fishwife. I remember a case brought before him in which a tinker was charged with stealing a donkey; and in an altercation which took place, it was difficult to understand from the language used which was Magistrate and which was tinker. I am referring to a considerable number of years ago; but this is a case that came within my personal knowledge, and he occupied the Bench for a number of years. For a quarter of an hour recriminations were exchanged between the Magistrate and the tinker, police and people standing by and regarding it as the ordinary method of administering justice. This same Magistrate, travelling to a country station one wet evening, found that there was only one car at the station, which had been secured by a commercial traveller. The Magistrate ordered the commercial traveller to get off the car, which the man refused to do. The Magistrate then ordered the two policemen who usually attend at stations to drag the man off the car, and this they proceeded to do, and in doing so broke the man's leg. The man was ill for six months, and the Magistrate had to pay £100 compensation. But, after this, this Magistrate was still allowed to occupy his seat on the Bench and administer justice. I only mention this to show the kind of men whom the Irish people in the past have had to go for justice.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON (Armagh, N.): Will the hon. Member give the date of this occurrence?

MR. DILLON: It took place about seven years ago. I do not present it as more than an illustration. The facts are admitted and well known in the district. I only mention it to show the scandalous system which was allowed to go on, and it is to be charged against all Administrations—not only the present—that this scandalous system has been allowed to grow up and form an integral part of Irish government. All Administrations I say, must share in the blame. And now I come to what I consider to be the fundamental blot, or, at all events, one of the fundamental blots in the Irish system of Resident Magistrates, such as I do not know is to be found in any free country in the world, and which, even if the personnel of the Irish Resident Magistracy were beyond question, beyond all blame, would condemn the whole system. It is this: that you have in Ireland a system under which police officers act as Magistrates. Now, I ask any hon. Member, any Englishman, what would he say if in any district a police officer were to sit on the Bench and decide cases in which the police acted as prosecutors? And, unhappily, the objection is very much stronger in Ireland than in this country, because in Ireland the number of prosecutions instituted and originated by the police is infinitely greater than in this country, owing to a variety of unhappy circumstances. I need not now go into detail. Summonses and prosecutions that in England would be left to private initiative are instituted by the police in Ireland, and this makes the position still more intolerable, that a man who as executive police officer directs a prosecution, should then climb on to the Bench and act as Judge in the case. First he orders the prosecution, and is through his subordinates a party to it, and then he decides the case. We have heard a great deal about recent disturbances at Cashel and Tipperary. They are of the same character as many previous disturbances in Ireland. But they serve excellently as an illustration of the complaint I am now about to make. It is terrible that such things should be done in the name of justice as are now being done in Cashel and Tipperary. What happens? Caddell orders the charge by the police, and then he is found sitting on the Bench to decide between the police and the persons who complain against them. Take what happened to myself. I was standing talking peaceably to a friend in the Square of Tipperary when Colonel Caddell ordered the police to charge and baton. The police did not obey orders by batoning the people. But suppose any of these policemen had struck me, what would have been my redress? The Chief Secretary would have told me that I had a legal remedy against the policeman if I could identify him. And where would this policeman have been tried? Before the police officer who ordered the charge. Could you have a more grotesque travesty of justice? Here is another example of the principle which obtains in the administration of the law in Ireland. A man was charged with assaulting an officer who was shadowing him. The charge was that he had shoved the officer off the path. I venture to point out that it is exceedingly necessary, if you have such a system of shadowing as that which now prevails in Ireland, that the assault should be very clearly proved. When an officer walks so closely behind the person shadowed as to kick his heel, while another constable touches his shoulder, it may easily happen that the action necessary to escape the kicking of the heel and the touching of the shoulder is construed into assault. In the case tried before Colonel Caddell, three civilians, against whose character there is no accusation, swore there was no assault, yet Colonel Caddell, who had ordered the shadowing, called upon the men to find bail. And, therefore, Mr. Morgan Hay, who had gone into the town of Tipperary to transact some business, was sent to gaol for six weeks. That is an illustration of what goes on in Ireland. The police are ordered to adopt a certain course of proceeding, and if a policeman alleges assault in the course of that proceeding he is supported by his superior officer who tries the case. So long as such a system as that prevails you cannot expect the people of Ireland to respect law and order. I want to say this with regard to Mr. Caddell. I have had a good deal of experience of Magistrates and policemen during the agitation in Ireland, and I must say that some of them are gentlemanly and self-restrained. But there are others against whom Irish Members have frequently had occasion to bring charges in this House. Of one, Captain Plunkett, I will say nothing now, as he is dead. Of another, Captain Segrave, I may remind the Committee that when a charge was made against him he was enthusiastically defended by the right hon. Gentleman. There was the fatal day at Mitchelstown, and when I stated what occurred between me and Captain Segrave the right hon. Gentleman defended him. We raked up the antecedents of Captain Segrave, who was compelled to return to that obscurity from which he ought never to have emerged. Captain Segrave's character was so abominable that even the Chief Secretary had to give him up. If necessary, we shall go into the past of Colonel Caddell. I do not like such a method of warfare, but if we are to have scoundrels and ruffians, dragged from the purlieus of society, placed in the seat of justice, we shall be compelled to resort to it. I shall apply myself to the career of Colonel Caddell, and if his record is as foul as that of Captain Segrave, he will have to leave the Bench. There are men sitting on the Magisterial Bench in Ireland who are not fit to be in decent society, and whose record is such that they would not be admitted to any club of gentlemen if it were made known. Rather than see murders and outrages committed upon our people by these dissipated and disreputable wretches, I will rake up their past history, in order to relieve the Irish people of their intolerable presence. I wish now to call attention to what may be described as rather a shady trick of the Irish Executive. I have over and over again called attention in this House to the gross irregularities of the provisional Magistrates in Ireland. The Chief Secretary did not approve of regularising these provisional Magistrates. The Government promised that that payment should be recognised by Statute, but they have not kept their word, and I want to know why they pledge themselves to introduce legislative measures and break their pledge? I suppose it is because they dread the discussion of any such proposal, and it is exceedingly likely, after the experience they have had, that they do not wish to excite further discussion with regard to their policy on matters of this kind. Everybody knows the unpleasant experience of the late Mr. Forster, and the proposal he brought forward, which was supposed to be a device intended simply to meet a tremendous emergency. In order to meet that emergency, Mr. Forster started the idea of decentralisation and division of responsibility, by means of a system of Divisional Magistrates, a system which I contend could not be applied for a single hour to any other country in the world. What happened? Why, that the system, which was intended to meet a grave crisis, became the regular system of the country, and continues to be saddled with all the additional cost and inconvenience it entailed. The recommendation of the Controller and Auditor General was that those payments should be made by Statute, and the Government, although they pledged themselves to carry out his suggestion, have broken that pledge, and have got round the Auditor General by calling the Divisional Magistrates Executive Officers. That is an idea unworthy of a Government. The Auditor General objected to the payment of these three gentlemen as Resident Magistrates, because, under the Act of William, the maximum salary of the Resident Magistrates was fixed at £750 a year, and the Government, instead of passing a fresh Act creating fresh officers, go to the filthy archives of Dublin Castle, and rake out some musty precedent which enables the Irish Executive to appoint Executive Officers provided the Government pay them. They cease to call these men Resident Magistrates, and describe them as Executive Officers, whom they keep ranging in the air, ready to do anything the Government require; they get the Lord Chancellor to make them Magistrates, and they pay them £1,000 a year as Executive Officers. A more monstrous way of evading the Auditor General was never heard of; and the conduct of the Government in this respect is most disgraceful and must be protested against. Under the present system the Government have placed a superior officer in every district of Ireland, giving him absolute control over all the other Magistrates, who are actually dependent on him for their children's bread. Let us consider how this system works. Some time ago the Government made an appointment which, for brazen-faced indecency, passes anything I ever heard of. I allude to the appointment of Mr. Cecil Roche. Who was Mr. Cecil Roche? He was a briefless barrister utterly unable to make a living at the Irish Bar, and, like many other adventurers, at the Election of 1886 he cast in his lot with the Unionist Party. Briefless barristers and needy adventurers in Ireland generally do cast in their lot with the Tory Party, because all the pickings they hope to get come from that side. Mr. Cecil Roche came over to England and perambulated the country making speeches in the interest of the Government; speeches in which he was prominent for the violence and the vigour of his vituperation. He denounced the Nationalist Party in Ireland in the most horrible language, although I must admit that sometimes we use strong language ourselves, only there is this difference between us, that if I make use of vigorous language I cannot go to the Bench and send my opponent to gaol for six months. Well, what did the Government do? Mr. C. Roche had distinguished himself by this sort of conduct, and I am informed that on one occasion he stated that "when Hell was frozen over he would go down and fight the Parnellites on the ice." Well, when the Election was over he did not go to fight the Parnellites on the ice of frozen Hell, but he got a much more comfortable place, and obtained an appointment under which he was enabled to send the Parnellites to gaol, so that they might experience the effects of hard labour and the plank bed. I regard it as a most disgraceful thing that a man, for going round the country and denouncing the Parnellite Members, should, in something like six months, be placed upon the Magisterial Bench and empowered to send to hard labour and the plank bed men infinitely more respectable than himself. That, Sir, is the historical Mr. C. Roche, and his history is a most scandalous one. Well, let me point out the connection between his appointment and the appointment of the Executive Officers. We have all heard of Colonel Turner, who found Mr. Cecil Roche so utterly unscrupulous and unreliable for the purposes of the Government that he practically used him as a "walking gallows." I may remind the Committee that there was a historical character, a man of great height and physique, standing well over 6ft. 3in. in his stockings, who used to dispose of the rebels by putting a rope round their necks and hanging them over his shoulders whereby he acquired the name of the walking gallows. Mr. C. Roche was used as a facile instrument and unscrupulous tool by Colonel Turner; whenever a case was to be disposed of in which it was essential to secure a conviction Mr. C. Roche was sent. Can anything more indecent be imagined than a system like this, where, in case the Local Magistrates can not be relied upon to adjudicate in certain cases, another man is to be imported from a distance, because he is known to be a thorough-going hater of the Nationalist Party. But this system does not end with Mr. C. Roche; unfortunately, it is being pursued throughout the whole of Ireland. I remember that when I was on my trial the Government would not trust the Magistrate of the district, Mr. McCarthy—he was too honest a man; they, therefore, imported an ironclad Magistrate, who was an Orangeman of the deepest dye, and made him Magistrate for my district simply in order that I might be tried by him. [Cries of

"Name."] The name was Harris, and he was a blackguard, and the reason he was placed upon the Bench was that he was as Orange at heart as he could possibly be. I say that such a system is infamous, and can have no possible justification. I will endeavour to point out to the Committee the work which Colonel Turner does. He was the Executive Officer for Clare, Kerry, and Limerick. As Executive Officer he had the means of life of every Magistrate in the district under his control. I know he could not actually dismiss a man, but I know there is not a Magistrate who does not tremble in his shoes before him. Colonel Turner was sent down to a district greatly disturbed on the agrarian question. His sympathies were strongly with the present Government, and, indeed, Colonel Turner's sentiments are of the most convenient character. When Lord Aberdeen was in Dublin Colonel Turner was an enthusiastic Home Ruler. He even declared in the presence of a friend of mine that if he were an Irishman he would have been a Fenian. When the right hon. Gentleman opposite went over to Dublin Colonel Turner became an equally enthusiastic Unionist. That is a very convenient form of conviction for a man to have. When he went down to take charge of this disturbed district, surely common sense and decency would dictate to him an attitude of the strictest impartiality between landlord and tenant. What did he do? He went down into Clare and took up his abode with the chief and most unpopular agent, Mr. Stacpoole, as that gentleman's guest, dining at his table, driving round in his carriage or car, and he had actually the indecency to drive into Ennis upon official business more than once in the private carriage of Mr. Stacpoole, the most unpopular agent in County Clare. For months he resided as a member of the family with Mr. Stacpoole. I have not language strong enough to characterise the conduct of a Government that would tolerate such things. Colonel Turner became the servant, the lackey of Mr. Stacpoole, there was no work too dirty for Colonel Turner to do, until at last the police in Clare acted as the servants of Mr. Stacpoole, and members of the Force were employed to collect the tolls at a fair for Mr. Stacpoole.

Magistrates and police became the servants of Mr. Stacpoole, and when a Magistrate was required to do the dirty work of Colonel Turner, and a local man could not be trusted, Mr. Cecil Roche was sent for from Tralee at the cost of additional travelling expenses. In spite of all these things, and this state of administration, these charges, which have been made before and never denied, the Government complain that the people of Clare and Kerry have no respect for the administration of the law. All I can say is that if the people of Clare and Kerry had any respect for the administration of law under such circumstances they would be the most contemptible creatures, and would deserve to be kicked and flogged like slaves. When Thomas Drummond instituted a class of Resident Magistrates, he had in view the protection of the poorer classes against possible tyranny and annoyance of the Local Magistrates of the landlord class; he never dreamed of the use to which they have been put. He forgot that the appearing of Resident Magistrates as protectors of the poor depends on the men who preside in Dublin Castle, and who may make these Magistrates an additional instrument for the oppression of the people. As a further instance of Colonel Turner's abuse of his position, I may mention the part he took towards preventing a settlement of the dispute on the Vandeleur Estate. He wrote a letter to the Times denouncing the landlord for not taking more stringent steps, and for not bringing emergency men down to his estate. In view of these facts it is perfectly outrageous on the part of the Government to endeavour by a shady trick to pass this Vote to pay such men, who are no more nor less than Executive Officers placed over the heads of the Magistrates in Ireland for the purpose of intimidating them into doing the dirty work of the Government. What would English Members say if the Commissioner of Police were to sit upon the Bench one day and command the police the next? That would give a faint idea of what we have to put up with in Ireland, though that is not exactly a parallel case, because there we have officers at the head of the Judicial Bench and of the police in Ireland who are in no way responsible, directly or indirectly, to the people of Ireland. Now I turn to say a word or two upon the County Court Judges of Ireland. I regret to say the people of Ireland have not confidence in these officials.

THE CHAIRMAN: There is nothing, I think, in the Vote for County Court Judges.

MR. DILLON: Under those circumstances, I will proceed with a few words I have to say upon a case recently tried before a Resident Magistrate, which, in my judgment, illustrates in a forcible and valuable way some of the doctrines as well as the value of the facts of right hon. Gentlemen opposite in regard to boycotting cases. We have heard boycotting described by the right hon. Gentleman in strong language as being accompanied by intimidation and violence. Now I want to draw attention to a case of boycotting recently tried in Tipperary, in which the charge was made against two schoolboys named William Quin and Robert Lewis. The summons set forth the grounds on which the prosecution was instituted, and is a kind of a manifesto on the part of the officials founded on the statements of the right hon. Gentleman opposite—

"Whereas it is a matter of popular notoriety that a system exists in several parts of Ireland known as boycotting"—so runs this manifesto of Colonel Cuddell—"which injuriously interferes with the free exercise of legal rights by Her Majesty's subjects, and that the said system is carried out by certain persons, who, by signs, or otherwise, warn those who wish to exercise their legal rights not to do so," and after other "whereases of great charge," finally, on June 19, these two respectable lads, under 16 years of age, are charged with the commission of that offence, to wit, endeavouring to prevent children from attending school. The evidence given by the police showed that the lads stood outside the school house, and in this case the overt act of intimidation and violence alleged was that one of the lads charged shook a rose at the girl supposed to be intimidated, and prevented her from attending school. Of course, the whole thing is perfectly ludicrous, and I do not wish to discuss it at great length, but I wish to emphasise the fact that in all these prosecutions before Magistrates in Ireland for boycotting there is no established proof of violence or intimidation. We hear of violence and intimidation from the Chief Secretary, but when we come to hard facts before the Magistrates, we hear nothing at all of these accompaniments. The right hon. Gentleman is, of course, quite entitled to denounce boycotting, but he is not entitled to connect boycotting with violence and intimidation when there is no violence and no intimidation. The Irish Government are armed with enormous powers. Why, if there is violence, are not such cases brought before the Magistrates? But, as a matter of fact, there are no cases of violence connected with boycotting. Over and over again we have had it in evidence that the offence of a man charged with boycotting was indicated by his pointing with a crutch he held in his hand at certain animals, or he said some words, or he winked, nodded, or coughed in the sight or hearing of the persons who were about to make purchases. There is no proof, I say, that boycotting is based on intimidation. One word in conclusion, and I do not know whether I shall be strictly in order, but I will only make a brief reference to the question of "shadowing," as exemplified in the case of David Kent. It has transpired in evidence that the constable who shadowed David Kent did prevent the sale of calves and lambs by Kent, by thrusting his head between the owner and possible purchaser, scaring away the latter. Kent, unable to do his business, unable to sell the stock he brought into the fair, turned round, and at a short distance away saw a police officer, who was walking about the fair, and began to follow him. The police officer turned round, and said, "If you continue to follow me I shall have you arrested." Kent continued to follow him, and was arrested. He was brought before a Magistrate, put in gaol for five or six hours, and then bailed out. When brought before the Magistrates for trial he was charged with obstructing the police in the execution of their duty. The Magistrates, I understand, held the charge to be proved, although there is some mistiness about the record of the decision; but Kent was dismissed on condition that he should not follow the policeman any more. Now, Sir, I want to know what is the legal ground of the charge against Kent, and I want also to know what right the Magistrate had to dismiss the man on condition that he would not continue to follow the policeman? If it be maintained that the Magistrate was acting within his legal right in finding this man guilty, and in requiring such an undertaking from him, I want to know how it can be lawful for the police to obstruct a poor man in the discharge of his business? The Government has hitherto given no clear and definite statement of the law on this point in Ireland. We want to know whether, if it be lawful for a policeman to follow a civilian, and to obstruct and annoy him in the discharge of his business, it is also lawful for a civilian to follow a policeman and in the same way annoy him? Under what law may a policeman molest, annoy, irritate, and interfere with the private business of an individual against whom no charge is made, if a civilian is not entitled to do the same thing? We had it the other day from the right hon. Gentleman opposite that the Magistrates in each district are allowed, on their own responsibility, to select the individuals who are to be subjected to this horrible persecution. I say frankly that during the autumn we shall try to put a stop to this system. People who are shadowed will insist upon following the police, and if they are arrested for following the police, I am bound to say, it will come to this in the end, that on a suitable opportunity it will be the duty of one of our men to knock down a "shadow." Although I have over and over again used my influence in Ireland to preserve the police, and to prevent collisions between the police and the people, often under very unpleasant circumstances, I say I think our people are justified, when a favourable opportunity arises, in trying the law on this matter, if the Attorney General refuses to state it clearly in this House. I think the proper way to try the law is for the man shadowed to take his opportunity when out of sight of the picket to knock down the "shadow," and assert his right not to be dogged, punished, and outraged by policemen when there is really no law to justify it.

*(6.26.) MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I think this the most important Vote in the whole of the Irish Estimates. We have been discussing for the past fortnight the administrative and the executive policy of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary. This Vote deals with the whole question of the administration of justice in Ireland. Of course, we are not going to touch the administration of justice by the Superior Courts. In Ireland, as in England, and I suppose everywhere else, the Courts of First Instance—the Courts of the Local Magistracy—are the Courts with which the people are familiar, and these are the Courts which represent to the people of Ireland that much repeated phrase of "law and order." They represent British justice, and I submit it is the duty of the House of Commons, in voting the money for these Courts, to satisfy itself that they are Courts which adequately administer justice, and which have the confidence of the people of Ireland. I believe someone has said it is necessary in a free country not only that justice should be impartially administered, but that the people should believe it is impartially administered. If that be true I think both sides of the House will admit, even without the confirmatory evidence of the two speeches made to-night, that the people of Ireland do not believe justice is impartially administered to them. I suppose there is hardly a gentleman sitting on the other side of the House who is not in the habit of taking part in the administration of justice in his own locality, and there are many also on this side of the House who administer the law. I am not going to say a word disrespectful to the general ability and legal knowledge of Stipendiary Magistrates in the great towns of England, and especially in the Metropolis, where, I think, they dispense justice in a highly satisfactory manner, but I believe it to be the just boast of Englishmen that justice is fairly and impartially administered by the overwhelming majority of the Justices of the Peace. In London, and wherever you think it necessary to provide paid Magistrates, you take the greatest possible care that they shall be fully qualified to discharge their duties. No one is appointed who has not studied the law and practised the law. It is a rule, almost without an exception, that the men selected as Stipendiary Magistrates are not only possessed of knowledge of affairs, but that they are also possessed of knowledge of the law. The same rule prevails in Scotland, and in the colonies, and in India.

In India, which, perhaps, some people would say is the parallel of Ireland with regard to our rule, we are a conquering race governing a subject race. I believe, myself, the strongest hold we have on the people of India, the strongest tie which attaches India to British rule—is not our military, or our civil, or our financial administration, but the belief which pervades all classes in India that in the Courts of the Queen they receive, and will continue to receive, fair, equal, and impartial justice. And why is this? How do we provide for the administration of justice in India? We do not make the office of the administration of justice a refuge for the morally and intellectually destitute—we take care to provide suitable men. The examination imposed upon men who go out to India is the most severe competitive examination, and a man who passes it does that which is equal to taking a first-class degree at Oxford. Then we give him a special University training at the public expense for a certain number of years. When we send him to India we take care that he shall have judicial training and every Magistrate is compelled to state in writing, not only the decisions he gives, but the reasons on which these decisions are founded, and they are submitted to a Superior Court for revision, and alteration if need be. I am simply giving these details to the House to show the means we take to secure the just and fair administration of justice in India. Now, what do we do in Ireland? Is there any parallel between the administration of justice in Ireland and its administration in England, or Scotland, or the colonies, or India? I am not going to say a single word reflecting on the personal character of any Resident Magistrate—I am dealing with a system, and I do not hold the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. A. J. Balfour) responsible for that system. He found it when he came into Office, and it is one of the evil results of English rule in Ireland that the system exists. Although the right hon. Gentleman has defended it with unswerving fidelity to the men over whom he has been set, it would be a mistake for us in dealing with it to regard it as an accident of the present Administration. I have in my hand a Return respecting the Resident Magistrates in Ireland. It was moved for by the hon. Member for the Rushcliffe Division of Notts (Mr. J. E. Ellis) last year, and I find from it there were then 75 Magistrates in Ireland, who are receiving the grant provided for by this Vote. I call the attention of the House to the composition of this body. Only 14 of the Resident Magistrates have the slightest ostensible connection with the legal profession. In the 14 I include not only gentlemen who have been barristers-at-law, theoretical or practising, but one gentleman who kept all the terms for the Bar, but "for family reasons was not called." I have also included gentlemen who served in the Army after they had been at the Bar. I do not think it requires much knowledge to know what that means. At all events it is a very fair presumption that men who did that were not much fascinated by or attracted to the legal profession. Well, then, there are 24 ex-officers of the Army, 22 ex-officers of the Constabulary, and 15 gentlemen, who are variously described, some as "Hon. Secretary to the Tipperary Agricultural Society," "In the Revenue, Police and Superintendent Departments," "On the Commission of the Peace for several years," and so on. One gentleman is described as an Army tutor. Now, let me ask the House what these gentlemen have to do. Here we can bring the matter more closely home to the present Administration. It is under the present Chief Secretary's legislation that there has been thrown upon these gentlemen some of the most difficult legal duties which possibly can fall on any Court. You have deprived the people of Ireland of the protection of juries, which is given in other parts of the Kingdom, and you have devolved upon the Resident Magistrates the functions not only of Judges, but of juries. I will quote one sentence from one of the greatest authorities we have on criminal jurisprudence. He says—

"Perhaps few things are left so doubtful in the Criminal Law as the point at which the combination of several persons in a common object becomes illegal."

Well, this delicate and difficult question of Criminal Law has been handed over to these 75 gentlemen, of whom only 14 are in any way competent to decide a legal question. What do these gentlemen cost? I know the Chief Secretary will say, "The House of Commons does not vote enough money for me to get the article which India, and the colonies, and Scotland and England get." I have heard him say, "I cannot with the Vote that you supply provide myself with perfectly competent men." I am rather doubtful about that. The Vote is 20 Magistrates at £675, 32 at £550, and 20 at £425. In addition, each receives £100 as travelling allowance, and something more than £100 for their personal and travelling expenses. Judging of Irish salaries by English salaries, applying the test that an Irish Judge of the Supreme Court receives about two-thirds of the salary paid to an English Judge. I think if an Irish barrister receives two-thirds of the salary which is paid to an English Stipendiary Magistrate, the proportion is pretty well observed, and to-night we shall vote to the Irish Resident Magistrates considerably higher salaries than two-thirds of what is generally paid in England to Stipendiary Magistrates, excluding the Metropolis. In addition to these salaries a large number of these gentlemen are in receipt of Army pensions. I concede to the Chief Secretary that we ought to provide sufficient money. This House has never been niggardly in Irish administration. These Irish Estimates are monuments of extravagance. The cost of the Government of Ireland is a great deal too large. When the Chief Secretary obtains from this House, practically without discussion and objection, the most liberal allowances for the Constabulary and every branch of his administration, I am sure the House would not grudge him money to enable him to give the people of Ireland proper administration of justice. Whether we are Home Rulers or Unionists we must be agreed upon, this that the people of Ireland are entitled to a competent Judicial Bench, and until the Chief Secretary comes down to the House and asks for a sum which will enable him to appoint competent qualified men, and the House refuses him such a sum, he has no right to shield himself behind the supposed zeal for economy. Now, how do these gentlemen discharge their duties? The Chief Secretary may say they do their work satisfactorily. I have seen, again and again, in speeches of the Chief Secretary, statements that the appeals which have been made from the decisions of the Resident Magistrates are a very fair indication of the admirable manner in which their duty is discharged. We have been told that a very large number of cases have been heard by Resident Magistrates, and that there have been very few appeals. I have got the Judicial statistics for 1888. In that year there were 1,082 convictions under the Crimes Act. There were 201 appeals. You may say that that is a small proportion, and that there is a prima facie presumption that the decisions have been satisfactory. But go a little further, and you find that by the astute manner in which the mode of appeal was dealt with 697 cases were not appealable against. The sentences were below the mark carrying the right of appeal. As a matter of fact, there were only 385 cases which could be appealed against, and in 201 of the 385 cases, appeals were made. In 70 cases, or in 33 per cent. of the cases appealed against, the appeals were successful. I believe that is quite as high, if not higher, than any similar effort in this country. A few days ago the hon. Member for the Rushcliffe Division (Mr. J. E. Ellis) obtained a Return up to the 31st of March, 1890. There have been 769 convictions; 204 could not be appealed against, leaving only 565 that could be appealed against. 233 were appealed against, and in 72 cases the appeals were successful—again 33 per cent. I think that is very fair evidence of the effect of the appeals. Let me bring under the notice of the Committee one or two cases. I am not one of the Members who have been to Ireland, but the reports I have read in the Times, for example, fully confirm my opinion as to the unsatisfactory nature of the system, and prove the incompetency of the men who have been put into these positions. But I also rely for a good deal of my Irish information upon what I think is one of the ablest provincial newspapers, the Manchester Guardian. With the permission of the Committee, I will read a few sentences from the account given by the special correspondent of the Manchester Guardian of what he saw in Ireland upon the trial of my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Cork (Mr. W. O'Brien). He said—

best answer to a man in such perplexity would be to take him to a town where a political trial is proceeding and bid him 'Mark, learn, and inwardly digest.' He would see much to astonish him. Passing by the hotel patronised by the landlord party, he would probably observe a group consisting of the Magistrates who were to try the case, the Magistrates who were to command the police and the troops, several police officers with swords and revolvers, several officers of the Army, the counsel and solicitors for the Crown, and, to protect the whole party, a plain clothes detective. That, at least, is the sight which I saw last night, and it is a sight I have often seen in Ireland."

"Turning out this morning after 10 o'clock I found great preparations for meeting the enemy—I beg pardon, I mean our Irish fellow-subjects.—The hussars had saddled their horses, made ready their carbines, and were waiting the signal to mount. The men of the Welsh Regiment were seeing to their accoutrements and trying whether the locks of their rifles worked well. Police—some armed with rifles, others with batons—were pouring in from country stations, and those encamped in the town were preparing their weapons. In all 110 police, 34 hussars, and 60 infantry soldiers were present to make it quite certain that respect for the law is completely restored in Ireland."

The correspondent then gave some details of the trial, and proceeded—

"The Magistrates who were to try a Member of Parliament on a highly complicated charge which would test the acumen of the most learned and skilful judge were Mr. Irwin, a promoted officer of the police, and Colonel Caddell, an ex-soldier. By no possibility could either of these gentlemen have had any legal training worth speaking of, and if an intricate question of law were to arise they were bound to go slap-dash at their conclusion. Now it turned out that the question they had to try was in a singular degree one which the most cultivated lawyer would have faced with hesitation. The charge in the summons was that Mr. O'Brien and Mr. Gilhooly had entered into a criminal conspiracy to induce certain persons not to fulfil their legal obligations. Amplified by Mr. Ryan, Q.C., the prosecuting counsel, the formal charge meant this—that Mr. O'Brien and Mr. Gilhooly had delivered speeches at Clonakilty, the object of which was to put pressure on Mr. Smith-Barry to desist from his Ponsonby estate operations by inducing his tenants to withhold their rents."

The hon. Member has already alluded to the evidence given in the case, and certainly there was perjury on the part of the police officer, who pretended to have taken shorthand notes. Writing later, the correspondent said—

"A wretched and miserable farce is just over. I suppose that no man with the slightest legal training—I will go further, and say no man with common sense—could have sat in Court this day and have come away without being convinced that wherever the interests of the landlords are concerned impartial justice cannot be expected from Irish Resident Magistrates."

I have given the Committee some details of the case in order to show how justice is administered in the eyes of an independent observer. I desire now to refer to the attitude of the Irish Magistracy towards Members of Parliament. The Chief Secretary says that if Members of Parliament break the law they should be prosecuted the same as other people, and there I agree with him. But the point in which I differ from him is that Members of Parliament should not be punished because they are Members of Parliament, and that is the crux of the Irish situation. I put it to Gentlemen opposite who have judicial instincts whether after the strong, powerful, and excited speech of the hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon) to-night, in which speech he mentioned by name certain of the Resident Magistrates of Ireland, it would be decent in case of any alleged infraction of the law by him—I will not put it stronger—that he should be tried by the men he has denounced to night? Is it human to expect justice under such circumstances? Would it be considered fair to the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh (Colonel Saunderson), for instance, that he should be tried for anything he may have said or done, by a Court composed of Gentlemen below the Opposition Gangway? The Irish Resident Magistrates assume that they are part of the great army in the controversy which is now going on, that they are fighting under a distinguished and able general, and that their policy and aim is not the administration of justice, but the winning of a political victory against their political opponents. Let us take the case of the prosecution of the Rev. Mr. Crawley, a Roman Catholic curate, on the charge of having intimidated a Protestant rector. I think a little common sense would suggest to any impartial spectator that where a Catholic clergyman is accused of intimidating a Protestant clergyman, or where a Protestant clergyman is charged with intimidating a Catholic clergyman, or any other clergyman, a good deal of caution should be exercised in dealing with the case, a case which evidently, in the first instance, is not entirely disconnected with sectarian rivalry. But I am not going into the case. I understand it was a case of strong language; and, as a friend said to me the other day, any English Magistrate would have dismissed it. Captain Welsh and Mr. Cecil Roche were the two Judges in the case. Captain Welsh said the defendant was represented as being in a position to sway the people of the district. As the language he addressed to the people carried great weight the Magistrates had no difficulty in arriving at the conclusion that the Rev. Mr. Hopley and Sergeant Burke were "intimidated, and they sentenced the defendant to a month's imprisonment in each of the cases. Would any English Magistrate have sentenced the defendant to a month's imprisonment? Captain Welsh added that, to prevent the recurrence of the use of such language in the future, they would bind the defendant over in one surety of £40, and two of £20 each, to be of good behaviour, after the expiration of his sentence, for 12 months. In default of finding those surties he was to go to gaol for six months. I call that a travesty—a prostitution of justice. But that evidently did not come up to the requirements of Mr. Cecil Roche, who said—

"The defendant was a very remarkable man. Of considerable power of mind, of splendid physique, he had acted kindly towards his parishioners, who were an ignorant, wild set of people, half mountaineers, half seafaring men. Rightly and properly, he had great influence over them. The part Father Crawley had taken between landlord and tenant was praiseworthy and creditable, but his intense egotism had led him astray."

Fancy Members of Parliament being convicted for intense egotism! Mr. Cecil Roche evidently regards himself as dictator. Such words would never be used in English or Scotch Courts. If any Magistrate acted like Mr. Cecil Roche, the Lord Chancellor would immediately have him removed. The Resident Magistrates have no knowledge of law, and do not appreciate the elementary principles of justice. They are in the thick of a great political fight, and are conscientiously convinced that the policy of the right hon. Gentleman opposite is the best policy for Ireland, and that advocated on these Benches the worst; but they are not qualified men to steer an even keel in a country where agrarian disputes are the main source of all criminal trouble. These Magistrates connected with, influenced by, belonging to, one class, are not competent to deal out even-handed justice, and the result of their action proves it. What you have said a priori would happen, has happened, in almost every case brought before us. The other night the Chief Secretary made a startling admission. I admire him for having the courage of his convictions. He never shrinks from a paradox, however it may turn against him, or stays to fence with qualifications of the case he makes in his defence.

"It may, he said, be the result of three centuries of mis-government. I form no opinion on that, but the condition of Ireland is such that practically three-fourths of the people cannot be trusted to keep their oaths as jurymen on a trial, and, therefore, a system of procedure unknown in this country had been pursued by successive Governments in Ireland."

Is he going to say the same thing to-night; is he going to say it is impossible to trust the people of Ireland, and hence it is necessary to adopt the system of administration of justice? Is it a necessity in Ireland that we should autocratically and despotically administer justice, shutting the people out from their share in the administration, relying on administration by Magistrates alone? Then I appeal to the right hon. Gentleman to have competent Magistrates, men like those whom we send to India and to the colonies, and those whom we have in England and in Scotland, men apart from all political prejudice, so that they will show to the people of Ireland that, no matter whether they have Home Rule or rule at Westminster, wherever the Queen's power extends justice will be fairly and impartially administered. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary has said that he is striving for principles which lie at the root of civilisation. There is a greater principle than he contends for which lies at the root of all civilisation and society, and that is the pure and impartial administration of justice. In that consists the condemnation of the present system, which we so much deplore, and are trying to put an end to. Whether we succeed or fail—I do not wish to mix this question up with Party politics—I make one more appeal to him, not to defend the present system, but to ask the House of Commons to help him to remedy what is a national danger and a national disgrace.

(7.5.) THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): Every one who has heard the speech just delivered by the right hon. Gentleman will agree that it is not an unwelcome interruption to the ordinary course of invective in this Debate against Her Majesty's Government. The right hon. Gentleman has tried, and successfully tried, to keep the question of politics out of sight, and has asked me to do the same. The right hon. Gentleman has made no personal attack on the Government, who can defend themselves, or upon individual Magistrates, who cannot defend themselves, and, for my own part, I will endeavour in the observations I have to make to follow the example which the right hon. Gentleman has set. The right hon. Gentleman began by saying that politics ought not to be allowed to enter into any question connected with the administration of the law in Ireland. In one sense of that recommendation every human being who heard, and every human being who may read those words will, I am sure, cordially agree. That the course of justice should be diverted, if only by a hair's breadth, to serve the interests of any political Party, would be a horrible and disgraceful thing; but if the right hon. Gentleman means, by what he has said, that the administration of the Criminal Law in Ireland, in the state of opinion of the Irish people as they were now led in certain parts of Ireland, is to be kept wholly independent of political objects which the commission of crime is intended to attain, that, I think, is not at present possible. The right hon. Gentleman has argued throughout upon the hypothesis that the political objects of a great Party in Ireland are wholly independent of the Criminal Law and its administration. He has argued as if it had never occurred to anybody in Ireland to commit a breach of the Common Law or the Statute Law, in order to gain a political object. I do not wish to introduce more controversial subjects than I am obliged; but the right hon. Gentleman knows that, whether rightly or wrongly, the Government do not follow that opinion, but are forced to the melancholy conclusion that political objects in Ireland for the last 10 years have been aimed at by criminal methods. As long as that unhappy state of things continues, so long as political objects are arrived at by criminal methods, so long will trials which ought to be purely criminal trials, and abstracted entirely on the part of the audience as well as the Judge from all political considerations, be attended with those unfortunate symptoms which the right hon. Gentleman has described, of an excited mob and disgraceful scenes in the streets, which have, unfortunately, so often accompanied the administration of justice in Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman asks me how it is possible and legitimate to try, for example, the hon. Member for East Mayo before one of the Magistrates he has so cruelly aspersed in his speech. I admit that the fact that the administration of Criminal Law is—through no fault of ours—mixed up with politics, is a great misfortune and a difficulty. But because the hon. Member for East Mayo chooses to make this sort of attack on the Magistrates, is he to be allowed to break the law in Ireland with impunity? I take a purely hypothetical case never likely to occur. I trust the hon. Member will never come into collision with the administration of the Criminal Law; but supposing that the hon. Member, in carrying out his political object, does resort to methods regarded as criminal by the law of the country, is he not to be tried because he has thought fit, in the exercise of his duty, to make a violent and, I am bound to add, a discreditable attack upon certain Magistrates?

MR. H. H. FOWLER: I did not say that he was not to be tried, but that he should be tried by an impartial tribunal.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: That is to say, it only rests with the hon. Member to attack every tribunal—and to do him justice, I think he has attacked every tribunal in turn. Attempts were made in these Debates yesterday to attack the High Court, and this evening to attack the County Court Judges, attacks which were only prevented by the ruling of the Chairman, and, therefore, the right hon. Gentleman will see that if his principle is to be carried out, an hon. Member will only have to add to a breach of the law a violent attack in this House on the tribunal which would have to adjudicate, and he will secure immunity for himself. I have only taken the case of the hon. Member for East Mayo, because it has been cited by the right hon. Gentleman. I do not assume that the hon. Member contemplates any breach of the Criminal Law. The right hon. Gentleman asks us to apply to this system in Ireland the test of experience. I agree with the right hon. Gentleman that that is the proper test to apply. If experience shows that the present system in Ireland works tolerably well, I presume that the case will fail that we ought, by spending a great deal more money, to get a class of men who will not serve at the present salaries. In order to see whether, in a normal condition of society, the existing system of Magistrates works well, we have only to look at that part of Ireland which is in a normal state, and I maintain that in Ulster, or, at all events, in those parts of Ulster which are not disturbed (I am aware that there is a certain amount of disturbance in Donegal), the system works admirably. It is only when, in the exercise of their duty, through no fault of their own, politics are connected with these breaches of the Criminal Law, that it is alleged that the Magistrates fail. The right hon. Gentleman says that they have to deal with a very difficult law, and that they have no legal training. For my own part, I am not prepared to admit that in England experience shows that men of the same class as the Resident Magistrates, military men and others, are incapable of dealing with such matters. How many Chairmen of Quarter Sessions are old officers? The right hon. Gentleman assumes that experience in the Army for a good many years renders a man incapable of performing such duties. For my own part, I maintain that some of the best Chairmen of Quarter Sessions have had precisely the same kind of legal training as these Resident Magistrates. The right hon. Gentleman says the law which these Resident Magistrates have to administer is very difficult, especially the law of conspiracy, but Chairmen of Quarter Sessions have also to administer the law of conspiracy. ["No, no!"] Of that I do not speak with confidence, but I refer to the argument of the right hon. Gentleman that the administration is difficult. We have heard a great deal of the right of appeal, and the right hon. Gentleman has reminded the Committee that there is no right of appeal from a conviction where the sentence is below a month. But on a point of law, whatever the sentence may be, there is an appeal to a Court which the right hon. Gentleman will admit is competent—namely, the Court of Exchequer or the Queen's Bench—by case stated. I have no doubt that appeals on points of law have been taken exactly in those cases where, in the opinion of the defendants' counsel, the Resident Magistrates had shown themselves weakest in law. Since the passing of the Crimes Act to July 1, 1890, there have been 25 appeals to the Court of Exchequer or the Queen's Bench by cases stated. Of these 25 cases, obviously those in which the Resident Magistrates were considered weakest, only three were reversed, and the remaining 22 were affirmed. Therefore, I say that, looking to past experience of the law administered by these gentlemen, it is not at all so weak as the right hon. Gentleman would lead the Committee to believe. The right hon. Gentleman has examined the cases in which there have been appeals on the facts, but I was not quite able to follow the right hon. Gentleman's figures. According to a Return furnished I find that from November, 1888, to June, 1890, 1,393 cases were tried. The number of appeals lodged in that period was 256, and of these only 18 were reversed on appeal. That is a proof that, on the facts, as well as on the law, experience demonstrates that these tribunals are competent, fair, and honest tribunals.

MR. H. H. FOWLER: The right hon. Gentleman has left out the cases of reductions of sentences.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: There were, no doubt, some 60 cases in which there were reductions of sentence. But with respect to those it must be remembered that two Courts of co-ordinate jurisdiction often pass different sentences on cases apparently similar. But such differences of opinion by no means demonstrate that the Court of first instance did not do its duty. As my right hon. and learned Friend (the Attorney General for Ireland) reminds me, on appeal the cases were re-heard, and therefore evidence not before the Court below might be, and probably was in most instances, called in the Court above, and, further, that in several cases the sentences have been increased for the very purpose of giving a right of appeal. Therefore the mere fact that a sentence was reduced on appeal by no means demonstrates that the Court of first instance did not do its duty. I pass from that general criticism on Courts of first instance in Ireland to certain specific allegations made by the hon. Members for East Mayo and North-East Cork. The hon. Member for East Mayo accuses the Government of having broken their pledges in not having regularised the position of the Divisional Commissioners by Act of Parliament. Is there any human being who, in the present state of public business, would do anything by Act of Parliament which could be done in any other way? Would it be common sense to come for an Act when we found that it was unnecessary for us to do so? The hon. Gentleman said such a Bill would have been met with the same kind of resistance as the Bill for the appointment of an Assistant Under Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant was met with. If that is so, the Government were justified in taking the obviously rational course of avoiding the difficulty by not coming to Parliament at all. The hon. Gentleman then proceeded to make a most violent attack, and exhausted even his budget of invective upon Colonel Turner. But when it all comes to be analysed it amounts to this. Colonel Turner lived with Mr. Stacpoole, who was a landlord in Clare. On account of that unforgiveable offence he has been described as a man who acted as Mr. Stacpoole's lackey, who is unworthy of the confidence of the Government, who ought to be dismissed on the earliest possible occasion, and who is a proper target for the ordinary arrows of Nationalist invective. Why should not Colonel Turner stay in Mr. Stacpoole's house? Is every man who stays in a country house the lackey of his host? Is every man who stays in a country house incapable of doing justice? Is it an iniquity to use the carriage of your host to go to a neighbouring town? Incredible as it may seem to hon. Members who were not in the House when the hon. Member made his speech, that is one of the chief counts in the indictment against Colonel Turner. He drove from Mr. Stacpoole's residence into Ennis in Mr. Stacpoole's carriage! Monstrous enormity! Horrible iniquity! Ireland indeed requires Home Rule when such things as these are done in that unhappy country.

MR. DILLON: Do we understand the right hon. Gentleman to say that he approves of the action of Colonel Turner in becoming an inmate of the house of a land agent in County Clare, in the then condition of the county?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Colonel Turner has never asked me whether I approved or not, and I think it would be grossly impertinent if I interfered in such a matter by expressing any opinion at all. The hon. Gentleman appeared to be driven to rely on his attack on the Irish Magistracy, on some old and some very hypothetical incidents. He gave a long account of what happened seven or eight years ago in County Mayo in connection with a Resident Magistrate, since dead. That might have been a good thing to bring up on the Estimates seven or eight years ago, but it is not a good thing to bring before the Committee now, because it can afford them no guide as to the course they ought to pursue with regard to the present Estimates. The hon. Gentleman then related what occurred to him at Tipperary. He said he was talking to some friends when Colonel Caddell ordered the police to draw their batons and charge. The hon. Gentleman said the police did not obey their orders, and so nothing happened. But supposing, the hon. Gentleman said, something had happened, then Colonel Caddell would have had to try the case of an injury inflicted in obedience to his own orders. I think the hon. Gentleman in stating this hypothetical case has fallen into several serious errors. Colonel Caddell did not order a charge; the police did not disobey his orders, and if batons were not drawn on that occasion it was because the police followed strictly the orders given by Colonel Caddell.

MR. DILLON: I heard the order to draw batons given myself.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I believe I have stated the facts as I have been told them by Colonel Caddell; but, at any rate, Colonel Caddell gave no direction which would have justified the police in batoning the hon. Gentleman or his friends. Then the hon. Member said, supposing he had been brought before Colonel Caddell as the result of what might have happened? The hon. Gentleman and his friends have said over and over again that the utmost care ought to be taken not to mix up executive and judicial functions. With that I agree, and every effort is made by the Irish Government not to allow the man who has executive functions to perform to adjudicate on the cases arising out of that executive action. It is in order to pursue that rule that it is necessary to make Resident Magistrates leave one district and go into another.

MR. W. O'BRIEN: How does the right hon. Gentleman explain the case of Nunan and Hogan, in which Colonel Caddell combined the two functions?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The two women referred to by the hon. Member were bound over by Colonel Caddell to keep the peace on a day subsequent to the disorder in which they were concerned. Colonel Caddell could have performed that operation on the spot. He preferred to do it next day, and he did it next day. The facts of that case, therefore, do not bear out the contention of the hon. Member. No Resident Magistrate has ever ordered a baton charge and then directed a prosecution of those charged.

MR. E. HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.): Yes; Mr. Roche did on three occasions.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Member is mistaken.

MR. E. HARRINGTON: No, I am not mistaken. It occurred in my own constituency. I know Mr. Roche quite as well as you.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The other chief case brought against Colonel Caddell was in connection with the funeral of a man named O'Dwyer. The hon. Member accused the police of violating the graveside, of desecrating the feelings of the relatives of the dead, and of behaving in a way in which no one in a civilised country ought to behave. I will remind the Committee of the facts connected with that funeral. If it had been an ordinary funeral, merely an occasion on which the relatives committed to the earth the body of one who had been dearly connected with them, and chose that occasion for the display of natural emotion, interference by the police would have been monstrous. But was this so? Does the hon. Member claim immunity for a funeral when it is made the occasion of a political demonstration? I think that the hon. Member will feel it to be absurd to put forward any such claim. It had been published abroad that the hon. Member himself was going to the funeral, and that other political friends would be present. There were 12 policemen told off to protect the reporter on that occasion. There were nine reporters not connected with the police present. On this sacred and solemn occasion, therefore, there were nine reporters, I presume, of the Nationalist Press who had come to the grave not to make public the family grief, but in order to take down the speech which the hon. Member might deliver and publish his words all over Ireland with a political object. I am far from saying that the action of the police on that occasion was necessary, but to describe it as a desecration of the grave is surely absurd. There was no attempt to interfere with anyone present.

MR. W. O'BRIEN: Yes. They shouldered the people out of the way.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The police were there because they believed, on good evidence, that this was a political demonstration, and whether they were right or wrong, whether they were necessary or unnecessary, I maintain that the attacks which have been made are utterly outrageous and beyond the merits of the case. There have been cases in which graves have been desecrated and funeral processions interfered with. The other day when a policeman was burying his child in Tipperary the unfortunate mother and father, standing by the grave-side, were assaulted by stones.

MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): That is false.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: As they were standing by the grave they were assaulted with stones thrown by the roughs of Tipperary. I call such conduct as that interfering with the last rites of the dead, and in a manner which is disgraceful and discreditable. Some moderation, however, might be shown by hon. Gentlemen in the language which they use. The hon. Member for East Mayo not only denounced in the most violent language the character of the Magistrates with whom he has been brought into conflict, but he announced his intention of raking up details of their private life, and of dragging out anything which he thought could be twisted into an accusation against them. I have never listened with greater pain to any speech delivered than to this one. I think it most discreditable to the hon. Member who made it. As for Colonel Caddell, who has been made the object of a vituperative attack by the hon. Member for East Mayo and the hon. Member for the Rushcliffe Division, who has used language which he would never dare to use outside the House, this Magistrate has nothing to fear from attacks of that kind. If the hon. Member wishes to rake up details about Colonel Caddell's private life I will give the hon. Member some assistance in the task he is undertaking. Colonel Caddell was 23½ years in the Royal Irish Fusiliers; he was an instructor of musketry for three and a half years, an Adjutant in Louth, Deputy Assistant Adjutant General in Belfast during the critical time of the riots; he served in the Soudan campaign of 1884, for which he received a medal and the Khedivial decoration. Colonel Caddell has served and is serving his country, and such attacks as have been made upon him this evening will do nothing to sully the reputation of a man like him. I do not ask hon. Members to moderate the attacks which they make on the Government or the officials in Ireland. Let them make what attacks they please, but surely the private life of those individuals might be sacred. Surely those who from the vantage ground of this House may say anything they please without being called to account for it, might feel that that privilege carries with it some duties; and it is discreditable not only to themselves, but to the cause they desire to serve, that they should seek to use the language of private calumny and private slander.

MR. DILLON: As a matter of personal explanation, I should like to say that nothing was further from my mind than that I should employ the vantage ground of this House to make an attack upon any one and which I should be afraid to repeat outside. When I attacked Captain Segrave I did so outside this House, and I shall do the same in the case of Colonel Caddell.

Mr. A. J. Balfour

*(7.40.) MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): The speech just delivered by the Chief Secretary of Ireland renders it very difficult for me to make the speech which I had intended to make on this occasion. I am bound to say that with a long experience in England I cannot conceive the possibility of police acting at funerals in the way which has been described to-night by the Chief Secretary himself without causing much exasperation and irritation by their presence, and I would suggest that it would be better far that one or two rash speeches should escape notice rather than that the people assembling to pay the last farewell to the remains of their friends should be insulted by the presence of the uniformed officers of the Crown. It was not, however, for that that I rose, but to deal with a case which was discussed two days ago, and which has not yet received any notice at the hands of the Chief Secretary or of the law officers of the Crown. It is the case of Mr. John Kelly, who was charged with conspiracy, and sent to gaol by Mr. Meldon and Colonel Waring for four months with hard labour. The speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton dealt with the difficulty of the law of conspiracy in a way which saves me the necessity of delivering some remarks I had intended to make. Lord Justice Jervis, one of the most eminent lawyers who ever sat in the Court of Common Pleas in this country, once said that the charge of conspiracy was one of the easiest to make and one of the most difficult to prove. If he had had the experience which we have had of the procedure before these Resident Magistrates, I think he would have come to the conclusion that it is quite as easy to prove as it is to make, especially if he had had any knowledge of the case which I am now discussing. There was not, so far as I am able to learn, a shadow of evidence upon which any reasonable jury would have convicted this gentleman of the charge of conspiracy. A charge of intimidation was preferred against him, but on that he was acquitted by the Resident Magistrates themselves. The general charge of conspiracy was proved by two speeches, one of which was made by Mr. O'Dwyer, who was in Mr. Kelly's company on the occasion of the proceedings which immediately led to his arrest. The speech itself was, however, made in Mr. Kelly's absence, and it was not suggested that Mr. Kelly could possibly have known anything about it until long after it was delivered. The second speech was one delivered by the hon. Member for North-East Cork, and Mr. Kelly certainly could not have known anything of that, because he was in gaol at the time of its delivery. Now, these were the only two speeches on which this charge of conspiracy was founded. It is, I think, necessary that a tribunal which deals with charges of conspiracy should be, from a common-sense point of view, a jury of twelve impartial men, and, from a legal point of view, a high judicial functionary beyond suspicion in dealing with such a case. But what have we here in this case? I say, without fear of contradiction, there was no attempt on the part of the Chief Secretary, who was present during part of the Debate the other night, or on the part of the Attorney General for Ireland, who was in the House the whole time, to answer the case made out by the hon. Member for one of the divisions of Dublin against Mr. Kelly's conviction. The case against Mr. Kelly did not involve one single overt act except those I am just about to put to the Committee. All that was shown against him was that, in company with Mr. O'Dwyer, he had gone on to the estate of the hon. Member for South Hunts, and that he had driven on an outside car to the houses of different tenants. There was not a particle of evidence of anything that happened at any one of those places. Of course, if you intend to assume that a man is guilty, and if you intend to convict him, I can quite understand that you may manufacture out of several harmless acts some conclusion in support of a conviction. But there was not a particle of evidence against Mr. Kelly. He went, no doubt, into several of the tenants' houses. It was not alleged that any language was used by him in any of the cases save one. In that one case he appears to have talked with the wife of one of the tenants just outside the house, and the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, who has carried espionage in Ireland to an extent utterly unknown in the history of that unfortunate country, was served to this extent by a constable who was hiding behind a hedge, and who stated he heard the woman say: "This is the real campaign ground about here;" that Mr. Michael O'Dwyer, who was in company with Mr. Kelly said, "Yes, that is the woman to fight;" while Mr. Kelly rejoined, "I find that women are a great deal more determined for us than are the men." Now, the only possible portion of the phrase on which there could be a shadow of defence for saying that any sane man could come to the conclusion that a conspiracy existed was contained in the words "for us." What did "for us" mean? What ought it to have meant? What ought the Magistrates to have imported into the meaning? What would a jury have imported into it? Would they have imported the language of the hon. Member for North-East Cork delivered at a time when Mr. Kelly was in gaol? Would they have imported into it the speech of Mr. O'Dwyer delivered some time previously, also in Mr. Kelly's absence? I say it would have been impossible to get an English jury or an English Magistrate to convict under circumstances of that kind. But the Resident Magistrates, having found a general conspiracy in the speech of the hon. Member for North-East Cork, which, I believe is the very speech to which he drew attention in the earlier part of this evening, and having found also a conspiracy in the speech of Mr. O'Dwyer, they import Mr. Kelly into that conspiracy, because he happens to have used the words "for us" in a careless way to a woman who was using language quite natural on the part of a woman in that position. Rightly or wrongly, no doubt there is a conflict in that district between landlord and tenant, and it is a conflict of a most bitter kind. It is not a conflict brought about by the hon. Member for North-East Cork, or by any other hon. Member. It is a conflict which began unfortunately before they were born, and it arose out of a bad state of things which has long prevailed in Ireland. I mentioned on one occasion on which I addressed this House how much I had been struck by some articles in Blackwood for 1844, 1845, and 1846, dealing with the state of things between landlord and tenant in Ireland at that time. You might reprint those articles as descriptive of what is happening in that country to-day. The only difference is that now you have less crime, fewer murders, less moonlighting and outrage, and that is due to the hope put into the minds of the tenantry by the hon. Members for East Mayo and North-East Cork and their colleagues—a hope which induces them to act within the law, because they believe that sooner or later some kind of justice will be achieved for them. Mr. Kelly was found guilty of conspiracy by two Resident Magistrates. In England, over and over again, Judges, when trying cases of conspiracy in which questions of politics might be imported, have warned juries to use the utmost care in weighing the evidence submitted to them. I understand the right hon. Gentleman to urge that he has a right, in cases in which criminal acts are committed for political objects, to resort to special methods for the purpose of dealing with them. I cannot help thinking that he has done much to lower the view which English people will take of Irish justice. I feel sure that the course which is being pursued, and which was pursued in the case of the hon. Member for East Mayo himself when he was brought within the grasp of the Resident Magistrates by the direct act of the Chief Secretary in proclaiming a district so as to bring it within the operation of the Crimes Act, is a course which in England induces English voters—and I believe will still more do so at future elections—to give a rough rule-of-thumb verdict of justice. It will induce them to say that as your Resident Magistrates treat men whom you describe as criminals, as political foes, they are straining the law in sending them to gaol, and as a consequence the English people will, by their verdict, take the political power which you misuse out of your hands.

(7.52.) Mr. E. HARRINGTON: Before the Chief Secretary leaves his place, I beg to give a most emphatic denial to his statement that Magistrates do not act judicially and executively at the same time. Unless the Chief Secretary has a shorter memory than we give him credit for, it must have been within his knowledge that cases have been brought to his notice in this House. Does the right hon. Gentleman forget the Vandeleur evictions? Did not Roche at these evictions take part in a baton charge, actually using a stick himself, and did he not afterwards sit on the fence and have the very persons he had batoned brought before him and sentenced to imprisonment? If there is any shame in the world the Chief Secretary, addressing the House amid grave and awful accompaniments, might have paused before he delivered himself of these sentiments. I will give my own case, which was brought to the notice of the Chief Secretary, not only by myself, but by my hon. Friend while I was in prison. Roche, who presided in the case, went out to the steps of the Court-house of Tralee and ordered a baton charge on the people who had ventured to cheer for me when I came out under arrest. Roche led the charge himself with a stick in his hand, and he never allowed me to go out of his sight until he had lodged me in gaol. The right hon. Gentleman will probably say that that is the reverse of the process that has already been referred to—that the Magistrate sat on the Bench first, and lugged his prisoner to gaol afterwards, but I have also brought to the Chief Secretary's notice the case in Dingle of the unfortunate man Ferriter, who was put in gaol time after time for the crime, as it was then, of selling copies of United Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman has said there has been no change in his policy—that there has been no change in the administration of the Crimes Act. Why, then, is Ferriter not in gaol to-day? He is still selling United Ireland. This man was brought before Mr. Roche and sentenced, and here also that Magistrate made a baton charge on the crowd, heading the police himself. Several men were arrested, and these men Roche at once proceeded to try. They were committed to prison, and Roche accompanied them and the man he originally tried, to Tralee, a distance of 34 miles. Can the right hon. Gentleman deny this fact? The right hon. Gentleman said I was mistaken. I was not. There are things which have caused our blood to boil and our flesh to creep. I, myself, have seen Resident Magistrates ruthlessly and mercilessly leading these baton charges, and afterwards sitting in judgment on the cases of the very men they had attacked time after time. Instances of this kind have come before me, and I can, if the Chief Secretary challenges the fact, identify these cases by the dates and the particular sentences inflicted. It is a hard thing for an Irishman to trust himself to speak on these subjects. Our feeling is not so much one of hatred as it is of extreme loathing and contempt, and it is very hard for us, knowing how the Government are championed by the political supporters who sit behind the Front Bench, to keep our temper when these statements are made. I tell the right hon. Gentleman, born as I was among the Irish people, that I know them to have a strong sense of propriety in these matters, and that nothing more easily arouses their indignation than when they see those who have to administer the law, and are supposed to administer it equally, making common cause with those who side against them. The Irish people would spurn us if we showed the same partiality as the right hon. Gentleman wants the Resident Magistrates to show, and we claim that these men who are drawn from the off-shoots of landlordism should at least preserve the appearance of decency in the exercise of their functions.

* (8.15.) MR. BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich): I am almost ashamed to mention the trivial matters which I am about to bring before the Committee after listening to the expressions of honest indignation which have fallen from the hon. Gentleman who has just addressed the House. I can myself bear testimony to what the hon. Gentleman has said with regard to the partiality displayed by the Irish Magistrates, and I will give an instance. In April last I was on the Ponsonby Estate, during the evictions managed by Colonel Turner. I saw on a police car the agent for the Property Defence Association, and I am sorry the hon. Member for South Hunts is not in his place, as I should like him to hear what I have to say. It struck me with shame that the representative of one of the parties to the dispute on the estate should be honoured and protected by the authorities in that way; and I protested against it to Colonel Turner, saying it was a scandal that that person should be allowed so to use the public property. I am glad to say that Colonel Turner had sufficient sense of right to prevent a repetition of this display on the following day, and I am also glad to tell the Committee, because I sympathise with the people, that not a man was to be found in the Youghal district who would drive that individual. I remember on that occasion seeing the leader of the tenants rudely thrust back when he wished to enter premises from which a family was being evicted. It was his duty to take the number of the family so as to arrange for the accommodation they might require in order to protect them from the weather. He was, however, thrust back by the police, and that, too, from a place where he had a legal right to be. A lady who was with us, and whose warm-hearted services to the people are deserving of all praise—Mrs. Byles, of Bradford—protested against the treatment of that young man. What happened? The Police Inspector, Inspector Hill, whose name is now familiar to us, declared that that person ought not to be permitted to enter the premises because he had been in prison. An appeal was made to Colonel Turner, and he replied that if the English ladies and gentlemen wished it the man should be admitted. Well, Sir, as an Englishman, I am ashamed to be represented in Ireland by men who can behave in that fashion. I know, from my experience in this House, that it is a waste of time for an English Member, not to speak of Irish Members, to complain of the conduct of the Irish Magistrates. No heed whatever is paid to us when we declare that the Irish Magistrates have broken the law. We are either not listened to or we are listened to with indifference when we complain of the brutality of these men. To my mind, it is a pity and a shame that English gentlemen should stoop so low as to make it appear, either by their speeches or their silence, that they believe their Colleagues in this House are capable of bearing false witness.

(8.7.) MR. J. O'CONNOR: If I were a friend of the Chief Secretary, I should have compassion on him, because he is called upon to defend the actions and whitewash the blackened characters of his subordinates in Ireland. I should feel sorry that his great abilities were called in play to defend and whitewash a man like Colonel Caddell, whose conduct towards a lady, under most disgraceful circumstances, must be characterised as that of a blackguard. A man who, when remonstrated with by a reverend clergyman in the streets of Tipperary, had no other answer to give to that educated gentleman than to stick his tongue out and make use of insulting language. I say that the action of the Chief Secretary, in whitewashing that blackguard, places him in a position for which his friends ought to feel the greatest compassion. In his defence of Colonel Caddell, he deemed it his duty to make a charge against the people of Tipperary, that they committed an assault upon the police on the occasion of a funeral of a child. I could not hesitate on the spur of the moment in crying out that that was false, and I now say that the statement was one of those official falsehoods which we are accustomed to listen to in this House. When I was last in Tipperary, not long ago, I made it my business to inquire into this matter, and, after continued investigation, I could find no man in Tipperary who ever heard a word about this assault on the police. I went to the spot where the assault was said to have taken place, and none of the neighbours knew or could tell me anything about it. I asked Father Humphreys to investigate the matter, and he willingly undertook the work, and I will now read to the Committee a letter which he wrote to me after he had made that investigation. He says:—

"My dear Mr. O'Connor, since telegraphing to you, I have heard of what happened at the burial of Constable Corcoran's child. No one but the police attended the funeral. When they were passing through the street, some little children of eight or nine years old cried out after them 'Balfour, Balfour' and whistled 'Harvey Duff.' This was the mob who stoned the constables whilst burying a child. The very small children here have a habit of crying out 'Balfour' when they see a body of police passing through the town. I saw a child five years old doing this on a day of eviction. If there was a mob throwing stones, how was it that no one was summoned?"

This, Sir, is a pertinent question. The police were present in sufficient force at the funeral of the child; doubtless there were policemen at every corner in Tipperary. Yet no one was arrested. Not a single charge was made against anyone, and no complaint was made until we heard a statement in this House in reply to a put up question on the part of the hon. Member for Tyrone. I deny that this shameful charge has any foundation in fact, or that any justification can be found for making it, and I demand an investigation into all the circumstances connected with it. If that investigation should take place I venture to assert that the people of Tipperary will come out of it with much greater credit than the officials of the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman has defended Colonel Caddell, and told us that he does not unite in himself the administrative and executive functions. Let me draw the right hon. Gentleman's attention to the sad and distressful case of the poor boy Heffernan, who was shot down in the streets of Tipperary by policemen who were under the command and direction of Colonel Caddell. In the course of the investigation which took place into that affair, it was proved that the police were not compelled to act as they did, and that an order had been issued that the greatest humanity, combined with prudence, should be exercised before any attempt was made to fire on the people, and that they should not fire until every other means of preserving their lives had been exhausted. It was proved in the case of the boy Hunt. A verdict of wilful murder was given against Carter. Informations were applied for, and Colonel Caddell, who commanded the police when this boy was killed, was one of the Magistrates who sat upon the Bench, and refused to grant informations against people who had been declared guilty of wilful murder by the Coroner's Jury. Why should the Irish people respect law and order when they find it ruthlessly set aside by the tools of the Government, and when they see the verdict of one of the oldest Courts known to the Constitution ignored? Allusion has been made to the invasion of the sacred rite of burial, in the case of O'Dwyer. It was carried out by Colonel Caddell, and it was a most disgraceful proceeding. My hon. Friend the Member for North-East Cork had intended to make a speech, and I ask the right hon. Gentleman, is his Government so bad, is the conduct of the Resident Magistrates so atrocious, is the course of the Executive so ruthless, that the criticisms of my hon. Friend could not be permitted? I come to another statement made by the right hon. Gentleman. He defended Colonel Turner from the charge brought against him by the Member for East Mayo, of having stayed at the house of Mr. Stappole, a local landlord. No matter how the Chief Secretary may exhaust his powers of rhetoric in defending Colonel Turner, we still hold that it is a disgraceful thing for a man in his position to have stayed with a local landlord. Why did the Land Commissioners give orders to the Sub-Commissioners never to accept the hospitality of anybody connected with the land of Ireland? Because they knew that to do so would be to forfeit the confidence of the Irish people. Is it not the fact that in England Inspectors of Private Lunatic Asylums do not accept the hospitality of those whose institutions they inspect? The Factory Inspectors in England, too, do not accept the hospitality of anyone who is connected with a factory. But in the case of Magistrates in Ireland, they can accept the hospitality of those in whose interests the law is administered in Ireland. This Colonel Turner, fresh from the table, with his legs just drawn from under the mahogany of his friend, Mr. Stappole, ordered his soldiers to advance upon the people, and I counted 80 men with bleeding heads after the fray. Yet the right hon. Gentleman expects the Irish people to respect law and order, as administered by these people, who accept the hospitality of landlords and agents. The manner in which the law is administered is illustrated by the remark of Colonel Carew, who said, "I do not care what the law is, but I do care about the instructions from Dublin Castle." Cheering for Mr. Gladstone is a crime to be punished, or calling a donkey by the name of Mr. Balfour, or winking at pigs at the fair, is a heinous offence. Indeed, the Magistrates have tortured the law so as to punish those whom they are obliged to declare innocent. Now, Sir; on the 2nd of July, last year, my hon. friend the Member for Mid Cork visited the town of Tipperary, and he was met by a number of people, who cheered him. The Police Magistrates considered that a very grave offence, and accordingly some 15 or 16 of these men, young fellows, were brought before the Magistrates. They were solemnly charged, and the case was investigated. The Magistrates retired to consult, and when they returned, one of the young men was dismissed, but with regard to the other 14 or 15, Mr. Meldon said they must stop such disorderly proceedings as cheering for the hon. Member for Mid Cork, and he ordered the defendants to find bail to be of good behaviour for 12 months, or go to gaol for two months. The defendants at once refused to give bail, and said they were ready to go to gaol. That is what I call a straining of the law by the Magistrates. I remember, Sir, reading of the crowd in Liverpool, on the occasion of a great trial, in which a woman was charged with poisoning her husband, expressing by groans its disapproval of the jury who found her guilty. People were so indignant at the verdict that they groaned at the jury and they groaned at the Judge; but there was no baton charge of the police, there were no arrests, no fines, and no imprisonment, and why? What was the difference between the two cases? The only difference was this, that the people who cheered for Mrs. Maybrick in Liverpool were Englishmen, and the men who cheered for Dr. Tanner in Ireland were Irishmen. The law was broken, if broken at all, as much in the one case as in the other. I have another case to refer to. There is in Tipperary a man of great influence and great respectability, although sometimes the Chief Secretary, as is his wont, tries to throw aspersions on his character. I allude to Mr. John Cullinane, who I might say is my premier constituent. His great offence in the eyes of the Magistrates is that he has great influence with the people." He has often been accused before the Magistrates, but the Magistrates have been obliged to admit that he used his best efforts to keep the peace, and to prevent riots taking place. Recently Mr. Cullinane was brought before Removables Irwin and Caddell, and charged with having taken part in an unlawful assembly. The unlawful assembly consisted in a procession of carts passing through the streets of Tipperary. These carts had been engaged throughout the day in removing earth from one place to another, in order to level the ground for the building of houses for the evicted tenants of Tipperary. The neighbours of these people of Tipperary had engaged in what they believed to be a charitable work. They were formed into a procession by Mr. Cullinane, who believed that would be the best and more orderly manner in which they could get out of the town, as it would prevent delay, it would prevent stopping at public houses, and it would ensure that no opportunity would be given to the police to baton the people. Well, he marched them through the town, and was charged in consequence with an unlawful assembly. The case was solemnly tried by Mr. Irwin and Colonel Caddell. Well, Colonel Caddell, the hero of the Chief Secretary, the warrior with medals and honors, who insults evicted tenants when they are helpless females, who sticks out his tongue at an educated and respected rev. gentleman who addresses a civil question to him—even he could not find that Mr. Cullinane was guilty of unlawful assembly. He said it was for them to consider whether such circumstances existed as put people of firm minds in dread and terror. They did not feel that they would be justified in coming to such a conclusion, and therefore they dismissed the charge of unlawful assembly. But on the evidence before them it appeared that this gathering was "immensely excessive." In other words, Mr. Cullinane was guilty in the eyes of the Magistrates of an excess of legality, because they declared that the assembly was lawful. He was thereupon ordered to find bail, himself in £100 and two sureties in £50 each, to be of good behaviour for 12 months, or in default to be imprisoned for six weeks. Of course, Mr. Cullinane, as an honourable man, would not admit he had been guilty of any offence. If he had given bail for his good behaviour it would have been an admission that he was of bad behaviour, and he therefore elected to go to gaol for six weeks. Thus the Magistrates used the Act of Edward III., not for the purpose of punishing those who are guilty of crime, but in order to put out of the way the enemies of landlordism as it at present exists, and the friends of the people whose only offence is that they are the political opponents of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary. I shall allude to only one other phase of this question. The Magistrates in Ireland have incited the police to the commission of violent acts, at the time young Heffernan lost his life there was also another man named O'Donovan who was shot down by the police. In reference to this case Mr. Cecil Roche said—

"I quite agree with the sentence of the Court, and I wish to say that in any other country in the civilised world had these men attacked the administrators of the law in the way they have, their lives might have been taken, and they (the police) would have been justified by the Government in taking their lives."

Now, Sir, that language was used by a man in a judicial capacity, and was addressed to a Force which is in a most excited state, and to men who, when they have deadly weapons in their hands are allowed to take drink to an extraordinary degree. In the trial alluded to by Mr. Cecil Roche, on that occasion, it was proved that the man who fired the shot was such a bad character in the eyes of the police that he was several times fined, according to his admission, for want of discipline and for drunkenness. This, taken in connection with language used in another case, is very significant. Mr. Bolton, Crown Prosecutor, said, in open Court, that he was sorry to hear it stated that the police had no right to defend themselves unless the Riot Act had been read three times. He declared that a more absurd statement had never been made and that whether or not the Riot Act was read, and even without command from their officers, the police were entitled to defend themselves with their weapons if attacked by civilians. Now, what I want to point out is, that these two speeches, when taken together, show design on the part of those administering the law in Ireland to incite the police to the commission of murder. After such language as that any constable may say, "I may shoot, maim, kill, bludgeon as much as I like; I have only to say my life is in danger, and whatever I do I shall be defended by Mr. Bolton, the Crown Prosecutor, and shall be acquitted by Mr. Roche, the Resident Magistrate." At the time he made the speech to which I have referred, Mr. Roche said that stones were "deadly weapons," hence we have it that if a small boy—an irresponsible child—hurls a stone at the police in Ireland, it may be taken as an excuse for turning round on a peaceful meeting of citizens in Tipperary, Kerry, or Cork, and firing volley after volley into them. I say that such language as that, coming from such men in authority, and used in the presence of men who are already in a state of excitement, is nothing more nor less than an incitement to murder. We are often told by the Chief Secretary and the Attorney General for Ireland, who sometimes acts as his lieutenant, that we have the law open to us in Ireland. I imagine these poor people going before Colonel Caddell or Mr. Cecil Roche—the latter holding his drum-head court-martial. After an eviction this Mr. Cecil Roche sits on a stone at the road-side, and, after his baton charges, having arrested people, tries them, and gives them six months' imprisonment. Imagine going before this gentleman and expecting to get justice. The Chief Secretary is fond of saying that the ordinary protection of the law is open to the poor people of Ireland. One man in Cashel, a discharged soldier, not long ago took the Chief Secretary at his word, having been seriously assaulted by a constable. It seems that some children were parading the streets, jeering at the police, and singing songs. The only people in the street besides the children were four men standing at a corner, one of whom was the discharged soldier. This man was assaulted by a policeman in a most wanton manner, and, relying on the word of the Chief Secretary, he brought an action against the constable for breaking a blackthorn stick across his head. It was proved that the assault had been committed, and one of the Inspectors was asked—

"Did the men at the corner do anything?"

The answer was—

"No, but I considered if they were allowed to remain they might do something."

The Magistrate heard the case, but the oath of the discharged soldier, who is yet liable to be called upon to shed his blood for his country, for he is in the Reserves, went for nothing, and that of the Inspector, who said that the four men, if they had been allowed to remain on the corner of the street, might have done something, was believed. The Magistrates, to whom we are asked to appeal for justice, dismissed the case against the police. Now, Sir, this case, which could be multiplied a hundred-fold, if it stood alone, would be enough to justify us in taking up the position that the Irish people cannot expect justice in Courts presided over by Resident Magistrates, for the reason that those Magistrates are all on one side in Ireland, that side being the landlords and land agents. That is the side of the Government, who are the friends of the landlords, and the people feel it is no use to expect justice from these Magistrates whose salaries we vote to-night.

(9.22.) MR. O'KEEFFE (Limerick City): The hon. Member who last resumed his seat gave several instances of police-misrule in Ireland. Every single county and city in Ireland is prolific in such instances, and were every Irish Member here to bring forward the cases that have come under his own immediate notice, I think this House would have to sit until the end of the year. The hon. Member referred to the friendly relations which exist between the landlords and Resident Magistrates in Ireland, and referred to the visit of a Resident Magistrate to a Tipperary landlord. Such a system as he described is, to my mind, fatal to respect for the law. As a practising Solicitor, I have seen letters from County Court Judges, declining on very high grounds to receive any entertainment from private landlords or noblemen in the districts over which they are the presiding Judges. I was particularly struck with the assertion of the Chief Secretary, that the law as regards intimidation and boycotting is the same in Ireland as in England. The right hon. Gentleman referred triumphantly to a case which was tried in Liverpool, and said the defendants in that case received a term of imprisonment for having taken part in boycotting practices. But the right hon. Gentleman was most careful to conceal the fact that, assuming the law in its outline to be the same in its administration and detail, there is an essential difference. The defendants in the Liverpool case were tried before a Judge and Jury, but all cases of intimidation and boycotting in Ireland have been tried before irresponsible Magistrates, specially appointed by the right hon. Gentleman. Take the case of Mr. John McHenry of the Limerick Leader. That gentleman was tried for having published an article in his newspaper relating to the intimidation of a certain member in the locality. He was brought before two Removable Magistrates, and received the inhuman sentence of nine months' imprisonment. Thereupon the Crown prosecutor, Mr. Murphy, whispered to the Magistrates, who thereupon added hard labour to the sentence. That fact can be proved by the evidence of hundreds of persons who were in Court, and it exclusively proves that the Magistrates only sit on the bench to do the behests of the right hon. Gentleman. Several references have been made to the action of the police towards public men in Ireland. About two weeks ago it was my duty to attend a meeting in the mountains. There were four or five Resident Magistrates at the meeting—Mr. Shannon amongst the number—and immediately I stepped off the car I was shadowed. Two policemen stayed by me, and a Sub-Inspector of Police, who represented the new-fangled department of the right hon. Gentleman, the Intelligence Department, followed me several hundred yards distant. We are justified in holding up this conduct of which we complain to public reprobation, and if we had the least chance of carrying our protest to that extent, we should be justified in refusing the salaries of those who use their position to insult the Irish people and their Representatives. The Vote will certainly not be carried with our approval. The Chief Secretary does not apply himself to any source of popular information to guide him in his administration. I do not refer to those matters in which he is in antagonism with Irish bodies; I refer to Grand Juries. He has stated he has no power over Grand Juries, but when we find that a gentleman holding the important office of High Sheriff was dismissed—

Mr. O'Keefe

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member must confine himself to matters relevant to the Vote.

MR. O'KEEFE: I pass from the allusion I was about to make. All I wish to convey is that the Chief Secretary has not used those avenues of information from popular bodies in Ireland which would lead to successful administration in Ireland. I will give an instance from an experience some two years ago in the city of Limerick, which, I think, has never been referred to in this House. A public meeting announced to be held was proclaimed by the Government the day before the meeting was appointed to be held, and there was the usual paraphernalia of Resident Magistrates, police and soldiers, all the pomp and circumstance of war, to prevent the legal exercise of their rights by the people. That evening a riot took place in the city. I will not enter into details, but it was shown in evidence before the Judge of Assize on a case arising out of claim for damages, that the riot and the damage originated with the action of the police themselves. But what I want in mentioning the circumstance is to give proof in support of my assertion that if the Executive would seek the advice of popular Representatives, they would not fall into the blunders they commit. The Resident Magistrates who on this occasion were the supreme destiny, who had the lives of the people in their hands for 24 hours, when they saw the state of turmoil and riot they had caused by their action, went quietly to the Mayor's office—to the man whose existence they had ignored on the previous day, and said—

"We know your influence, and if you will take over the peace of the city, we will all go away, and there shall be no more police seen in the streets."

They had come to appreciate the gigantic blunder they had made by insulting the people, and these doughty champions of law and order came cringing to the Mayor to induce him to take over the task of keeping the peace which they could not accomplish. I am glad to say the Mayor did as he was asked, the Police Force vanished, and there was no further disturbance. With regard to the particular matter which has been brought before the Committee the character of the Resident Magistrates, I can only say that I have never, in my magisterial experience, and I have had sometimes to associate with these gentlemen, observed any qualities that should invite the confidence of the Irish people. I never heard from them the expression of any lucid idea in law or fact. I remember once having to sit in judgment on a Resident Magistrate.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): Did you give him six months?

MR. O'KEEFFE: No, I did not. He was guilty of a culpable breach of law. Some flag was hanging out in the street; it waved between him and his allegiance to the right hon. Gentleman, and for the removal he was summoned for trespass. We were merciful to Resident Magistrates, and the Court fined him 5s., with the alternative of 14 days' imprisonment. Now, it is asserted that it is impossible for an Irish Magistrate to state a case for a Superior Court, but I know that I gave 15 reasons for the conviction, in each of which I was upheld by the Queen's Bench, although, on a technical ground, it was found the case did not come under the section of the Act. Whether you take the high policy of the Chief Secretary or the details of his administration, his Coercion Act, after four years' experience, is a miserable failure. Has it in any case shaken the allegiance of an adherent to the National cause; has it made one convert? Quite the contrary: its effect has been to intensify the eternal hostility of the Irish people to the system of the Chief Secretary. With all the force of our people's opinion behind us we shall contest that policy. We know that no matter what changes may be effected in Parties here, we know that our words and our actions are justified in the minds of the Irish people, and we know that when we go back to our constituents, any man among us who wishes to return here will not appeal to his constituents in vain. I think the Irish people appreciate the good services rendered by Irish Members who attend these discussions on the Estimates. By this means we show the failures of the right hon.

Gentleman's administration. The whole policy of the Chief Secretary has been an entire failure, and the Irish people will hail with delight the moment when the political extinction of the right hon. Gentleman and his Party is announced. On that day the black flag will be hoisted half-mast high over every gaol in Ireland.

(9.40.) MR. MAC NEILL: The Chief Secretary is always interesting when he assumes the high moral tone, and he has discharged all the vials of his wrath upon my hon. Friend the Member for East Mayo. In his strictures upon Resident Magistrates my hon. Friend was undoubtedly severe, but the great point of his severity was that every word he said was demonstrably true. If my hon. Friend has erred in his estimate of the characters of these Magistrates he has erred in good company. Archbishop Whateley, who had 30 years' experience of Ireland, said that the time of the Lord Lieutenant was occupied chiefly in trying to get the posts of Resident Magistrates for ruined gamblers or cashiered officers, and Lord Rosse, a Tory of the Tories, used language not a whit less strong than has been used to-night with reference to these Resident Magistrates, stating, for example, that the appointments were infamously jobbed, that no character seemed to be thought necessary for the post, and that half of those appointed had been habitual drunkards. My hon. Friend the Member for East Mayo made a brief allusion to some letters from applicants for appointments, which passed into our hands, and specimens of these were read to the House by an hon. Colleague in 1887. I lately was reading some of these, and they are worth reading. [An hon. MEMBER: And the dates.]—Dates! O'Neill Segrave was appointed in 1888, and that after being dismissed, branded as a swindler by the Cape Government. This is the first letter from a well-known Gentleman, the late Knight of Kerry, to Lord Carlisle, then Lord Lieutenant—

"My Dear Lord,—The kindness which your Excellency has shown me since I have had the honour of being known to you encourages me to apply to you on a subject deeply interesting to me, although I fear it will need all your kindness to excuse the presumption of the application. My brother (Stephen Fitzgerald) having but a small provision, my father applied to Lord Clarendon, when Lord Lieutenant, for a situation for him, and received an encouraging reply, with a conditional promise; but nothing having resulted therefrom, he continued to lead an idle life at home, and fell into habits injurious to himself and distressing to his family, who could not but lament to see considerable talents, united with an excellent natural disposition, completely going to waste. He has latterly, I rejoice to say, been leading a different life, and recently formed an attachment for a most interesting young Scotch lady, one, who especially in point of deep religious feeling, is all that could be wished for, and their union, so very desirable, is only delayed in reference to his financial position. Under these circumstances, I venture to ask your Excellency's kind aid in procuring a situation for him. That of Stipendiary Magistrate is one for which I think he would be extremely well qualified, as he has regularly and very efficiently discharged his duties as a J.P. in this parish and in the neighbouring district; but if that post be unattainable, some one of less value would be just now very acceptable. I really dislike more than I can well say thus troubling your Excellency in such a personal matter, but I feel at least that you will make great excuse for my so doing in a case where more than the temporal interests of an only brother are involved.

I have the honour to be, my dear Lord,

Your Excellency's very obedient and obliged Servant,

P. FITZGERALD.

(Knight of Kerry).'

MR. KELLY (Camberwell, N.): Will the hon. Gentleman mention the date of that?

MR. MAC NEILL: About a quarter of a century ago. But my contention is that instead of growing better these appointments have been growing worse. These appointments are not like good wine; they have not improved with age. And now let me give another specimen.

THE CHAIRMAN: The letters may have been amusing when first read, but to read them now offends against the rule against tedious repetition. Moreover, they are not relevant to the Vote.

MR. MAC NEILL: My only object is to prove my contention that bad as they were in those times they are worse now. I was about to read a letter from Lord Monck on behalf of his brother-in-law who desires an appointment, whose qualifications seem to have been that he was an ex captain in the 17th Lancers, not on good terms with his father, with nine children, and in embarrassed circumstances. I will not read the letter from Lord Monck, having in view your ruling, but I may refer to the appointment of Colonel Forbes, who is still, I believe, a Resident Magistrate. Here is the letter in which this gentleman is introduced:—

"62, Great King Street, Edinburgh,

January, 23rd, 1890.

My Dear Sir,—May I venture to introduce to you my cousin, Major Forbes, late of the Third Light Dragoons, a very distinguished officer at Sobrón? His military testimonials will speak for themselves. He is a candidate for one of two Stipendiary Magistracies in Ireland, where his brother, Colonel Forbes, has recently purchased property in County Galway. Their father commanded the 56th Foot. They are all Roman Catholics, but mostly gentlemanly and popular men. Major Forbes has been resident at Edinburgh.

Yours faithfully,

J. J. HOBSON, D.D.,

Merton College, Oxon."

Well, the application was successful. Colonel Forbes was the Resident Magistrate at Kildare, and at the Kildare Quarter Sessions, in April last, he was the defendant in three suits for goods supplied to his wife. His defence was that he was not liable because he had made a separate allowance for his wife, but it was stated in evidence that his wife had not received any allowance for three and a half years, and decree was given in each case against him. Surely that is not the sort of gentleman who ought to be a Judge of the political conduct of Irish Members. At the risk of tedious repetition, for I know it has been very often mentioned, I would recall the Committee to a statement made on the 17th May, 1887, by the Chief Secretary. In that statement the right hon. Gentleman expressly declared that an appeal should be given in every case from Resident Magistrates' decisions under the Coercion Act. But now he has withdrawn from that, and his Magistrates give short sentences to prevent appeals. Thus we have Mr. Redmond, the editor of a Wexford paper, sentenced to two weeks' imprisonment, and he asked to have the sentence increased to give right of appeal. That entreaty was refused. Who were the persons who indicted the sentences on these gentlemen? One was Mr. Considine, a gentleman of whose legal knowledge the Lord Lieutenant is satisfied, although he has never been called to the Bar. His coadjutor was a promoted policeman. It has been repeatedly urged that these Magistrates, these 14 lawyers, who are nothing but the sweepings of the library of the Four Courts, are selected because they will administer the law as between man and man. But the law which they do administer is one which cannot be tried by ordinary Magistrates at all. It can only be tried in this country in the Superior Courts before a Judge and Jury. It cannot be tried in a Court of Petty Sessions, and this duty in Ireland is reserved exclusively for Resident Magistrates. It is said that the same law prevails in Ireland as in England. Why, as I have already stated, in England tradesmen and operatives, according to declaration of the Home Secretary, are especially protected under the Workmen's Liability Act, whereas the Irish peasants are treated under laws entirely different from those affecting people of the same class and social condition in England. During the last 15 months there has been a development in the proceedings of the Resident Magistrates. I mean in connection with the novel provision of giving bail. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Stockton, when the matter was first brought forward, said that in all his experience he had never known of a case in which a man had been called upon to give bail for good behaviour when no crime had been committed. But what is the course in Ireland? The first person who was brought under the operation of this provision was the hon. Member for Mid Cork, who was taken before a brace of Removables, of whom one was Mr. O'Neill Segrave. These Magistrates stated that he was not guilty of the charge originally preferred against him, but they then produced a long document, on the strength of which they sent him to prison in default of giving bail for his good behaviour. Surely that is another instance of the inequality of English and Irish law. I have the authority of the Court for Crown Cases Reserved in England for saying that no person can be held over to be of good behaviour for committing no offence. A case recently occurred in England in which a man named Miles was tried for assault. The Magistrate did not inflict any punishment upon him, but held him over to be of good behaviour. Subsequently fresh evidence was forthcoming, which showed the assault to be of a very aggravated nature, and he was then put upon his trial for the aggravated assault. But the plea was put forward that he had already been convicted of the assault, and punished by being called upon to give bail for his good behaviour, and the Superior Court held that the call made upon him to give bail amounted to punishment for the offence, and that, consequently, he could not be tried a second time for that assault. Yet in Ireland, without any offence being proved against any accused person, the Resident Magistrates are held to have the power to hold him over to bail for good behaviour. The hon. Gentleman the Member for South Belfast was once called upon to give bail. He declined to do so, saying that if he did he would admit his moral culpability, and he preferred to go to prison rather than place himself under a moral stigma. I say the administration of the law in this respect is most shameful. Some man becomes an object of suspicion and even hatred to the Government. Proceedings are promptly instituted against him under this Coercion Act. It happens in all probability that the charge against him is not provable, and the Magistrates who are dependants of the Chief Secretary inflict upon him the arbitrary and cruel punishment of sending him to gaol in default of giving bail—bail which no hon. Member would ever dream of giving. Lord Spencer has been referred to, and, in a speech which he delivered on the 17th December last, he said that the Resident Magistrates, dependants of the Crown, are absorbing the legitimate jurisdiction of the Petty Sessions. He added that in his time Resident Magistrates were only employed in exceptional cases, but now they are employed in Petty Sessional Courts, and they oust the jurisdiction of the country gentlemen who are on the Commission of the Peace. A most remarkable instance of this has occurred in Tipperary. A Coroner's Jury found a verdict of wilful murder against two policemen in connection with the death of a boy named Heffernan. The two accused persons were taken to the Petty Sessions, but the Bench was packed with two Removable Magistrates—Mr. Meldon and Colonel Caddell—who refused to send the men for trial. Again, we have heard Resident Magistrates say that they represent the Crown. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary has repudiated that assertion. He stated that Colonel Carew had never made any such statement. I am surprised that a man of the Chief Secretary's ability should so absolutely assert a negation—

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I stated that Colonel Carew never said that the Crown had given him directions in regard to judicial decisions.

MR. MAC NEILL: That is a beautiful dialectical curiosity. Now we will come to the real facts. This case occurred on the 7th September, 1887, and I think the Report which I hold in my hand will fully prove my contention that these Magistrates combined executive and judicial duties. Some men were brought before Colonel Carew (sitting not as a member of a Coercion Court, but as a member of a Court of Petty Sessions) for assault. What occurred? Colonel Carew said—

"I have received orders from Dublin Castle that these men shall be tried before the Coercion Court, and I now order them to be taken back to Kilmainham Gaol."

The solicitor who defended said—

"I should like to have this thing done formally. I understand that the prisoners have been served with a summons since they came here to-day. If the Crown desire a remand they must make application in the usual way."

Colonel Carew (to the Clerk): Make out the warrants for the prisoners.

The Solicitor to the defendants: The case must be first called on. Then you must hear what the Crown have to say, and I may have something to say on behalf of my clients. I wish to know does the Crown withdraw the charge?

Colonel Carew: I represent the Crown here, and I have instructions that these men shall be tried under the Coercion Act.

The Solicitor for the defendants: Pardon me, you no more represent the Crown than I do. Your business is to hold the scales of justice evenly.

Colonel Carew: I am a Resident Magistrate here and as such represent the Crown. The prisoners will be tried under the Crime Act."

I think, Mr. Courtney, that the right

Mr. Mac Neill

hon. Gentleman owes me an apology for denying that a Resident Magistrate has ever stated that he represents the Crown. Now, I propose to proceed to another case, and that is the action of the Chief Secretary in moving these Resident Magistrates about the country, like pawns upon a chessboard. One Magistrate, a respectable gentleman in the County of Cork, was dismissed by the Lord Chancellor from the Commission of the Peace, simply because he went a short distance outside his district in order to adjudicate upon a case in which a charge was brought against a policeman. But what does the right hon. Gentleman do? We find that he sends his Resident Magistrates all over the country. And why does he send them? Because the Government find they are handy tools for the purpose. The right hon. Gentleman said that Mr. Cecil Roche had got promotion because he richly deserved it. But he deserves it simply because he always does the right hon. Gentleman's behests. Mr. Cecil Roche got promotion also because twice when he was on the Bench he incited policemen to the commission of crime. He incited them to the commission of acts which might have resulted in murder. Of course, in the eyes of hon. Members opposite murder is not so serious a crime as boycotting. A policeman if he fires a revolver in the air is guilty of a dereliction of duty, for has not the right hon. Gentleman said that it should be the object of a policeman to "fire to kill?" I want to know if Colonel Caddell is an independent Magistrate what right the Chief Secretary has to closet him. These Magistrates are all said not to be dependent upon the Chief Secretary, but we continually see announcements, or rather we did see them until I drew attention to the fact in the papers, to the effect that Resident Magistrate So-and-so "having been in attendance on the Chief Secretary in Dublin has returned to his duties." Surely that is not a proof of the independence of Magistrates in connection with the Divisional Magistrates. In conclusion, I should like to point out that Colonel Turner has not been so wise as Captain Plunkett was, and he has openly endeavoured, in connection with the Vandeleur Estate, instead of promoting peace and order, to do the very reverse. I will only add that the more we disclose these facts to the people of England, the more we show how the whole machinery of justice in Ireland is used for political purposes, the surer will be our victory at the next General Election.

(10.25). COLONEL SAUNDERSON: I should have left the House to judge of the accusations which have been made, and the defence of the Chief Secretary, had it not been for the fact that hon. Members opposite will persist in saying that they speak in the name of the Irish people. I do not deny that they speak in the name of some of the Irish people, but I absolutely deny that they speak in the name of all the Irish people, and I, therefore, ask the permission of the House to intrude for a moment or two in a Debate which concerns the maintenance in Ireland of law and order. There is one advantage that the Government, whether Tory or Liberal, is sure to possess, and that advantage is that they know that a certain portion of every Session, when the Irish Estimates are under consideration, will be devoted to attacking the Government and the Irish Executive. The present Debate has pursued the usual course. A mild attack was made upon the Vote of the Lord Lieutenant, and it was proposed, I think, to deprive him of the advantage of a Chaplain and a Secretary. A very powerful attack was made upon the Vote for the Chief Secretary for Ireland. That Debate is in the memory of the House, and it appears to me that instead of the attack being made upon the executive policy of the right hon. Gentleman and the Government, hon. Gentlemen opposite complained principally of his manners in the House of Commons. The hon. Member for North-East Cork pointed out that the Chief Secretary, under the thrashing he had experienced, had improved. The hon. Member for East Mayo, who followed in the Debate, said the Chief Secretary was far from improving. After all the efforts of hon. Gentlemen opposite to improve my right hon. Friend he has not attained that high level of Parliament decorum which is prevalent below the Gangway. Then the police were attacked. There is a sort of familiar likeness in all these Debates—a certain number of cases were brought forward, but I think the weakness of the attack must have been palpable to the House and to the country. Now I come to the last act of the tragedy, or rather comedy. With regard to the speech we have just heard I will say nothing. When I called out "date," it was not done to annoy or interrupt the hon. Member for South Donegal, but to bring out the fact which I want the House to appreciate, that the letter was written 42 years ago, and was written under a Liberal Administration. The hon. Member for East Mayo made a violent attack on the Police Magistrates, and referred to the case of Mr. Hamilton, who, he said, was an Orangeman. I challenged that statement, and the hon. Member then said that if Mr. Hamilton was not an Orangeman he had an Orangeman's heart.

DR. TANNER: I rise to order. The hon. Member has challenged a statement that Mr. Hamilton was not an Orangeman.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

DR. TANNER: I say, as a point of order, that Mr. Hamilton told me with his own lips—

THE CHAIRMAN: It is not a point of order. The hon. Member must be ignorant of the elementary rules of order.

DR. TANNER: He told me with his own lips that he was an Orangeman.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! Colonel Saunderson.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: I believe there is one thing in common between Mr. Hamilton and the Orangemen—they are both on the side of law and order in Ireland. The hon. Member for East Mayo then pursued a different and, I believe, an entirely new line of attack in this House. He attacked Colonel Caddell, and said he believed that he could prove that Colonel Caddell's character was as disgraceful as that of Captain Segrave. Colonel Caddell is not here to defend himself, and I look upon such an attack, founded upon merely an assumption of knowledge, as one of a most cowardly description. No hon. Member of this House has ever before attacked the character of another, whether that person is in or out of this House, on the mere assumption that he believed he could prove in the future that the character of the person attacked was as bad as that of some other person indicated, and I think the hon. Member for East Mayo will yet feel ashamed that he has made the statement. It is a statement he dare not make outside, where there would be another method of dealing with it. But under the privilege of Parliament he fires this barbed arrow at a man unable to defend himself. The hon. Member then went on to attack the Executive, and I agree with him when he says that Government could not be carried on in Ireland without unpleasant expedients. That is so, because the Executive has to deal with the criminal expedients of the Nationalists. Shadowing is an unpleasant expedient, but the persons shadowed have to be looked after. It is unpleasant for the Magistrates to interfere with the right of public meeting, but when meetings are held with the object of intimidating the people the duty becomes necessary. The right hon. Member for Wolverhampton also has found fault with the Irish Executive on the ground that they have not the confidence of the Irish people, by whom I suppose the right hon. Gentleman means that portion of the people who are represented by hon. Members opposite below the Gangway. That may be true, but what conceivable Executive or Magistracy or police would secure the sympathy and support of those hon. Members? It would be as hopeless and foolish a task to seek to satisfy them in those respects as it would be to try to create Magistrates and to enlist police that would satisfy the aspirations of the criminal population in London. The issue between the hon. Members opposite and the Unionist Government is as to what is crime, and on this point agreement can scarcely be expected between them. The right hon. Member for Wolverhampton, however, went on to say that he did not impugn the action of the Resident Magistrates on personal grounds, but because they were not lawyers and had not received legal training. The Irish Magistrates have dual functions to perform—executive and judicial—and the executive function, when they find the people hounded on to lawlessness by certain persons, among whom are Members of this House, requires something more than a legal training to discharge efficiently, and I know of no persons better qualified for such a duty than men who have occupied distinguished positions in the Army. The main result of the Debates on the Irish Estimates must be to convince the majority of the House and the country that the Executive in Ireland are attacked simply because they have sought to maintain in Ireland the laws that Parliament has passed. It is also apparent, from the line that has been adopted by the leaders of the Party opposite, that this attack is on no particular Government; it applies to all Governments, of whatever Party, who dare to maintain the law in Ireland, and the attack made on this Unionist Government sinks into insignificance when compared with the violent and unscrupulous attacks that have been made on previous Governments. Therefore, the Chief Secretary may feel very well satisfied with the result of the Debates, for they have faded away into matters of very little importance. So persuaded are they of the great popularity and triumphant success of my right hon. Friend, that for the first time, for I do not know how many years they have allowed the Chief Secretary's Vote to pass without a Division. There is at the present moment one feature which differentiates these Debates from those which have preceded them. In former times, I am not going into ancient history, for I only speak of four and a-half years ago—an attack on the Irish Executive and the Stipendiary Magistrates was always—

THE CHAIRMAN: I am afraid the hon. and gallant Gentleman is going into matter which is not relevant to this Vote.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: I think, Sir, if you will allow me to follow the matter up, I can show that the line I am taking is absolutely relevant. We have had an attack made on the Stipendiary Magistrates in Ireland, and I want to point out the circumstances which differentiate this attack from former attacks on that body. Formerly these attacks came alone from hon. Members below the Gangway, whereas now, they are joined in by those who at one time were responsible for this Vote. The hon. Member for East Mayo has attacked Colonel Turner on the ground that he has changed his opinions, and that he has a convenient conscience; that whereas, in former days he was a Home Ruler, he is now a Unionist. I wonder what most of the right hon. Gentlemen sitting on the Front Opposition Bench thought of that attack on Colonel Turner's position. Sir, I have no doubt what the final verdict of the country will be when the country appreciates the facts. [An hon. MEMBER: "Barrow."] An hon. Member cries "Barrow," but I think it will not be denied that the Barrow Election did not turn on the Irish Estimates. The Barrow Election turned on the attempt which was made to float the foundering ship of Home Rule on the advancing tide of teetotalism. When these attacks on the Irish Magistrates which are now made are read, I think it will be found that the verdict of the country will be that the Irish Executive, which is specially represented in this House by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, has brought about in Ireland at the present moment a condition of peace and prosperity that has been unknown in that country for many years.

(10.46.) MR. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.): We have heard the speech just delivered by the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Colonel Sanderson) a good many times. He tells us that we are the party of disorder, and that the Orangemen of Ireland are the party of law and order. This comes well from the champion of the party which has threatened to kick the Queen's Crown into the Boyne. The hon. and gallant Gentleman went to Belfast at the General Election, and did not remain there very long. He tried to champion the candidature of Colonel Somerset Thaxwell, and was hunted out of Belfast. He has compared the population of Ireland with the criminal population of London; but among the Irish people is the constituency which he himself represents, and that also which returned my hon. Friend the Member for South Armagh (Mr. Blane) without contest at the last two elections. But Armagh is not the only part of Ireland containing this criminal population; more than half of Ulster must be included. The Counties of Donegal, part of Derry, part of Tyrone, Cavan, and Monaghan, are all embraced in his sweeping and, as I venture to term it, disgraceful declaration. When we attack the Orangemen of Ulster we do not impute to them criminal instincts from their birth; and I think the time has come when even the hon. and gallant Gentleman's own Party ought to repudiate the attacks he makes upon his own country upon every occasion when he speaks in this House. The hon. Member has referred to the date of a letter, which has been quoted, and stated that it was written 42 years ago; but if more recent letters could be got at, I think it would be found that they would be very much of the same character. We are unable to produce the documents we should like to have. We cannot produce the letters which led to the appointment of C. Roche, Mr. Segrave, and Major Waring; but if we could get them I think it would be found they were very much like the letter read by the Member for South Donegal. We have to-night been treated by the hon. and gallant Gentleman to a washed-out edition of the speech he did not deliver on the 12th of July. I hope he will repeat that speech as often as possible, especially at the bye-elections, because if he does our victories will be more numerous than ever. He has pleaded for the colonels who sit on the Magisterial Bench, and argued that men who had served in the Army were those best fitted to administer justice in Ireland. To my mind the sooner all these Magistrates are colonels the better, because in that case the sooner will the present system be terminated. At present you mix up a few lawyers and non-military men with the great military geniuses who figure on most of the Magisterial Benches, and the result is that you do not get at the truth as you would do if all the Magistrates were colonels, because then the system would be shown to be so ridiculous that the British people would at once get rid of it. I might, however, suggest that considering the position the hon. and gallant Gentleman has himself held in the Army he might have left his eulogium of the colonels to other hon. Members. He has referred to the American phrase that the people were "agin the Government." I do not think we could produce any phrase more strongly condemnatory of the Irish Government than that. That phrase, which is historic, involves an emphatic commentary on the disgraceful system pursued in Ireland for the last 300 years. Ever since the dawn of civilisation in Ireland, as testified by Sir John Davis in the reign of Charles I., the people have been claiming equal justice. Why do they not get it? It is because you have made the Government of "law and order" a byword. You have so governed the Irish people that to expect them to obey the law would be to expect them to be more than human, and I do not hesitate to assert that if the Irish people had the least respect for law and order as now interpreted they would not be fit for freedom. In conclusion, I would give the House one illustration of how justice is administered in Ireland. Last year Mr. John Cullinane was charged before two Justices, including Colonel Caddell, with unlawful assembly, and in the judgment then delivered it was stated that the terror resulting from the assembly was not sufficiently great to justify the Magistrates in concluding that the meeting was unlawful, and consequently they would have dismissed the case but for the fact that the gathering was excessive, and the consequence was that Mr. Cullinane was held to bail in £100, with two sureties in £50 each, or in default to undergo six weeks' imprisonment. In the case of Cullinane the man was actually acquitted of crime. The Magistrates decided that no crime was committed, nevertheless they bound the man over to keep the peace, and because he would not confess that he had broken the peace and been guilty of crime by entering into his own recognisances, he was sent to prison for six weeks. Was anything more monstrous ever heard of? Is it any wonder that the Irish people throw dirt upon, and spit upon, the present administration of the law in Ireland. If they did not kick it from one end of Ireland to the other on every conceivable opportunity, they would not be worthy of the liberty for which they are struggling.

(11.2.) MR. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.): I feel bound to raise a protest against the speech of the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for North Armagh (Colonel Saunderson). He compared the Irish people to the criminal population of London. When speaking of the portion of Ireland he represents he should have remembered that the majority of the Representatives of Ulster sit on these Benches and not behind Her Majesty's Government. As representing an Ulster constituency in which Catholics and Protestants stand side by side, I am bound to say that I repudiate in the strongest possible manner the hon. and gallant Gentleman's insinuation. He said these attacks were made on the Irish Estimates every Session, and that within his own knowledge these attacks have been constantly made during the past 22 years. Why, Sir, the fact that these complaints are made year after year and Session after Session is the best proof that they are not without foundation. The hon. and gallant Gentleman says that this Debate has been a comedy, and I must say I never, in my life, heard a bolder assertion. He must be aware that one of the reasons we have made these speeches has been to complain of the wanton and cruel murder of unoffending persons in the towns and villages of Ireland. References have been made in the course of the Debate to the conduct of the police in shooting down people in cold blood when acting under the orders of Resident Magistrates—shooting down men and boys for no crime whatever, or for doing that which in this country would not even evoke an order to "move on." The hon. and gallant Member said that these Resident Magistrates in Ireland should be military men, and he scoffed at the idea that they should be expected to have any legal training. But one of the principal class of cases upon which these men have to adjudicate is that of conspiracy, and every one knows that that is the subject of all others in dealing with which legal training is required. The hon. Member gave his case away when he said that these Magistrates should be men of military experience. It is our complaint in Ireland that the majority of these men are fitted for military affairs, but certainly unfitted to administer the civil law. Would complaint be made if a state of things similar to that in Ireland existed in England and Scotland? Why, if we had no other grievance in Ireland this would be a monstrous one under which our people could never be expected to rest contented. I myself have had the honour and advantage—for we consider it such in Ireland—of being sentenced to three months' imprisonment by two of these Resident Magistrates. When I was undergoing prosecution, one of the Magistrates, who had been in charge of 400 police and soldiers, was asked what were his qualifications to be in command of these men on a critical occasion, and he replied that for a short time he had belonged to the Inns of Court Volunteers. He was then asked what were his qualifications to sit on the Bench and sentence me to imprisonment, and he had to admit that he had never been called to the Bar, or attended a single legal lecture, or passed an examination in his life, and that his only qualification was that he had eaten a few dinners in the Middle Temple in London. It was by a man of that kind I was sentenced to imprisonment, and when anyone complains of our rising in this House and giving vent to our complaints under such circumstances, I say that it is most unreasonable.

(11.9.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford Central): I do not desire to detain the Committee for more than a few moments, but, before the Vote is taken, I am anxious to say a few words on the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary. I think those who listened to his speech will admit that, though he spoke with his usual ability, he utterly failed to make any adequate reply to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton. My right hon. Friend showed that of the 75 Resident Magistrates in Ireland, only 14 have received the first rudiments of legal education, and that they were briefless barristers who had been appointed because they had failed at the Bar. Of the remainder, a very large proportion are military men—half-pay officers—and the others are political hacks who, like Mr. Cecil Roche, having been defeated at the polls in England, reap their reward on the Bench in Ireland. How did the Chief Secretary attempt to deal with the complaint of my right hon. Friend? He drew a comparison between the Chairmen of English Quarter Sessions, many of whom are soldiers, and the Irish

Resident Magistrates; but according to my experience the former class are the very pick of the English Magistrates, and many of them are experienced barristers. Then they are assisted and controlled in all difficult cases by juries, and I would not trust even those gentlemen to deal with difficult questions of conspiracy without a jury. It is the jury who is the protection in England against injustice being done under the law of conspiracy. That law would never have been allowed to remain on our Statute Book if it had not been for that protection. Yet this, which is admitted to be the most difficult part of our law, is in Ireland committed to the jurisdiction of these incompetent, broken-down lawyers or soldiers, who form the great bulk of the Magistracy in that country. The Chief Secretary further urged that the Resident Magistrates have stood the test of experience, and have given great satisfaction in Ulster. But, owing to the peculiar conditions of Ulster, no parallel can be drawn between the position of the Resident Magistrates there and in other parts of Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman went on to claim credit for the Resident Magistrates on the ground that only a certain proportion of decisions had been reversed, and he said that even in cases where terms of imprisonment of less than a month had been inflicted there was still an appeal to the Superior Courts. But it must be recollected that it was very difficult for poor people to proceed by way of writ of certiorari, and when they did it must be borne in mind the presumption of fact was always against them. Some of the Judges had declared that they would not over-rule the Courts below on questions of fact. Under the circumstances, therefore, I am not surprised that there was not a large number of appeals of this kind. I notice that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary was altogether silent on the case of Father Crowley, which was referred to by my right hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton. My right hon. Friend showed that this gentleman was convicted of conspiracy in a case in which no jury in England could have been found to convict, and sentenced to imprisonment for one month, and to give bail to be of good behaviour or go to prison for a further term. That is a glaring instance of the injustice perpetrated by these Resident Magistrates, for they know perfectly well that gentlemen of this character decline to give bail. Then, with reference to the case of Colonel Turner, who took up his abode with the leader of the landlord party in his district, the Chief Secretary says that it would have been impertinent for him to direct Colonel Turner where he should live. But in the case of the Land Commissioners a rule has been laid down forbidding them to accept the hospitality of landlords, lest they should lose the confidence of the people. Colonel Turner has shown himself a thorough partisan, and is universally distrusted in Clare, as I can vouch from experience, having visited the district. It seems to me it was a very unfortunate thing that Colonel Turner identified himself with Mr. Stacpoole; and also that the Chief Secretary did not drop him a hint that it would be wise not to accept this hospitality. With regard to Colonel Caddell, looking only at his public character and acts, I think he is a most unfortunate officer in his district. He is a constant source of danger to the district, appearing to be interested in inciting the people to a conflict with the police and the military. I have had some experience of this gentleman, for when, last autumn, I went to Tipperary, I was followed by 600 or 700 people to the house where I was going to stay, and when I arrived I was invited to address them from the steps of the house. [Ironical cheers and laughter.] I am not ashamed of it. I did not go there for the purpose of making a speech, but had desired that there should be no demonstration. However, it was very difficult to avoid one. When the people asked me for a speech there immediately started up a force of 30 or 40 armed police, with Colonel Caddell at their head, and posted themselves on the flank of the crowd, and a conflict between the police and the people seemed imminent. That is a good example of what is taking place in Tipperary daily. Colonel Caddell is a representative man of his kind. I believe the Chief Secretary would do well to remove Colonel Caddell and appoint some more moderate and cautious man. One of the worst symptoms of the administration of the right hon. Gentleman is that he never makes any concession to public opinion, and has no sympathy for the feelings of the people, and there can be no better illustration of this than what happened at Mr. O'Dwyer's funeral. A great outrage was committed by the police on that occasion. Colonel Caddell proclaimed the funeral in advance as an illegal assembly, and I venture to ask whether in the whole history of Ireland such a thing ever was done before, or whether in any other country in Europe the Government has ever been known to proclaim a funeral? Was there any reason to believe that any harm would have resulted from allowing this funeral to take place in the ordinary way? The hon. Member for North-East Cork (Mr. W. O'Brien) delivered an address, and I am sure the presence of the police made no difference in his utterances on that occasion. His speech was couched in terms of the greatest possible sympathy for the people of the district, and no exception could be taken to it on the ground that it had an illegal tendency. It would have been well, in my opinion, to have allowed the funeral to take place without the intervention of the police. What harm could it have done? Political funerals are not uncommon on the Continent, and the authorities, however despotic they may be in general, usually make an exception in favour of a funeral and allow things to be said which they would not allow to be said on other occasions. They recognise that it does not do to outrage the feelings of people on such occasions. I think the right hon. Gentleman would have done well to have allowed a political funeral to take place in this case. I rather gathered from the right hon. Gentleman that he is not altogether pleased with the action of Colonel Caddell on this occasion, for he said he would not express an opinion as to whether it was right or wrong. I would suggest that it would have been wise of him to have gone a little further, and to have made some small concession, even at the last moment, to public opinion in Ireland. Few people who have not been present at some of the Magisterial inquiries in Ireland can form an adequate notion of the relation of the Resident Magistrates to the executive. The fact is that these Resident Magistrates are part of the executive, and are completely under the thumb of the Crown lawyers. I have myself seen three or four trials of this kind, and what most struck me about them was the complete helplessness and feebleness of the Resident Magistrates in the presence of the Crown lawyers. I am not one of those who believe that the Resident Magistrates actually receive instructions from the officials in Dublin, but I could not help seeing that they were the complete slaves of the Crown lawyers—not from bad faith, but because they were so feeble and so ignorant of the law. I believe that hundreds of these cases come before the Crown Prosecutor and the Attorney General. I think I am right in saying that all these cases come before the Attorney General before the prosecutions are entered upon, and that he therefore is primarily responsible for them. The Resident Magistrates practically carry out the suggestions of the Crown lawyers and the Attorney General. What is also conspicuous about these cases is that they have all been perfectly futile. I believe I am right in saying that all these cases are connected directly or indirectly with disputes between landlords and tenants. They are entered into for the purpose of breaking down the combination of the tenants and enabling landlords to collect arrears of rent. In this respect I undertake to say they have been utterly futile from beginning to end. I challenge the Chief Secretary, as I have done once before this Session, to say whether he can show that any adequate result has accrued from any of these prosecutions under the Coercion Acts. Has he succeeded in breaking down any of the combinations between landlords and tenants; has he succeeded in breaking up any of the so-called suppressed branches of the National League; has he prevented people from attending meetings to protest against the injustice of their landlords? I say he cannot show that any good has been done, even from his own point of view, by the course that has been pursued. It is true that many of the disputes between landlords and tenants have been brought to an end, but this has been done, not by coercion, but by the landlords giving way. I can only say, in conclusion, that if the right hon. Gentleman were to devote one-tenth part of the labour he bestows upon defending these cases in the House of Commons, preparing the various implements of coercion and instructing his various agents in Ireland, to persuading the landlords to arbitrate in these disputes, he would in a very short time find all difficulties at an end and no further necessity for prosecutions under the Coercion Act.

SUPPLY—REPORT.

Resolutions [16th July] reported.

CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES, 1890-91.

CLASS III.

1. "That a sum, not exceeding £80,099, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1891, for such of the Salaries and Expenses of the Supreme Court of Judicature and of certain other Legal Departments in Ireland, as are not charged on the Consolidated Fund.
2. "That a sum, not exceeding £80,687, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1891, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Office of the Irish Land Commission.
3. "That a sum, not exceeding £66,117, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1891, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Commissioner of Police, the Police Courts, and the Metropolitan Police Establishment of Dublin.
4. "That a sum, not exceeding £56,250, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1891, for the Expenses of Reformatory and Industrial Schools in Ireland.
5. "That a sum, not exceeding £4,540, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1891, for the Maintenance of Criminal Lunatics in the Dundrum Criminal Lunatic Asylum, Ireland."

Resolutions read a second time.

First Resolution agreed to.

Second Resolution postponed.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House doth agree with the Committee in the Third Resolution."

(11.51.) MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I have a few words to say on this Vote with reference to the treatment of Catholic policemen in the Dublin Metropolitan Police. I was able last year to speak in high terms of the Dublin Force. They are a most respectable body of men, who do their duty very fairly and satisfactorily, and in great contrast to the Royal Irish Constabulary. One reason for this is that the officers are all men drawn from the ranks, whereas, as a general rule, the officers of the Royal Irish Constabulary are all men of a different type. A very strong feeling, however, exists among the men of the Force that discrimination against the Catholics is practised in the matter of promotion. I have a very large number of documents giving instances of this discrimination. I do not intend at this hour to trouble the House with a long complaint on the subject, but I do wish the Catholic constables of Dublin to feel that we are not satisfied with the way they have been treated, and we wish Mr. Harrell to understand that a very strong feeling exists on the subject. I also wish him to understand that a very strong feeling exists among the men against proselytising ladies being allowed to go to the barracks and preach the doctrines of a Creed in which the majority of the Force do not believe. Some Catholic ladies are prevented from entering the barracks, and I am sure hon. Gentlemen from the North of Ireland would at once complain if ladies of Catholic religious orders were allowed into the barracks and Protestant officers were more or less brought into contact with them. Protestant ladies are, however, allowed in the barracks, and if they may not preach to them they can come and go amongst the Catholic men. More than that, it is believed by the Catholic policemen that promotion goes according to the amount of attention they pay to these evangelising ladies. It is most offensive that anybody should have to depend for his promotion upon the amount of bible reading he does. Such a system was introduced into the Post Office by Sir William Blackwood. I have already brought it to the notice of the Chief Secretary that a police sergeant named Chase so arranged the men's duties that Catholic officers could not attend mass upon the days when such attendance is obligatory. I could give a number of instances, but I will not mention names, for the reason that Mr. Harrell would be bound to say whether what is asserted is true or not, and he would know who the men concerned were. I do, however, trust that Mr. Harrell and the officers under him will understand that there is a feeling amongst the Catholic officers that they are unduly depressed, while those of the opposite religion are promoted.

(11.58.) MR. DILLON: I do not intend to trespass long on the attention of the House; indeed, I only rise for the purpose of pointing out to the right hon. Gentleman that the difference in the tone of Irish Members when speaking of the Dublin Police as compared with the character of their remarks on the Irish Constabulary is very significant. I do not know anything of the complaints of my hon. and learned Friend, but I do desire to say a word in recognition of the highly satisfactory manner in which Mr. Harrell, the Chief Commissioner of the Dublin Police, discharges his duties. Mr. Harrell was at one time Resident Magistrate in East Mayo, and a more honourable and just man I never met. Frequently Mr. Harrell exposed himself to danger in his anxiety for the safety of the people in troubled times. So highly was he respected by the Nationalists of East Mayo that when he left they presented him with a memorial of their regard. The promotion of Mr. Harrell is, indeed, the only honest promotion I have ever known the Irish Executive make.

(12.0.) MR. E. HARRINGTON: It has been remarked, and made matter of complaint in the Dublin Metropolitan Police, that with or without the knowledge of Mr. Harrell a distinction is made in the treatment of the Catholic and Protestant members of the Force. If the former are observed to be in conversation while on duty they are liable to be reported, but if those ladies who take an interest in the religious young men of the latter class engage in talk for an hour with them there is no report for neglect of duty on the part of the men. I hope the remarks which have been made by my hon. and learned Friend, in which I agree, may not be taken as in any way a wish to introduce a religious controversy in this matter. We are far too much mixed up in our religious views to desire any thing of the kind, and are only anxious that all the members of the Force should be treated fairly. I have every respect for sincerity of convictions, but the greatest contempt for any system that permits fraud—for fraud it is to say that because men have attended this or that chapel they shall be patronised, have stripes on the arm, and be promoted over the heads of those who have beaten them in competitive examinations. I know that grievances of this kind have been brought to the notice of Dublin Members, and without wishing to raise any question as between Catholics and Protestants, and finding no fault with the men, I appeal to the Chief Secretary to address his attention to the matter.

(12.5.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am sure all who know Mr. Harrell will agree with the opinions expressed by the hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon). As to the specific complaints that have been made, all I can say is that I entirely concur in the opinion expressed. That promotion and favour should in any way be based on religious opinions would be destructive of discipline in any Force, and neither Mr. Harrell or any responsible officer would for a moment countenance such a policy as has been indicated and rightly condemned by the hon. and learned Member for Longford. Mr. Harrell will probably see a report of this discussion, or I will call his attention to it. I feel sure that Mr. Harrell is actuated by the desire to carry out the policy which Members on either side of whatever creed would wish to prevail in this Civic Force.

Question put, and agreed to.

Subsequent Resolutions agreed to.

SCHOOL BOARDS ELECTIONS (SCOTLAND) [VOTERS' QUALIFICATION] BILL.—(No. 370.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): May I ask the Lord Advocate whether, after hearing the views Scotch Members have expressed, there is any intention to proceed with this Bill?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): The opinions expressed by Scotch Members show that it will be impossible to proceed with the Bill, and I take the opportunity of saying this and moving that the Order be discharged.

Order for Second Reading read, and discharged.

Bill withdrawn.

EDUCATION OF BLIND AND DEAF-MUTE CHILDREN (SCOTLAND) BILL. [LORDS].—(No. 365.)

Bill read a second time, and committed for to-morrow.

PUBLIC TRUSTEE BILL [LORDS]. (No. 230.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): I think it right to state that we attach considerable importance to the Bill, and if the clauses to which exception has been taken could be carefully guarded there would be no objection to the Bill going forward. But we propose to take up the subject in conjunction with the Trust Companies Bill and refer it to a Select Committee, with the hope to carry it into legislation next Session.

SIR HORACE DAVEY (Stockton): On the understanding that the Trust Companies Bill will be referred to a Select Committee with this Bill next Session I am content the Order should be discharged.

Order for Second Reading read, and discharged.

Bill withdrawn.

PARTNERSHIP BILL [LORDS].—(No. 373.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR R. WEBSTER: I hope the House will assent to the Second Reading of this Bill. It has the approval of Lord Herschell and Lord Justice Lindley, who is master of the law on this subject, and, with the assistance of my hon. and learned Friend (Sir Horace Davey), I think I can, in Committee, satisfy any objections to this, which is a Consolidation Bill, though, if it should be thought desirable, it shall be referred to the Standing Committee on Law.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. BROOKE ROBINSON (Dudley): There is one clause objected to very strongly, the clause which gives power to a majority to bind the minority.

SIR HORACE DAVEY: I concur that it is desirable to pass the Bill. It was carefully considered last year by a Select Committee. With a view to amendment in Committee, I hope the Committee stage may be deferred for a week.

Objection taken (Mr. Caldwell).

Second Reading deferred till to-morrow.

CONSOLIDATED FUND (No. 2) BILL.
COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

Clause 3.

Question proposed, "That the clause stand part of the Bill."

Colonel NOLAN moved "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again;" but the Chairman, being of opinion that the Motion was an abuse of the Rules of the House, declined to propose the Question thereupon to the Committee.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Bill reported, without Amendment; to be read the third time to-morrow.

MERCHANT SHIPPING (LIFE SAVING APPLIANCES) RULES.

(12.20.) MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.): I regret to have to trouble the House with a Motion at this hour, but the time within which I can call attention to this subject before these Rules become law is limited.

DR. TANNER: I object.

*MR. SPEAKER: Objection does not lie against the Motion, which is in pursuance of the Standing Order, the Rules remaining before the House a certain time for approval.

MR. MACARTNEY: As at present arranged, these Rules will very seriously affect the shipping interest and will have a specially injurious effect on the passenger traffic between England and Ireland. Last year Rules identical with these were made, but were not carried into effect, in consequence of the representations made. The objections are two, and the first relates to the regulations as to boats, the second to life belts and other appliances. In the first place, I contend that the provision for new boats is unnecessary, and, in the second place, if a vessel is equipped with boats according to the scale laid down the result will be illusory. I may illustrate this by reference to particular steamers running between this country and Ireland. Owing to the number of boats being made dependent upon the cubic measurement, a magnificent ship like the Ireland, which runs between Holyhead and Dublin and generally carries about 200 passengers, will have to carry six more boats than it now does, although it is a new vessel and fully equipped with six boats; whereas the Mayo, a smaller vessel, but one which sometimes carries 1,000 passengers, will only be required to have three boats altogether.

The objection to many boats is that they occupy deck space, and further, the crew will be insufficient to man so many boats. Objection is also taken to the rule that requires each ship to carry as many life-belts as passengers. The City of Dublin Steam Packet Company at harvest time carries about 8,000 men across to England in three nights. It would be most unreasonable to expect the company to have 8,000 life-belts for all these men. And, even if they were supplied they could not be used, as there is no place in which to stow them so that they might be at hand on an emergency. The circumstances of this passenger traffic are altogether different to those of the Transatlantic traffic, when each passenger has his berth, and these rules, as applied to the passenger traffic between England and Ireland, will be impracticable and will press very hardly on those engaged in it. The Board of Trade Rules now in existence give the Board a discretionary power as to life-saving belts, and no lives have been lost, so far as I am aware, which would have been saved by these new rules. Those who are engaged in this trade ask either that the Board of Trade should continue to exercise the discretionary power they now have with regard to certifying vessels, or that, before these rules are put into force, they should be referred to a Select Committee, so that the evidence of the traders may be taken on the subject. The Committee by whom these rules were drawn up contained no representative of that class of the mercantile shipping community which is engaged in the coasting trade. They had no opportunity of pointing out how difficult—how absolutely impossible it would be to utilise these rules as the Board of Trade and the public would like to see them utilised, and they are confident that if they had an opportunity of demonstrating to a Committee the reasonable requirements of the case their views would be at once acceded to. The Amendments I have placed on the Paper suggest that the number of life-belts in each vessel should be in proportion to the tonnage, and I have placed the proportion at 10 to every 100 tons. That is not a number I should be disposed to adhere to if any larger number were desired, but the shipping community consider that the number I suggest would meet all the requirements of the case. They do not for a moment desire to stand in the way of any reasonable protection of life on board these ships, but they contend that these rules, if they were rigidly carried out, would do more to endanger life than to protect it. Further, they say that the rules could not be carried out on board coasting vessels. If the Board of Trade insist on working the Rules as they now stand the result will be that the City of Dublin Steam Packet Company and other companies engaged in carrying harvestmen to England will have to alter their present arrangements, and the men will have to cross the Irish Channel in the old slow way, instead of being brought over rapidly in large bodies. For these reasons, I hope the President of the Board of Trade will consider favourably the suggestions which have been made in the Amendments on the Paper. They have, I can assure him, been put down not with any desire to deprive the public of reasonable and proper safeguards while crossing the Channel, but because, in the opinion of those who have drawn them up, they are really the only practical suggestions that can be made.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That it is expedient that the Rules be amended, by adding at the end of Class 2(a), of Division A, the words, 'Provided that where in existing ships the boats are in good order and of sufficient capacity they shall not be required to be altered under this section.'"
—(Mr. Macartney.)

*(12.30.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): I will endeavour to consult the convenience of the House by making my remarks as brief as possible. This is really not a matter for the decision of the Board of Trade. Let me remind the House of the history of this subject. In 1887 a Committee of the House sat, which recommended that such precautions should be taken for saving life at sea as might be deemed necessary by a Committee representing the various interests involved. Accordingly, in pursuance of the provisions of the Act of 1888, a Committee of 14 members, presided over by Mr. Ismay, of Liverpool, and including five representatives of the shipowners, was appointed in 1888. In fact, all shipping interests were represented. [Mr. MACARTNEY: Not the coasting trade.] The committee drew up certain rules with a view to the saving of life at sea, to be observed on the different classes of ships. Objection was taken to these rules last year, when they were laid on the Table, by the coasting trade, upon whose behalf the hon. Member now speaks. I therefore thought it right to suspend their operation so that the representatives of that trade might have an opportunity of being heard. The representatives of this trade placed their case fully before the Committee in the early part of last spring, and the rules were, to some extent, modified. They are now laid on the Table, and I do not feel disposed to take the responsibility of altering the recommendations of a Committee constituted in that way. The matter was one of great technical difficulty and of the gravest importance to the saving of life at sea, and I should be sorry if the House rejected the recommendation of the Committee. There is a clause which provides that no ship shall be called on to carry more boats and rafts than are sufficient for the accommodation of all the persons on board. The sole objection to these rules is on the part of a few interested traders, who object to some extra expense which will be thrown on them. As to the Irish harvest men, to whom reference has been made, their lives are as valuable as the lives of anyone else, and in their interest, as well as in the interest of all who go to sea, I hope that these rules will not be altered.

(12.36.) MR. MARJORIBANKS (Berkwick): I think the words which have fallen from the President of the Board of Trade show that this Debate may take the form of a general discussion on these rules. I will, therefore, take this opportunity of pointing out a grave omission in the rules, namely, that there is no provision in them with regard to life-saving appliances on board fishing boats.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: They were excluded from the Act.

MR. MARJORIBANKS: The right hon. Gentleman will admit that on no class of vessels is there so great a loss of life or so many accidents as on fishing boats, which, as a rule, are undecked and have no protecting side rails. I do take this opportunity of impressing on the right hon. Gentleman the desirability of doing something in the interests of fishermen.

(12.38.) COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I should like to point out that, as a rule, the people who go out in fishing boats are the owners and their sons, and they ought to be consulted before any fresh regulations are made affecting them. Passengers, however, stand on an entirely different footing. Thence the justification for these rules.

(12.39.) DR. TANNER: I only wish to say that really the hon. Member who proposed this Amendment should seriously consider before he adduces such absurd arguments.

MR. MACARTNEY: I shall not, of course, put the House to the trouble of a Division, but I wish to say that the representations I have made did not proceed from one Irish company, but from a number of companies. I am, moreover, bound to say that I think the reflections the right hon. Gentleman has made on one of the leading commercial firms in Dublin, who have done much to improve the steam service between Ireland and England, were somewhat uncalled for. I regret the Board of Trade cannot see their way to making these rules more practicable, because if they are put in operation much of this passenger traffic will be diverted, and the harvestmen will have to find their way to England as best they can, for the companies cannot afford to carry them at a loss.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

ARMY DISCIPLINE IN INDIA.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY, in rising to ask the Secretary of State for India what measures the Indian Government has taken to improve the discipline of the regiments recently quartered at Dum Dum; and what compensation it has made to the widow of the man shot by one of four soldiers who went out of barracks without leave on the night of the 6th November last; also to ask the Secretary of State for India if he will take steps to provide temperance canteens for all barracks and European military quarters in India as accessible to the soldiers as the canteens for intoxicating liquors, said:—My Lords, the effects of discipline at the Dum Dum barracks to which I have called the attention of the Secretary of State for India consist, in the first place, in the existence of too great facilities for the soldiers getting out of barracks at all hours of the night; and, secondly, for obtaining ball cartridge and regimental rifles when off duty. Taking advantage of this culpable laxity three soldiers of the Leinster Regiment, named O'Hara, Bellew, and M'Dermot, and a soldier of the Buffs, named Goldsborough, agreed to go out on the night of November 6 last pig shooting. They left the barracks about 11 o'clock p.m. with two rifles and 10 or 11 rounds of ball cartridge, as stated by one of the witnesses, and the number of empty and unused cartridges picked up in their tracks amounted to that number. These cartridges were obtained by the soldiers of the Leinster Regiment. They were able to leave the barracks unobserved. It appears there were only two sentries—one at the Guard Room and the other at the Quarter-Master's stores, and the Dum Dum barracks are not surrounded by any enclosure or spiked railing. It has also been stated there was inefficiency or irregularity in the matter of roll calls and check rolls at Dum Dum. These statements have been contradicted in the Press, but if the statements are well founded they will prove that further precautions are necessary for the maintenance of discipline. The four soldiers having left barracks proceeded to a village near Dum Dum. They visited two or three houses or huts, knocked up the inmates, and forced them to give them toddy. They then broke into a dispensary and stole a bottle of Eno's fruit salt, but unfortunately they did not drink it at a time when it might have sobered them, and thus prevented the crime which was afterwards committed. They then came to the house of one Sheikh Salim, and found him asleep in his verandah. O'Hara, as was stated at the trial, dragged Salim out by the arm, took him away to a pond near his house, pushed him in, and then knelt down and deliberately fired at him. The man threw up his arms and screamed, and the four soldiers then left him. The wounded man was, however, taken home, but he died before dawn. The bullet, it was found, went in at his right collar-bone and came out at his left side, and passed through his left arm. The four soldiers then amused themselves by firing shots at bottles or jugs suspended from a tree, and then returned to barracks, one on foot and the other three in a country cart, in which they had compelled a man to give them a lift. The authors of this crime remained undiscovered for a month. Then the Magistrate promised a pardon to anyone concerned in the crime, who was not the actual murderer, who would give evidence, and Goldsborough and M'Dermot then gave information against O'Hara and Bellew. On April 14 O'Hara and Bellew were put on their trial before Mr. Justice Norris. Bellew was in the course of the trial discharged, and O'Hara was found guilty and sentenced to death. The High Court of Calcutta was, however, set in motion to inquire into the sentence, with the result that the conviction was quashed, on the ground that Goldsborough, the witness, was also an accomplice, and that parts of his evidence were of no avail—not having been corroborated. O'Hara was discharged from the Army, and accordingly went away scot-free. This was unfortunate, because the day before O'Hara was tried another man, a shop-keeper, was tried by the same Judge, Mr. Justice Norris, for having killed a doorkeeper in Calcutta, who had given him no offence, by running him through the lungs with the sword of a sword-stick, and he died almost immediately. For this unprovoked murder he was sentenced to one year's imprisonment. Now, I think, my Lords, it is for the Secretary of State for India to consider what effect this disregard for their lives must have upon the natives of India. Nor are these the only cases which have occurred recently? There have been two or three other cases of natives of India in the North-West who have been injured by soldiers with almost equal impunity. It may also be asked why these four soldiers were not put on their trial by Court Martial for the military offence of breaking barracks and appropriating Government ammunition. This was purely a military offence and had nothing to do with the murder, so that the maxim non bis in idem would not apply in that case. It has also been stated that the decision of the High Court of Calcutta was not altogether correct with regard to the evidence of the man Goldsborough, because the witness was not necessarily an accomplice, since they all went out on the spree, not with the object of committing murder. Of course, if they had gone out on an expedition to commit burglary then he would have been an accomplice in the crime which afterwards occurred, because burglary necessarily may lead to murder. I will now come to the question which I have put on the Notice Paper with regard to what compensation is intended to be made to the widow and child of Sheikh Salim, whose death was caused by these soldiers and who had been begging since his murder. This marauding expedition in search of toddy was not the first subject of complaint against soldiers of the Leinster Regiment. The jury who tried O'Hara made a subscription among themselves for the relief of the widow, and Mr. Justice Norris commented very severely upon the fact of Sheikh Salim's widow and child having been left without any means of support. One reason, in fact, why the Judge did not inflict a heavier sentence on the man who had run the other native through with his sword-stick was because the firm who employed him had made some compensation to the widow. I now come to the last question on the Notice Paper, and I hope my noble Friend the Secretary of State will be able to state that he has come to some decision upon the question of promoting temperance in the Army of India by establishing temperance canteens in places as accessible to the soldiers as the other canteens. The tragedy at Dum Dum has emphasized the necessity of such a reform. This marauding expedition was hatched in the canteen. Mischievous constantly occurs from the soldiers going to the canteens and quarrelling with one another when they begin drinking. On grounds of economy alone the Indian Administration is bound to provide temperance canteens, and to do its utmost to check the drinking of spirits—for the purpose of diminishing the number of soldiers who from that cause primarily have to be invalided home. I believe Sir Frederick Roberts has made some reforms of that kind with regard to the Madras Army, and if that is the case, I hope the Secretary of State will be able to say what he has done in the matter. The noble Viscount will remember that two years ago a plan was published of an Indian Camp comprising a temperance canteen; but I think that must have been a private missionary canteen, for it was relegated to the farther end of the camp, while its alcoholic competitor was in the centre. Spirit drinking in the tropics ought to be discouraged in every way possible, and Government ought to provide means for enabling soldiers to be more careful of their health. Not only is it necessary in the tropics; Lord Wolseley said that in his Red River Expedition the soldiers had no spirits, but, though they were constantly wet and had to endure great fatigue, there was no sickness amongst them, and no discontent. This question of temperance canteens has a direct bearing on the murders I have described; but I do not wish to withdraw the attention of the Secretary of State from the want of discipline manifested in the circumstances attending the fatal case of this man who was shot by these soldiers. I will make a formal Motion for Papers, because it would be of no use bringing the matter forward if my noble Friend is unwilling to grant them; and I will ask him, therefore, as soon as he receives any reply from the Indian Government, to lay it on the Table of the House.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Viscount CROSS): With regard to the breach of discipline in the particular regiments to which my noble Friend has alluded, I am afraid I cannot give him any information to-day; but in consequence of a question which was asked by Sir George Campbell in the other House some time ago, I called for a full Report of the circumstances to which my noble Friend has alluded; but there has not yet been received an answer from the Government of India. For the same reason I am unable to say whether any compensation has been given to the widow of the person who was unfortunately killed on that night. With regard to the last question of the noble Lord, I can give him a much more satisfactory answer, for we have long ago anticipated all he desires. There are now temperance canteens in all corps and batteries in India; they form part of the regimental institutes. The rules for temperance canteens are applicable to all India, and in those rules the use or issue of spirits is discouraged, and every facility given for the use of non-intoxicating drinks. The subject is one which is receiving the constant attention of the Government of India. I have no Papers from the Government of India, and until we receive them it is impossible to say anything about them.

LIGHT RAILWAYS (IRELAND) AMEND-MENT BILL.—(No. 60.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE EARL OF LEITRIM: In moving the Second Reading of this Bill I shall trouble your Lordships with very few remarks. The 2nd clause is the principal clause in the Bill, and it has reference to any surplus which may arise from the free grant from Government. A surplus may arise in two ways, either through indifference or by design. It may arise through a contract being taken for a smaller amount than the Board of Works may have estimated. That has been the case in reference to railways which have been partly guaranteed, notably one railway in the County Leitrim, in which the Railway Company were able to construct their line within the amount estimated by their own contractors, and £10,000 under the capital expenditure estimated by the Board of Works. Therefore, in that case undoubtedly a surplus would have arisen. Then, again, it may arise by design. It may arise through the Treasury deliberately arranging that in certain cases a surplus shall be at the disposal of certain Railway Companies; for instance, arranging to subsidise, as it were, its working expenses. At the present moment these light railways running through congested districts are all upon the same footing. If this Bill were to become law, the Treasury would be able to judge between one and another as to which it would be the more desirable to assist in the matter of working expenses. My Lords, there are, I believe, technical difficulties in the way of this Bill, so that, practically, it cannot be read a second time. It is a Money Bill, and therefore, I believe, cannot be read a second time in your Lordships' House without having passed the House of Commons; but I wish to point out to the Government the advantages which, it seems to me, would arise if this Bill were passed. I should mention that in Clause 6 there is a printer's error in the drafting: it should read, "in case the limited owner of any property or land," instead of "absolute owner." That would enable limited owners to give free grants in these cases. That would be a reasonable and proper thing to do; of course, it would not be compulsory, and I do not think Trustees of an estate could reasonably object to a limited owner giving free grants of lands where there was a free grant on the part of the nation towards the construction of railways through his property. Again, therefore, from that point of view it seems to me desirable.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."
—(The Earl of Leitrim.)

THE LORD PRIVY SEAL (Earl CADOGAN): My noble Friend has already pointed out the technical difficulty which exists with regard to this Bill, namely, that it is a Bill almost entirely proposing to deal with the surplus monies that may be derived from a free grant made by Parliament. I need hardly remind your Lordships that such free grant will be made under the authority of the other House, and, therefore, it is impossible that the noble Lord should be able to pass through your Lordships' House a Bill proposing to deal with a surplus before the surplus has arisen. Under those circumstances, though I was prepared to point out to my noble Friend various objections which we entertain to the Bill, it is hardly necessary for me to do so; and I would ask him not to press it, as he himself seems to see the objection.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn: Then Bill (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT ACTS OF ENGLAND AND SCOTLAND REPEAL BILL.
(No. 156.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

LORD DENMAN: My Lords, I hope to explain to your lordships before I sit down that my Bill is neither audacious nor impertinent. There were amendments on the part of three noble Lords. On the 15th May, the noble Earl Lord Carnarvon pointed out the great anomaly existing, and it has been stated on high authority that the majority of your Lordships' House are in favour of the measure. This measure has reference to County Government. A most salutary regulation was passed in the Hallamshire County Council, that no member of that body should speak for more than 10 minutes; and as there are 30 members, instead of the 65 comprising Road Trustees and other Authorities, their meetings would only have occupied five hours supposing every member of the Council wished to speak. I venture to mention that fact, and I hope your Lordships will have regard to it in considering the time to be devoted to speeches. I have no wish to say anything in disparagement of the County Councils, though I do not think you will find in their working during the three years since their commencement any improvement on the old system; but that is merely matter of opinion. I merely address your Lordships in the hope that what is useful may be adopted, and that whatever is faulty may be remedied.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
(The Lord Denman.)

*THE PAYMASTER GENERAL (The Earl of JERSEY): I am sorry the noble Lord has thought it necessary to introduce another Bill upon this subject. This is obviously neither the time nor the occasion for a discussion on the Local Government Acts which have been so recently passed. I will not delay your Lordships, therefore, by criticising either the Preamble or the clauses of this Bill, but move at once that it be read this day three months.

Amendment moved to leave out ("now") and add at the end of the Motion ("this day three months.")—(The Earl of Jersey.)

On question whether ("now") shall stand part of the Motion, resolved in the negative; and Bill to be read 2^a this day three months.

LIGHT RAILWAYS (IRELAND).

THE EARL OF LEITRIM, in rising to move—

"That there be laid before this House Returns of the receipts from goods and passenger traffic, &c.; also, of the working expenditure, net receipts, and rolling stock, of the Irish Light Railways."

said: My Lords, the object of my making this Motion is to enable ratepayers to arrive at some idea of what has already been done in the way of opening out the country by Light Railways by showing what the traffic receipts and working expenses on the one hand and the net receipts on the other will be likely to be of the lines which are proposed to be opened in the congested districts.

Moved, "That there be laid before this House Returns, as under, of the receipts from goods and passenger traffic, &c.; also, of the working expenditure, net receipts, and rolling stock, of the Irish Light Railways."

*THE SECRETARY TO THE BOARD OF TRADE (Lord BALFOUR of BURLEIGH) : My Lords, exactly as the Motion stands I am afraid I am not prepared to assent to it, because there is an ambiguity in the expression "Light Railways." That term is used in the Act only as regards one particular kind of railway, as I understand it; but there are other railways which are really, in fact, light railways, although not technically so, and it would not be possible for the Board of Trade to distinguish one class of railways from another without some intimation from the noble Lord as to what railways he refers to. The Board of Trade Returns already give the particulars asked for as regards all railways, and I would refer the noble

Lord to the Parliamentary Paper No. 5,859 for last year. The Returns for the present year are in course of preparation, and will be issued in a very few days; but if the noble Lord will confer with me at the Board of Trade as to what class he means by the term light railways I shall be glad to do what I can to give him the information he asks for. At the same time, as in its present form, as put before your Lordships' House, I cannot assent to the Motion, I hope he will not press it.

THE EARL OF LEITRIM : That is quite satisfactory, and I will withdraw the Motion.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

MARTIN'S NATURALISATION BILL [LORDS]. (By Order.)

Order for Third Reading read.

* (3.10.) MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I am sure the House is much indebted to the right hon. Gentleman the Chairman of Committees for having drawn attention to this Bill, and I think that, whatever opinion the House may now have as to allowing this and the next Bill to pass, we ought to hear from the Home Secretary that the House will not be troubled with Bills of the same character in future. It is a Private Bill which asks the House to do that which can be done easily enough under the general law. There is this peculiarity in the Bill as distinguished from that which succeeds it, that there is no reason assigned in the preamble as to why the measure should be passed. The Chairman of Committees was, however, good enough to tell us that he has ascertained that a lady desires to obtain this Naturalisation Act because she wants to dispose of certain property. Now, if that is the reason why the lady wants this Bill, she certainly ought not to have it, and I will show the House what the position of things is. Until the Naturalisation Act of 1870 was passed, the state of the law was—I will not say in a complicated condition—but governed by a number of Statutes and by the Common Law, chiefly deduced from Calvin's case reported in Coke's Reports. The Act of 1870 gave greater facilities for naturalisation than had previously existed, and by the 2nd section it gave power to aliens to hold real and personal property of every description in the same manner as a natural born subject, and to make a disposition of it, so that it might pass by succession, and so on, extending the previous Statutes which imposed limitations upon the holding of real property. Therefore, Madame Martin does not need this Bill at all in order that she may be enabled to make a good will. She does not even need a certificate of naturalisation, so that if that be her real and only reason she must have been deceived by her legal advisers, and put to enormous expense in coming to this House for an enactment, all of which might have been spared. I wish, however, to point out that there may be a difficulty connected with the matter in which this House ought not to help Madame Martin. Suppose, instead of the enfranchisement sought by the Bill applying only to property within Great Britain, that it is intended to apply to property abroad, the effect of this Bill might be most prejudicial. I believe I am right in saying that Madame Martin has children, and children who have attained their majority. It may be that she has property in Spain, which property is governed by Spanish law, and that in promoting this Bill she is seeking to escape from the consequences of Spanish law, and may be doing an injustice to persons who would under other circumstances be entitled to impeach the testamentary disposition of the property. There is this further difficulty: Under the Naturalisation Act of 1870, the consequences following a certificate of naturalisation are very clear. The old law, which obtains still, is that which is laid down in Coke's chapter on villeinage, Section 198, but when the present Bill is passed it will have a retrospective effect, governing the whole of the property acquired prior to the enactment, and might enable this lady—although I do not suggest that it does—to be the means whereby her children might be able to perpetrate a legal fraud upon other persons entitled to claim the property. At the same time, although I think this is a Bill which ought to have been opposed at an earlier stage, I do not think it is right, seeing the great expense which has been incurred, to throw out the measure now. I am quite prepared to admit that I should not have noticed the nature of its provisions at all if it had not been for the observations of the Chairman of Committees in calling attention to the matter; but I think there ought to be an expression of opinion on the part of this House, either by Resolution or by an express declaration from the Government, that no exemption from the Act of 1870 shall be made, specially in the case of rich persons. That Act is broader than any Naturalisation Act that ever existed in this country before, and the 7th section gives to the person who is naturalised all political and other rights, powers, and privileges that would accrue if he were a natural born British subject. In the second case—Pohl's Naturalisation Bill—the petitioner tells us very frankly that he wishes to enter into a stock-broking partnership, and the contention is that before he can do so he must be naturalised. I say that it is beneath the dignity of this House in such cases as these to be called upon to pass special Acts simply for the purpose of enabling a lady to dispose of her property, or to enable a gentleman to become a stock-broker. If the House has been made acquainted with the whole truth, Madame Martin will gain nothing by this Act, but if there are property considerations in Spain behind, of which the House knows nothing, a grievous injustice may be done by passing this Bill.

*(3.20.) SIR A. ROLLIT (Islington, S.): The hon. Member has gone very fully, and, as he always does, very fairly into the case before the House. I agree with him that the House is greatly indebted to the Chairman of Committees for having brought the circumstances under the notice of the House. If I remember rightly the right hon. Gentleman's Report was presented in pursuance of the Standing Orders which give leave to the Chairman of Committees to make a communication to the House in such circumstances. Now, these Bills have also been introduced in compliance with Standing

Orders, for, notwithstanding the general law, these Standing Orders still exist. I think that fact should be regarded as an acquiescence in the right of a suppliant to initiate such proceedings for the purpose of obtaining naturalisation. If that be so, then I think that if any change is to be made in our procedure we ought, in the first instance, to re-consider the Standing Orders. The hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh) has, however, fairly put the real gist of the matter before the House when he says that it is inexpedient at this stage of a Private Bill, which has already passed through another House, and has entailed considerable cost, to reject the measure. The hon. Member has referred to matters in connection with the disposition of property which do not exist in this case.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: I simply put them to the House as hypotheses in reference to questions of which the House might purposely have been kept in ignorance, and in regard to which we ought not to legislate.

*SIR A. ROLLIT: There are no such circumstances in the present case. This branch of the law is an extremely intricate one, and the legal advisers of Madame Martin no doubt consider that they were justified in advising that lady to proceed by way of special enactment. No legal gentlemen would advise a client to incur unnecessarily the large expense of bringing into Parliament a Bill of this nature, and we may assume that good reasons for that course probably exist.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: If there are such reasons, I think it is the duty of the House not to pass the Bill, because they could only be reasons affecting the disposition of the property.

*SIR A. ROLLIT: I cannot say whether there are or are not such reasons, but if there is any assumption to be made it is that the suppliant in this case has been properly advised. I hope that the Bill will be allowed to pass now that it has reached the final stage, and the heavy expense of its promotion has been incurred.

*SIR R. FOWLER (London): I have had some representations made to me in regard to the next Bill to which the hon. Member has alluded, after it has been carefully considered in another place, and I think it would be a great hardship to reject the measure. I must, therefore, express a hope that in the circumstances the Bill will be allowed to pass the Third Reading.

(3.26.) THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I do not think the House will be induced to give up the powers it possesses of naturalising foreigners on the spot and without delay. The Act of 1870 was passed rather to lay down a general rule of naturalisation than to prevent special and exceptional cases being dealt with by special Acts. At the same time, I fully agree with the hon. Member for Northampton that special Naturalisation Bills should not be brought before the House simply for personal reasons or desires, such as in the case in question. I believe that in the case of Madame Martin she married a Frenchman.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: No, a Spaniard by birth.

MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin): Who was subsequently naturalised as a Frenchman.

MR. MATTHEWS: Whether he was a Spaniard or a Frenchman is immaterial. She desires to become naturalised, and I see no ground of objection, although I agree that she might get all she wants by becoming domiciled.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: I have pointed out that one evil is the retrospective effect of the Bill. Injury might be done by a Bill of this kind to persons who have now legal rights and who have had no opportunity of being heard.

MR. MATTHEWS: I can hardly see how that question can arise. It is true that the distribution of property in this country would be affected, but the English law would apply.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: What I want is a declaration from the Government as to the practice of introducing these Bills.

MR. MATTHEWS: Then I will not pursue the matter further. I can assure the hon. Member that the matter shall not be lost sight of by the Government. In the circumstances, however, it would be proper that the House should pass this Bill.

MR. COURTNEY: I have no right to address the House again, but I hope I may be allowed to say that I dissent from the suggestion of the hon. Member for South Islington (Sir A. Rollit) to alter or re-consider the Standing Orders in regard to such Bills. It may be understood from what has fallen from the Home Secretary that these exceptions to the general law should not be made for purposes of private convenience, and probably that expression of opinion will meet the case.

Question put, and agreed to.

QUESTIONS.

IRELAND—ORANGE ATTACK ON CATHOLIC EXCURSIONISTS.

MR. BLANE (Armagh, S.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland if he is aware that on Sunday, 6th July, a number of Catholic excursionists from Portadown and Armagh, returning from the yearly trip to Lough Neagh, were stoned by an Orange mob at Clonmacate and Cloncore, six miles from Portadown, and that Stephen M'Guigan, senior, and Stephen M'Guigan, junior, were also attacked, and threatened with death; and if the Authorities will take steps to prevent such attacks on excursionists as are alleged to have taken place?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): I must ask the hon. Gentleman to postpone the question, as I have not got the information that will enable me to answer it.

MAGISTERIAL PROCEEDINGS IN GALWAY.

MR. SHEEHY (Galway, S.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he is aware that in a case tried at Kenyara, County Galway, on the 9th instant, a little boy of about 12 years of age was sentenced by Mr. Mayne, R.M., to a month's imprisonment for knocking down the fence of a farm from which his father had been evicted; whether he is also aware that the Magistrate postponed signing the committal warrant for one month, to see if the fence was again interfered with, and declared that if even the present holder of the farm, a man named Fahy, knocked down the fence, he (the Magistrate) would sign the committal warrant of this child; and whether this proceeding by the Magistrate is legal?

MR. MADDEN: I am informed that the present tenant of the evicted farm referred to has received constant annoyance and considerable loss by reason of the farm walls being maliciously knocked down, and his sheep, in consequence, permitted to stray. The evicted tenant's son, who is represented as being apparently between 12 and 14 years of age, having been found, after a previous caution, in the act of pulling down the walls was proceeded against. The facts are not accurately represented in the second paragraph. There was, as a matter of fact, no committal warrant prepared, nor did the Magistrate make the declaration alleged. The Resident Magistrate did not consider for the defendant's age, and as it appeared that he was merely the instrument of others much older than himself, hesitate to send him to prison, and he accordingly adjourned the case, intimating that, if the walls were again interfered with, the adjourned charge would be again gone into.

"MOONLIGHTING" BY A POLICE CONSTABLE.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether it is true that Constable Palmer, who was tried in his absence and convicted of moonlighting at Tipperary, has escaped from justice; and can he explain how it happened that, although Palmer was examined and recognised by the Constabulary detectives at Queenstown, who were acquainted both with his crime and subsequent desertion, he was permitted to leave by the Guion liner Arizona for New York, on Saturday, the 5th July?

MR. MADDEN: The Constabulary Authorities report that it is the case that the constable, who was convicted of having maliciously smashed some windows and of committing an assault, has absconded, but that it is not the case that he was recognised by the police at Queenstown as Constable Palmer. Immediately upon his desertion being discovered a warrant was obtained for his arrest, and every effort made to execute it.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): May I ask whether a Nationalist who committed such an offence would not be arrested at once?

MR. MADDEN: I must explain that the constable could not have been arrested before a warrant was issued.

MR. DILLON: Was not the constable caught red-handed in the commission of a felony, and could he not have been arrested then and there?

MR. MADDEN: The man was summoned by the person aggrieved. No warrant having been issued for his arrest, it was absolutely out of the power of the police to detain him. The man absconded, and a warrant was then at once obtained, and every step taken to prevent his escape.

MR. DILLON: Was the man summoned by the person aggrieved only because the Executive did not do their duty in the first instance? If the offender had been an ordinary civilian, and not a constable, would he not have been arrested at once and prosecuted by the Crown Prosecutor?

MR. MADDEN: What the prisoner did was to break the windows of a house. I am not informed that the offence was committed in the sight of, or with the knowledge of, the police. Proceedings were taken in the ordinary way by summons, and no warrant was applied for until the man absconded.

MR. W. O'BRIEN (Cork Co., N.E.): Does the right hon. Gentleman really intend the House to believe that if this had been a case of moonlighting by an ordinary person the Executive would have left it to the person aggrieved to prosecute?

MR. MADDEN: I cannot answer a hypothetical question of that kind. The remedy open to the aggrieved person in this case was taken.

MR. DILLON: I beg to give notice that I will put further questions on the subject on Monday.

LAND COMMISSION—MR. COMMISSIONER WRENCH.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, at the recent sitting of the Land Commission in Cork on the 3rd instant, Mr. Commissioner Wrench is correctly reported to have said, while hearing a fair rent appeal in the case of M'Grath, tenant, and Bullen landlord, addressing the tenant—

"You are a very wise man to get your grass seeds from England. If more tenants did that they would get better grass. It will pay you well to get your seeds from England ; " and whether intimation will be conveyed to Mr. Wrench, that language such as that quoted is likely to do great mischief to the Irish seed trade ?

MR. MADDEN : I must ask the hon. Gentleman to postpone the question.

DR. TANNER : The question is an important one, and I will put it down for Monday.

IRISH REGISTRY OF DEEDS OFFICE.

MR. M. HEALY (Cork) : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if it is the case that the annual leave of the staff in the Irish Registry of Deeds Office was last year curtailed by from five to nine days ; and whether this year the leave of the staff has not yet commenced ?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. JACKSON, Leeds, N.) : I believe that the facts are as stated in the first paragraph of the question. They will be borne in mind.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) : Is not this the staff which the right hon. Gentleman wanted to cut down ?

MR. JACKSON : No, Sir.

THE BARONY CONSTABLE OF KERRY.

MR. KILBRIDE (Kerry, S.) : I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he is aware that during the term of office of Arthur Hutchins, late of Roughty, Kenmare, who was for some years Barony Constable in Kerry, there was considerable defalcations in connection with the collection of the County Cess ; if so, what was the amount of the defalcations ; who were his sureties, and for what amount ; and what steps have the Grand Jury taken to recover the amount ?

MR. MADDEN : The matter in question is not one in any way under the control of the Government. But the Secretary to the Grand Jury states that the entire amount of County Cess due by Mr. Hutchins at the time he ceased to be collector was £2,484 5s., of which, however, it was stated that a portion had not been collected. Messrs. H. Stokes and T. Bateman were his sureties in bonds of £2,500 and £4,000, and proceedings, by direction of the Grand Jury, under the advice of counsel, were immediately instituted against them. These proceedings have not yet reached a successful issue, but, in the opinion of their legal advisers, there is no doubt that the amount of the default will be recovered.

MR. KILBRIDE : What is the nature of the proceedings ? A considerable period of time has now elapsed since the money became due—three or four years, I believe.

MR. MADDEN : The matter is one which is not in the hands of the Government.

MR. KILBRIDE : Is it not the fact that this gentleman is now in the employment of the hon. Member for South Hunts (Mr. Smith-Barry) ?

MR. MADDEN : I have given all the information in my possession.

MR. DILLON : Do not the Government possess the same power of imprisoning a defaulter in this case as they have exercised in imprisoning a Poor Law Guardian who has been surcharged ?

MR. MADDEN : I have no power whatever to interfere between the Grand Jury and a debtor, or to give them any advice.

A LADY WOUNDED BY A REVOLVER BULLET.

MR. KILBRIDE : I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he has seen the report in the Press that Mrs. Hawkes Maybury, of Caher Lodge, Kenmare, whilst walking through the avenue leading to Lansdowne Lodge, was wounded in the arm by a revolver bullet, fired by an official in the employ of Mr. J. Townsend Trench, who was practising in the use of the revolver ; whether this official had a licence to carry a revolver ; and whether, owing to the serious nature of this occurrence, he will instruct the police to take steps to insure the public safety ?

MR. MADDEN : The Constabulary Authorities report that it is the case that Mrs. Maybury was accidentally wounded, as stated in the question. The man who fired the shot is a farmer's son. He does not appear to have been at the time in Mr. Trench's employment. The reply to the second paragraph is in the affirmative. The police take all practicable steps to secure the public safety. But in the case in question the shot seems to have been fired in private grounds, and no complaint appears to have been made to the police alleging any culpable negligence in the matter

MR. KILBRIDE: How far was it from the road that the shot was fired?

MR. MADDEN: I am unable to say.

THE CAMP AT GLENBEIGH.

MR. KILBRIDE: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether his attention has been called to the fact that the Field Artillery have completed their practice at Glenbeigh range for this year, and that it has been found most suitable for the purpose: whether the site of the encampment is about to be taken over by the Royal Engineers, so as constitute it a permanent camp; and whether, in view of the fact that Glenbeigh is 12 miles distant from nearest railway station, and that under the proposed Light Railway from Killorglin to Caherciveen, opening up one of the most congested districts in Ireland, provision is made for a railway station at Glenbeigh, the Government would take into consideration the facilities which the line would afford for transit to and from the camp, in addition to the local advantages it would confer, and take steps to enable the promoters to construct the line?

*MR. JACKSON: I am informed that a Report in regard to the camp at Glenbeigh has not yet been received, but the whole circumstances will be fully considered.

MR. W. T. TOWNSHEND, J.P.

MR. GILHOOLY (Cork, W.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland by what right did Mr. W. Tower Townshend, J.P., of Myross Wood, County Cork, sit and vote at the Presentment Sessions at Skibereen on November 12th, 1889, May 13th, 1890, and at Ballydehob, on November 13th, 1889, and May 14th, 1890, as also on previous occasions; whether he holds any property in either division of the barony; whether he is aware that Mr. Townshend voted on one of the occasions mentioned for the appointment of landlord J.P.'s as directors of the Schull and Skibereen Tramway, to represent the cesspayers, and opposed the nominees of the cesspayers; and whether, if Magistrates should not go outside their own Petty Sessions district to vote at Presentment Sessions, he will bring the conduct of Mr. Townshend under the notice of the Lord Chancellor?

MR. MADDEN: I am informed that Mr. Tower Townshend is a Magistrate of the County Cork, and that as such he has power, under the Grand Jury Act, to sit at all Presentment Sessions in the county. Mr. Townshend is reported to represent large properties in the two Baronies referred to as agent for his brother and other owners. I have no information as to the particular business which came before the Presentment Sessions, or how the justices assembled and associated ratepayers voted.

CAVAN, LEITRIM, AND ROSCOMMON RAILWAY.

MR. KNOX (Cavan, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether his attention has now been called to the resolution approved by the Grand Jury of County Cavan, calling for the increase of the Government guarantee to the shareholders in the Cavan, Leitrim, and Roscommon Railway Company to three per cent. and the abolition of the baronial guarantee; whether he is now aware that a strike against the extra cess is likely to take place, and was only averted by the hope of Government intervention; whether his attention has been called to the references made at the Carlow Assizes to the difficulty of collecting the extra cess in that county; upon whom the cost of executing warrants for such extra cess falls by law; and whether, upon further consideration, and in the interests of economy, the Government will accede to the proposal already made, namely, that a Committee should be appointed, consisting of the Members for the district concerned and the Member for North Armagh, with power to draw up a scheme, to be embodied in a Bill dealing with the question?

*MR. JACKSON: I have not yet seen the resolution of the Grand Jury of County Cavan referred to by the hon. Member; nor am I aware of any likelihood of a strike against the payment of county cess in that county or of difficulties in collecting the extra cess in the County Carlow. The effect of such a strike in the County Cavan would be to relieve the Treasury from the payment of the 2 per cent. contributed by it under the Tramways Act, 1883. The costs of executing a distress warrant for the cess falls on the defaulting cesspayer. The circumstances of the case do not seem to me to call for Government interference.

THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF SCIENCE, DUBLIN.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether it is true that the Professorship of Geology at the Royal College of Science, Dublin, is about to become vacant; whether it is the case that no Irishman has been appointed to any of the professorships in this college for a period now extending to close on 20 years, and whether the Department intend to continue this anomaly; and whether, having regard to the contemplated reduction of the permanent staff of the Geological Survey of Ireland, the Department will consider the advisability of now appointing to such vacancy (when it occurs) a gentleman who, in addition to the usual qualifications, would be competent to lecture upon the economic, geological, and mineral resources of Ireland, and able to give skilled opinion on such subjects to persons in Ireland who may in future require technical advice and information of the kind?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): I am informed that the Professor of Geology is likely to retire shortly, but I have received no official intimation of the fact. It happens that only one of the five professors appointed within the last 20 years is an Irishman, but that is an accidental circumstance, as the selections were made purely on the grounds of scientific attainments. I have no doubt but that, when the professorship is vacant, the Lord President, with whom the appointment rests, will do his best to secure the services of the fittest man for the post, but with the small salary attached to it (£200 a year) the hon. Member will see that it would be difficult to impose on the professor, besides his college duties, the various functions suggested in the last part of his question.

FASTNET ROCK LIGHTHOUSE.

MR. GILHOOLY: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade, what has been the cost per week, since the 30th January last, of the attendance of the steamship Alert on the Fastnet Rock Lighthouse; whether a local contractor tendered to perform the work at less than £3 per week, under penalties, and give the choice of two of the best boats on the coast; and, if so, why was his tender rejected; and whether he is aware that it was one of the boats offered by the contractor referred to that effected the relief of the imprisoned and starving lightkeepers during the severe gales of the 23rd and 24th January last?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): I have asked the Lighthouse Board in Dublin for information to enable me to answer the hon. Member's question, and I will let him know the result.

CASE OF MICHAEL MORRISEY.

MR. CAREW (Kildare, N.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland with reference to the case of Michael Morrissey, at present in gaol on a charge of contempt of Court, whether he has considered the possibility of ordering the prisoner's release?

MR. MADDEN: The matter is solely one for the consideration of the committing Judge. The prisoner can at any time obtain his immediate release by purging his contempt.

THE IRISH PHARMACEUTICAL SOCIETY.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland with reference to a prosecution pending at the suit of the Irish Pharmaceutical Society against chemists and druggists in Belfast, whether any steps can be taken with a view to a postponement of this and any similar cases until the sense of Parliament has been fully ascertained in reference to the Pharmacy (Ireland) Act Amendment Bill, which was passed through the House of Commons, and is now before the other House of Parliament?

MR. MADDEN: The prosecutions referred to in the question were not instituted by my directions, and appear to be at the suit of private prosecutors. I have, therefore, no power to interfere in the matter suggested in the question.

THE QUEEN'S UNIVERSITY.

MR. PINKERTON (Galway): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland

whether his attention has been directed to a judgment of the Court of Exchequer, whereby it would appear that certain professors of the late Queen's University have sustained a loss of nearly one-half their incomes by the dissolution of that University, and to the observations of Chief Baron Palles and Mr. Baron Dowse as to the imperfections in the Act which prevent the legal award of compensation; and whether Government will give effect, by legislation or otherwise, to the suggestions of the learned Judges?

MR. MADDEN: I am making inquiry. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will be good enough to postpone the question until Monday.

WICKLOW SUMMER ASSIZES.

MR. W. CORBET (Wicklow, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that the special jurors from the baronies of Shillilagh, North and South, and Ballinacor, were served with summonses to attend the Wicklow Summer Assizes, at the Court House, Wicklow, on the 19th of July, at 10 o'clock in the morning; whether he is aware that the hour named renders it impossible for them to reach Wicklow by the first train from Tinahely, and obliges them to drive from 30 to 40 miles to be in time for the opening of the Court; and whether, under the circumstances, he will suggest that the hour of meeting be postponed, in order that the jurors may be enabled to travel by train?

MR. MADDEN: The Executive Government have no control over the arrangements in regard to the attendances of jurors at Assizes. I am, therefore, unable to adopt the suggestions contained in the concluding paragraph of the question.

CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE ACT —RETURNS OF PROSECUTIONS.

MR. O'KEEFE (Limerick City): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he can state the number of persons who have been prosecuted under the Criminal Law and Procedure Act in Ireland from 1st July, 1889, to present day, with their names and sentences?

MR. MADDEN: Full Returns as to persons proceeded against under the statute quoted have been already laid upon the Table. The last continuation one (Parliamentary Paper No. 128 of this Session) deals with the period from November 30, 1888, to March 31, 1890. To compile a Return for the period mentioned in the question would take several days. The following information may, however, be of use to the hon. Member:—For the period July 1, 1889, to July 1, 1890, the proceedings under the statute mentioned were as follows:—Total number of cases (not persons) prosecuted, 262; total number of convictions, 211; total number of dismissals, 51.

PAYMENT OF POSTMEN.

MR. O'KEEFE: I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he will equalise the scale of payment for town postmen in the provinces and Ireland in same degree as those for sorting clerks; and whether he will give an increase in wages to the postmen corresponding to that now being given to sorting clerks and telegraphists in Irish offices?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): No, Sir. It will not be practicable to proceed on the same lines as those indicated by the hon. Member. The organisation of the town postmen was settled not very long ago, and I do not feel justified in disturbing its general outline. The plan of organisation admits of adjustments in particular cases where necessary, and it is my intention to deal with the subject from that point of view.

THE GENERAL POST OFFICE, DUBLIN.

MR. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether the concessions recently granted to telegraphists are to apply to the sorters in the General Post Office, Dublin?

*MR. RAIKES: The case of the sorters in Dublin, as well, indeed, as that of those in Edinburgh, is about to be dealt with in common with the case of the sorters in London.

THE "PELICAN CLUB."

MR. COGHILL (Newcastle-under-Lyme): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the "Pelican Club;" whether he is aware that prize fights are habitually held there on Sunday evenings, under the name of boxing competitions. And whether the police have had any instructions given them with regard to it?

MR. MATTHEWS: Yes, Sir; my attention has been called to this club. I have received a letter from a member of the Committee of the club, who denies absolutely that either prize fighting or boxing in any form is carried on at the club on Sunday evenings. The police have no special instructions with regard to this club, but if I am furnished with any information to the effect that the law is being violated, I will have inquiry made.

In answer to a further question from Mr. COGHILL,

MR. MATTHEWS said: I have no information as to the size of the gloves used.

DEATH FROM EXHAUSTION.

MR. WEBSTER (St. Pancras, E.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been called to the case of one William Lee, an old man, who died in the workhouse at Ledbury, in Herefordshire, on the 3rd instant, and on whose body an inquest was held, when it appeared that he had lain in a field from 7 o'clock one evening till 6 o'clock the next evening, although several persons saw him during that time, including the residents in a cottage close to the spot, not one of whom rendered him the slightest assistance; whether the doctor who saw him at the workhouse stated at the inquest that the deceased died from exhaustion induced by exposure, and that if he had been attended to as soon as he had been found he would probably have lived; whether certain of the witnesses at the inquest were severely censured by the Coroner, at the request of the jury; and whether he will cause further inquiries to be made into this lamentable occurrence?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): The only information that I have as to the case referred to is a newspaper report of the proceedings at the inquest. From that report it appears that the deceased, on the afternoon of the 2nd July, went to a public house, where he had a pint of beer, and later in the day he returned there and had two pints of beer. He left about 7 o'clock, and on the next morning at about 6 o'clock he was found by Thomas Gibbons, a labourer, lying by a path in a field. Gibbons returned home and told his wife, and asked her to let someone know the man was there. The wife stated that she was very unwell, and was not able to go for assistance, but between 9 and 10 o'clock she informed a man in the service of the person who kept the public house where the deceased had been on the previous day, who went to the place where the deceased was and gave him some brandy. He sent a message to where the man had been living, but they refused to receive him there. He then sent for the police, who caused the deceased to be removed to the workhouse. As soon as the man was received there he was placed in bed and a doctor sent for, but he died at 5 o'clock on the following morning. The medical man, who gave evidence at the inquest, stated that the deceased died from exhaustion induced by exposure, and said that if he had been attended to as soon as he was found the result might have been different. The man was not destitute, as, when he was searched, 5s. 3d. was found upon him. It appears that the jury commented severely on the apathy of the Gibbonses, and that, at their request, the Coroner censured them for their conduct. There is no allegation whatever that any blame attached to the officers of the Guardians in the case. The circumstances attending the death were fully inquired into at the inquest, and it does not appear to me that any advantage can result from any further inquiry by the Local Government Board.

*MR. COOKE (Newington, W.): Instead of relying upon the report in the newspaper would it not be better to have the depositions taken before the Coroner?

*MR. RITCHIE: I will procure them, if necessary, but they are not prepared by any official over whom the Local Government Board has any control.

H.M.S. CALLIOPE.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether any and what reward, promotion, or recognition has been given to the Captain, engineers, officers, and crew of H.M.S. Calliope for their gallant conduct in the hurricane at Samoa last year?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): No general reward has been given to the officers and crew of the Calliope for the successful navigation of the vessel during the hurricane at Samoa last year, as it is contrary to the traditions of the Naval Service that services of this nature, however gallant, performed in the ordinary course of duty afloat, should be regarded as deserving of special and immediate recognition. The position of the late officers of the Calliope is, however, as follows—The Captain is now in command of the Inflexible, one of the largest ironclads in the Navy; the first Lieutenant has since been made a commander; and the chief engineer has been advanced to the rank of staff engineer. The remaining officers have received appointments to important ships. The gunner's mate, who specially distinguished himself, will be promoted to gunner as soon as he qualifies. The Admiralty have formally expressed their high approval of the seamanship displayed on the occasion, and this will have due weight in considering the services of the officers for promotion or future employment.

THE SLAVE TRADE.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if, in the negotiations now being carried on between this country and Portugal, due precautions will be taken to ensure the prevention of the Slave Trade in all territories placed under Portuguese protection.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): Portugal, as one of the Signatories of the Brussels Act, has bound herself to make every effort for the suppression of the Slave Trade in her territories.

PORTUGAL AND EAST AFRICA.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): May I ask when the negotiations between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of Portugal with regard to the delimitation of the spheres of influence of the two countries in Africa are likely to be completed; and whether the right hon. Gentleman can assure the House that the Shiré Highlands will be kept within the British sphere of influence?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The hon. Member, I am sure, must see that I cannot answer that question without notice, having regard to the very delicate character of the negotiations pending.

USIBEPU.

MR. HANBURY (Preston): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether Usibepu has been allowed to return to the North of Zululand since the trial of the Zulu Chiefs; and, if so, for how long, and whether by the order of the Governor; and whether he is in future to be kept to the Reserve?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): The answer to the first part of the question is in the negative. The Governor, on hearing that Usibepu had set out without authority in July, 1889, recalled him at once. Her Majesty's Government have not yet arrived at any decision as to the locality in which Usibepu and his people are to reside.

MR. HANBURY: Without the authority of the Governor?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: Certainly. I have already stated, in my answer to the hon. Member's question, that the Governor, on hearing that Usibepu had set out without authority, recalled him at once.

SAVINGS BANK CLERKS.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether the names of the established clerks in the Savings Bank Department, who forwarded to him the Memorials of the 5th ult. and 3rd inst. respectively, have been presented to the Civil Service Commissioners for appointment to the Second Division of clerks; and whether the required certificates of appointment have been issued, and, if so, on what date?

*MR. RAIKES: No, Sir. The technical details connected with this matter are now under the consideration of the Treasury.

POLITICAL AIDE-DE-CAMP TO THE SECRETARY FOR INDIA.

MR. BIRRELL (Fife, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India what are the duties and salary of the Political Aide-de-Camp to the Secretary of State for India; out of what funds such salary is paid; and, if the same is paid out of the Revenues raised in India, whether, in the interests of Indian taxpayers, he will consider the advisability of abolishing the office; and whether the holder of such office is under any, and what, supervision so far as regards the effective discharge of the duties (if any) appertaining to such office?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): The duties of the Political Aide-de-Camp to the Secretary of State are: To attend on Native Princes visiting this country; to represent the Secretary of State when natives are presented at Court; to exercise a general supervision over the welfare of natives, students, and others sent to this country by the Government of India, or recommended to the good offices of the Secretary of State; to make recommendations to the Secretary of State as to the disposal of the cases of destitute natives who apply for relief to the India Office. His salary is £500 with £300 for contingencies. He is paid from the Revenues of India. The Secretary of State does not contemplate the abolition of the office. The Political Aide-de-Camp is like other members of the establishment of the India Office, under the control of the Secretary of State.

THE FACTORIES AND WORKSHOPS ACTS IN INDIA.

MR. T. HARROP SIDEBOTTOM (Stalybridge): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether, in view of the stringent manner in which it is thought necessary to administer the Factories and Workshops Acts in this country, he can state when our Indian fellow-subjects are likely to receive some share of the benefits of similar legislation, however slight?

*SIR J. GORST: Yes, Sir; the Secretary of State hopes that our Indian fellow-subjects will receive some share in the benefits of the factory legislation which has been so beneficial in this country.

TRANSIT DUTY ON INDIAN SPUN YARN.

MR. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the Chinese Government have by an Imperial Edict raised the transit duty on Indian spun yarn by 3·10 dollars a bale; and whether the Government have any official cognisance of this new arrangement?

*SIR J. GORST: No, Sir; this is not a matter which has come under the official cognisance of the Secretary of State, but he has reason to believe that the proper Department is making inquiry.

ALLOTMENTS IN DORSET.

SIR WALTER FOSTER (Derby, Ilkeston): I beg to ask the hon. Member for Penrith (Mr. J. W. Lowther), as representing the Charity Commissioners, whether he is aware that the labourers of Dazelbury Brian, in the County of Dorset, applied in the year 1887 to the Trustees of the Poors Land to set out the same in allotments, in accordance with the provisions of "The Allotments Act, 1882"; whether, in consequence of the persistent refusal of the Trustees to allot the land, an inquiry was held on behalf of the Commissioners in January last, with the result of showing that the Charity lands were well suited for allotments; whether in May last the Trustees proposed to rent two fields from Mr. Digby for allotments, which were declined by the labourers of the parish as entirely unsuitable for the purpose; and whether, the poors land having been ascertained at the public inquiry to be well suited for allotments, the Commissioners propose to take steps to ensure the due carrying out of the Allotments Act of 1882 by the Trustees?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER (Cumberland, Penrith): The answer to the first question is, Yes. An inquiry was held by an Inspector on January 8, 1890, with the result that he considered five out of the nine pieces of land belonging to the charity to be conveniently situated for allotments. Some of the labourers, including Herbert Carter, expressed themselves at the inquiry satisfied with the land proposed to be hired from Mr. Digby; but this proposal has since been declined by Herbert Carter, acting, as is alleged, on behalf of certain labourers. The charity land cannot be let under the Allotments Extension Act, 1882, until it falls into possession at Lady Day, 1891. In the event of the labourers persisting in their refusal of the land proposed to be hired from Mr. Digby, the Commissioners will direct the Trustees at Michaelmas next to give the necessary notices to set apart a suitable portion of the charity land in allotments.

CHATHAM DOCKYARD.

MR. EDWARD KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Rochester): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether any great amount of extra time has recently been worked in the Clerical Department of Her Majesty's Dockyard, Chatham; whether the regulations provide that, when continuous overtime is thus being worked, the Admiralty should be informed, with a view to steps being taken to remove such strain upon the staff; and, whether in this instance, such information has been received?

LORD G. HAMILTON: No such amount of extra time as would seem to be implied in the question of the hon. Member for Rochester has recently been worked in the Clerical Department at Chatham Dockyard. The regulations direct that continuous employment for lengthened periods beyond official hours is to be reported to the Admiralty; but no strain of this nature has occurred.

CARNARVON CASTLE.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE (Carnarvon, &c.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in filling the vacancy in the Constableness of Carnarvon Castle, occasioned by the death of Lord Carnarvon, the Government will accede to the strong wish, repeatedly expressed by the Town Council of Carnarvon, that the appointment should be conferred upon the Mayor of the town for the time being?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): The wish which has been expressed by the Town Council of Carnarvon is receiving careful consideration on the part of the Prime Minister, but

Mr. J. W. Lowther

Her Majesty's Government are not at present in a position to make any statement as to the choice of a successor to the late Lord Carnarvon.

FEMALE TYPE-WRITERS.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury in what Departments of the Civil Service it has been decided to employ female type-writers; whether the appointment of type-writers in any Department is made through the agency of the Civil Service Commission, or whether each Department is left to make its own appointments; whether it is obligatory on Departments to employ any particular typing instrument; and what scale of salary is approved by the Treasury for payment to typists in the Departments in which sanction to such employment is given?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The Royal Commission on Civil Establishments favoured the employment of women in Public Departments under proper arrangements, and they pointed especially to the value of their work as type-writers. The Treasury, in their Minute of August 10 last, on the Report of the Commission (paragraph 27) expressed their entire concurrence, and they are doing all in their power to encourage Departments to employ female type-writers. I am happy to say they are employed with good results in many Departments, such as the Inland Revenue, the War Office, the Customs, the Foreign Office, and the Treasury. Each Department appoints its own type-writers, and selects the instruments. The scale approved by the Treasury ranges between 14s. and 24s. a week, according to service and experience.

BLOCKING PUBLIC THOROUGHFARES.

SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I beg to ask who is the authority to regulate the temporary blocking of the main thoroughfares of the Metropolis for building or similar purposes; by whose permission, in the very height of the London season, in the most frequented part of Piccadilly, not only the whole of the foot pavement, but a considerable portion of the carriage way, has been enclosed for building; and to whom an aggrieved citizen must apply for redress?

MR. MATTHEWS: I must refer the hon. Member to the Metropolis Local Management Acts, 18 & 19 Vict., c. 120, and 25 & 26 Vict., c. 102, for information on the subject of his question. Speaking generally, the Vestry, by their clerk or surveyor, give permission for the erection of hoardings which encroach on the public streets. The law requires such hoardings to be put up when a house is taken down or built. The aggrieved citizen should go to the Vestry.

THE WINTER SESSION.

MR. WEBB (Waterford, W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in making arrangements for next Session, he has fully considered the great inconvenience a pre-Christmas meeting of Parliament would cause to Members who have not permanent homes in London (especially Irish Members), necessitating, as such an arrangement would, additional unsettlement in domestic arrangements, and two journeys additional at the most inclement season of the year?

MR. W. A. MACDONALD (Queen's Co., Ossory): Before the right hon. Gentleman answers the question, I wish to ask whether he has considered that, as the contemplated arrangement involves a Session of eight months instead of six, it is right to make so important a change in procedure without the consent of Parliament?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I must remind the hon. Gentleman that it rests with the Crown as to when Parliament should be called together. The Government are, of course, reluctant to put hon. Members to any inconvenience, but, having regard to the state of public business, we see no way by which the meeting in November can be avoided.

ARMENIA.

MR. SCHWANN (Manchester, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs whether it is true, as stated in the Daily News of to-day, that it was owing to the advice of the British Government that the Turks are increasing the military in Armenia; also whether his attention has been called to the report in the same paper that in Erzeroum people disappear, no one knows whither, and that during the late riots about 700 persons disappeared, mostly women, who were at the public baths at the time, and are supposed to have been abducted by Mussulmans? If he has no information on the latter point, would he kindly cause inquiries to be made?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: There can be no reason why the question should not be placed on the Paper.

ALIENS.

Address for—

"Return showing the names of all Aliens to whom Certificates of Naturalisation have been issued since the 16th day of August, 1889 (in continuation of Parliamentary Paper, No. 325, of Session 1889)."—(Mr. Lawson.)

MIDWIVES' REGISTRATION BILL.

(No. 29.)

Reported from the Select Committee.

Report to lie upon the Table, and to be printed. [No. 311.]

Minutes of Proceedings to be printed. [No. 311.]

Bill re-committed to a Committee of the whole House for Wednesday next, and to be printed. [Bill 391.]

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS.

That they have agreed to,—Barracks Bill, without any Amendment.

That they have passed a Bill, intituled "An Act to amend the Law relating to the Custody of Children." [Custody of Children Bill [Lords].]

COLONIAL COURTS OF ADMIRALTY BILL [LORDS].—(No. 280.)

Bill, as amended, considered (Queen's Consent signified).

(4.16.) MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): When the Bill was last before the House I addressed an inquiry to the right hon. Gentleman in charge of it as to the manner in which certain colonies would be affected by it, and he was good enough to say that he would consider the question whether the Preamble should not be modified in order to save the rights of the colonies.

*(4.16). THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): It does not seem to me that any alteration in the Preamble is required.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read the third time, and passed, with an Amendment.

PARTNERSHIP BILL [LORDS].—(No. 373.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

(4.18.) MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): I am surprised that the Attorney General has not risen to explain the provisions of this Bill. It certainly seems to me improper that at so late a period of the Session it should be proposed to introduce a sort of codification of so important a branch of the law, which is, to apply, not only to England and Ireland, but to Scotland as well. The Bill has not been submitted to the people of Scotland, and I beg to move the adjournment of the Debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Hunter.)

*(4.19.) SIR R. WEBSTER: I stated last night that this Bill has been most fully considered by a Select Committee in another place, and that it has been carefully examined both by Lord Herschell and Lord Justice Lindley. It is, with some Amendments, practically the Bill which was printed and circulated last Session, and the provisions in reference to Scotland have been considered by the Lord Advocate. I have no objection after the Bill has been read a second time to put off the Committee stage for a week so that a full opportunity may be afforded to hon. Members for submitting Amendments.

(4.21.) MR. WALLACE (Edinburgh, E.): I feel bound to support the Motion for the Adjournment of the Debate, in the interests of the people of Scotland. I do not think that many Members of the House are at all acquainted with the provisions of the Bill. I, for one, have not had time to make myself acquainted with the details of the measure, and their full bearing upon the public commercial interests of Scotland. The best way of giving the Scotch people an opportunity of seeing how their interests are affected will be, I think, to defer the Second Reading, and not to put off discussion until the Committee stage of the Bill.

(4.22.) MR. SINCLAIR (Falkirk, &c.): I hope that the Motion for the Adjournment of the Debate will not be carried. I did not look at the Bill until after the Debate which occurred last night; but I have done so now, and as a commercial man I am of opinion that it is a most valuable measure, and one that ought to be passed into law.

Original Question again proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

DR. CLARK (Caithness): To what extent will the Bill modify the Scotch partnership law? I understand that there is nothing controversial in it except that it modifies the Scotch procedure.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): The Bill is a Consolidation Bill, and it does not, so far as Scotland is concerned, modify or alter the law except in one or two points of the merest detail. One of the most competent professors of Scotch Law has used the Bill as a hand-book for teaching Scotch Law, because it is so accurate and so concise. I have had strong representations that it will deprive Scotland of a great benefit if this clear and lucid statement of partnership law is denied.

MR. WALLACE: Who is the professor?

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: The professor to whom I referred was Professor Rankine, of the University of Edinburgh.

MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): I should like to ask whether the Bill as regards England is merely a Consolidating Bill, or whether it does not make one or two alterations of the law?

*SIR R. WEBSTER: There are one or two minor alterations which I shall be glad to point out to any hon. Member who desires it.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday, 28th July.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES,
1890-91.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

CLASS III.

1. £97,499, to complete the sum for Prisons, Ireland.

(4.37.) MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I desire to say a few words principally with reference to the continued imprisonment of Mr. Morrissey, one of the Clongorey prisoners, for contempt of Court. A remarkable judgment has, I am informed, just been delivered by Judge O'Brien, who has held that the entire procedure adopted by the landlord in this case was wrong, that the County Court Judge was wrong in his action, and, consequently, that this man is illegally imprisoned. I am not in a position to say definitely what the learned Judge did rule, but I should not be surprised if the report is true, as I have always held, that the action of the landlord was imprudent—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! That question cannot be discussed on this Vote.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I am aware that I am not entitled to discuss the merits of the case on this Vote, but I intend to ask the Government with regard to the continued imprisonment of Morrissey, if they will not take steps for his release? The man's mother, who was the actual tenant, and his wife and her baby have been released already. I suggest that the man is illegally detained in gaol, and I hope if Judge O'Brien's decision is laid before the Government they will take steps to release the man, who has been in gaol since March last. Clongorey is the only case in which the Chief Secretary has acted reasonably, for he condemned the conduct of the Resident Magistrate and the prosecutions were stopped, to the great advantage of the neighbourhood. With regard to the suggestion that the Government have no power to order the release of this man, I may point out that they have the power or they could not have released his wife and her mother. Surely if an injustice is being done they can find an avenue to prevent his further detention in gaol. The other matter on which I wish to ask the attention of the Government is the case of Mr. M'Enery, the editor of the Limerick Leader, who has been sentenced to six months' imprisonment and a further term of three months in default of giving bail to be of good behaviour. Now, I am of opinion that if it had not been for a certain letter written by the Chief Secretary, expressing a strong opinion on this man's guilt, the sentence would have been less by three months. I think it would only be decent for the Government to direct that when M'Enery has served his term of six months' hard labour he shall be released—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! It is quite irregular on this Vote to discuss the question of the release of prisoners on the ground of the excessive length of the sentence, or the illegality of their detention. The only question which can be discussed is their treatment in gaol.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Then I will refer to Mr. M'Enery's treatment. Several complaints have already been made in this House of his treatment. Dr. Moorhead, a local Magistrate, has made a series of entries in the prison book with regard to this case, and has given it as his opinion that the prisoner's health is being seriously affected. The fact is Tullamore Gaol is now being converted into a kind of receptacle for all kinds of political prisoners; the Government seem to have selected one central prison in which their instructions can be carried out in an approved fashion. Now the Home Secretary has expressed his willingness to move the Scotch convicts convicted in connection with the dynamite outrages to Scotland. Yet here you have Mr. M'Enery confined in Tullamore Gaol for nine months, 100 miles from his native locality, rendering it difficult and expensive for his wife and friends to visit him at the statutory periods. I say the action of the Government in confining Crimes Act prisoners in one central gaol wherever they may have been convicted is most sinister.

(4.50.) MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): In common with the other Votes, this one shows an increase, and I commend that fact to the attention of the Committee and of the country. I am going to refer to the question of the treatment of Crimes Act prisoners. I hope that the Chief Secretary will not, as he has done on previous occasions, say that he is not responsible for the treatment of those prisoners. I would remind him of the evidence given at an inquest at Fermoy in which a doctor said he had visited Tullamore Gaol because Mr. Burke, the Chairman of the Prisons Board, had informed him that it was the wish of the Chief Secretary he should do so. We find some curious changes in connection with prison administration. The right hon. Gentleman plumes himself in this House and on platforms outside on the consistency of his administration. But he has been driven by the force of public opinion to abandon the vindictive prosecution of journalists and newsvendors, and to retire step by step from the utterly indefensible position he took up years ago. He has abandoned the practice of cutting the hair and shaving the moustache off political prisoners, and he does not now force them to wear the odious prison garb. In these matters he has surrendered to public indignation. The Prison Authorities, from the Governor down to the lowest warder, are as amenable to the touch of the right hon. Gentleman on the instrument as any of his Magistrates in Ireland. Just as the right hon. Gentleman blows hot or cold, so the treatment of the prisoners alters. I will give an instance showing in a sinister light the manner in which the Prison Authorities obey the behests of the right hon. Gentleman. At one time in Cork Gaol there were quite a number of Crimes Act prisoners. It so happened that four or five of the prisoners, myself included, were removed into one of the infirmary wards to get special treatment. The Prisons Board viewed this with great suspicion; they promptly sent down on a surprise visit a Medical Inspector from Dublin in order to see if they could catch the prison doctor napping, and they sought to deprive him of his right of initiation in the matter of the medical treatment of prisoners. Would such a course be adopted in an English prison? What was done in another case? Why my hon. Friend the Member for West Kerry was treated with an indignity which, directed as it was by the right hon. Gentleman against a political opponent, reflected very little credit on him or his administration. My hon. Friend's moustache and whiskers were cut off with circumstances of physical force under the pretence that it was necessary for personal cleanliness. My hon. Friend was also taken from Tralee to Tullamore Gaol without notice many miles away from his family and friends, and was treated in a most cruel manner; he was treated as badly as the lowest criminal in the land. I find from the Report of the Visiting Judge that Mr. Harrington complained to him. The Report is as follows:—Dr. G. F. Moorhead says—

"He complained 'that it was a straining of the Prison Rules to remove his moustache, and that he claimed exemption under the rules of personal cleanliness; that the Governor informed him it would be removed by force, at a time when a reply concerning the question was pending from the Prisons Board, and that he (Mr. Harrington) regarded this action as an attempt to bring him into conflict with the Prison Rules; that he was removed from Tralee Prison without notice or reason being assigned, which he regarded as a great hardship to his wife or friends, who would have to travel such a distance for a 15 minutes' visit, and that he would claim to be sent back to Tralee Gaol to receive a visit when permitted.'"

Here are two distinct complaints; first of all, that my hon. Friend, for reasons best known to the right hon. Gentleman, was removed from Tralee Gaol, where he might have had the satisfaction of an occasional visit from his wife and friends, to Tullamore. We want to know on what system the Prisons Board have proceeded. Can it be said that my hon. Friend was removed for greater security? I suppose we may assume that Tralee Gaol was large enough to confine the prisoners in. Why was the removal made? I imagine that the idea in the mind of the Government was to make a central gaol, in which political prisoners convicted under the Crimes Act might be confined with the least supervision, and in order that the punishments might be made as bitter and as cruel as possible. I want to know why my hon. Friend was removed, as well as Mr. O'Mahony, Alderman Hooper, Jasper Tully, and many others? Why were these gentlemen removed from different parts of Ireland to this gaol where the Government had a fine, stalwart Governor to carry out their behests? The taxpayer will want to know these things, and we, therefore, demand information. My hon. Friend made another complaint, as to the clipping of his moustache and hair. Why was that done at that particular moment, seeing that it was then that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, under pressure of public opinion from without, was altering the regulations? I say that the action of the right hon. Gentleman is a proof of his malignity—and let me here remark that my hon. Friend himself has never brought forward any complaint in this House as to his prison treatment. There is no reason, however, why his colleagues should not do so, and why they should not call attention to the indignities inflicted on everyone imprisoned under the Coercion Act. It may be said that this is an old case, because it occurred 12 months ago; but the recollection of the appearance of my hon. Friend, when he attended to give evidence before the Special Commission, is still fresh in our memories. It was palpable to everyone that he had been subjected to a long course of barbarous treatment. There was a pinched look of hunger in his eyes, and he was worn almost to the bone, so that no one could look upon him without feeling the greatest commiseration and the greatest detestation of a Government which could pursue a political adversary to such a length. We shall be told by the right hon. Gentleman that this is an ancient case—with his usual regard for veracity—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

MR. FLYNN: Well, with his usual scrupulous adherence to accuracy.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

MR. FLYNN: I will now deal with a more recent case, that of Mr. J. E. O'Mahony, editor of the Tipperary Nationalist. His was a case of a Press offence, if ever there was one. He is undergoing imprisonment for the grave offence of publishing in his paper certain proceedings of the National League. He was sent first to Clonmel Gaol, and was thence transferred to Tullamore. A short time ago Alderman Cantwell, a Visiting Justice, saw him. In reply to the Alderman, Mr. O'Mahony said:—

"I have to say I'm shockingly treated by both Governor Andrews and Dr. Hewetson, prison doctor. Indeed, if they had conspired with the garrison outside they could not go about persecuting me worse. The morning after I was brought in here the Governor came into my cell. I was in the bed, being unable to rise. He asked me to wear prison clothes, and I, of course, declined. I then asked him for a form to apply to the Prisons Board for permission for Messrs. Burke & Crean, solicitors, to see me in connection with the actions of Colonel Caddell, R.M., and Bob Power against the Tipperary Nationalist and myself, and he answered by asking, 'Is that scurrilous rag to be revived again? The town is quiet without it.' Leaving the cell, he sneeringly added, 'Matters, I suppose, could not go on without that rag!' 'This attack,' continued Mr. O'Mahony, 'was absolutely wanton and unprovoked. I asked to see the doctor, but was partly prepared for him, because the Tipperary Nationalist gave him some hard knocks for his conduct towards Wm. O'Brien; and you will remember, Alderman, that in the course of my former imprisonment I had to complain to you of his cruel treatment. While suffering a bad attack he left me on a plank bed and on prison diet, with nothing to drink but water during the night. For a fortnight before my present imprisonment I was under constant medical treatment and supervision, and as evidence of the severity of the attack, had to have a fire night and day in my room.' 'I may tell you,' remarked Mr. O'Mahony, 'that a few days before my illness, in presence of Mr. John Kelly, National League organiser, I weighed 12st., and when brought in here I only weighed 11st. 3lb. All this I told the prison doctor, but notwithstanding he put me into an ordinary cell and placed me on ordinary prison diet, the result being increased prostration and complete loss of appetite, so much so that for over four days I have not tasted an ounce of solid food. I cannot pace my cell twice without staggering against the wall; I cannot kneel with a pain in my back, nor can I remain in any one position at night with the pains in my whole body. The doctor having been apprised of this, merely said it was owing to the hardness of my bed."

We want to know why this gentleman was treated in this way after the right hon. Gentleman had yielded to the force of public opinion, and had altered his method of treating political prisoners, particularly in the matter of allowing them to wear their own clothes. Was Mr. O'Mahony treated in this way simply because he was the representative of a local journal? The rule as to cleanliness was originally adopted as a boon to prisoners, but can it be said that its application to a gentleman like Mr. O'Mahony was anything in the nature of a boon? I have several other cases here which I could deal with, but I do not think it necessary to do so. They will probably be referred to by other hon. Members; but I will refer the Committee to the most recent instance that has come under my observation of the arbitrary and illegal manner in which the Prison Authorities act towards those under their control. A short time ago, a Mr. James O'Brien was confined in Cork Gaol charged with having shadowed a constable. He was arrested by the constable he was said to have shadowed, and handed over to another constable. A Resident Magistrate was telegraphed for, Mr. O'Brien was ordered to give bail and refused, and he was then handed over to the police like a bale of goods invoiced. He was taken up in this way, not summoned; but at the worst he was an untried prisoner. Regardless of that fact, however, he was taken to Cork Gaol and asked to wear the prison uniform. He protested against the indignity, but he was forcibly stripped, the prison clothes were forced on him, and he had to remain in them four or five days, until he was tried. When he was tried, the Magistrate thought the time he had served in gaol was sufficient, and he was discharged. In the meantime, however, the Governor of the gaol had acted illegally, having broken through the Prison Rules. I suppose the right hon. Gentleman will say that the remedy of a civil action is open to Mr. O'Brien if the Governor did wrong; but I would ask whether such an answer as that will show a proper conception of their duty on the part of the Executive? When the law has been broken by a Government official, is it a right thing to expect the victim of the illegality to vindicate his conduct by a civil action? Surely it is the duty of the Government to make amends for the wrongdoing of their servant and to give compensation. Another case I wish to bring before the Committee is that of Mr. Redmond, editor of the Waterford News, heard a few weeks ago in the City of Waterford. Mr. Redmond was charged with a Press offence, and for the reason that he had some other case to attend to was advised by his friends to give bail as required. The Mayor of the city went to a Resident Magistrate, Mr. Rodkin, and asked him to go to the gaol to perfect the bail bonds, but this Magistrate actually advised the Mayor that the prisoner could not be bailed out unless before two Resident Magistrates. The result was that Mr. Redmond was illegally detained in prison instead of being released on bail. This Magistrate was ignorant of the most elementary principles of his business, and I want to know what the Government intend to do to mark their sense of his conduct?

Mr. Flynn

(5.19.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): As there is a general disposition to finish the Irish Votes to-night, I shall refrain from going into the broad question of the treatment of political prisoners in Ireland, which I still maintain is contrary to the practice of civilised countries. I rise for the purpose of drawing special attention to the treatment of bail prisoners. I need hardly point out that this question has become one of great importance in consequence of a considerable number of prisoners being imprisoned under the Statute of Edward III., and also of the practice which has grown up in Ireland of sentencing prisoners to a term of imprisonment, and in addition ordering them to give bail for good behaviour for a certain time. I believe, although that is lawful according to the law of England, it is very rarely adopted in England, and many Judges think it an extremely unfair course to take with regard to prisoners. I have been told by many Judges that they have never sentenced men in this way, and that they do not consider it right to do so. My attention was specially drawn to the question which I wish to bring before the House in consequence of my own experience in visiting one of the Irish gaols. In the course of last autumn I paid a visit to Galway, and visited my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Cork (Mr. W. O'Brien), who was then confined in Galway Gaol. I had heard that such visits were only permitted in presence of a prison warder; and in order to avoid the indignity of having to converse with the hon. Member in the presence of a warder, I wrote to the Prisons Board in Ireland and pointed out to them that, under the 13th section of the Prisons (Ireland) Act, a prisoner confined in default of bail was entitled, equally with a first-class misdemeanant, to see his friends without the presence of a prison warder. The Prisons Board replied that the matter was not within their discretion, and that it would be dealt with by the Visiting Justices of the gaol. I then went to Galway, where I found the hon. Member for Galway, Connemara (Mr. Foley). I went with him to the gaol, and we claimed as a right that we should be permitted to see the hon. Member for North-East Cork without the presence of a prison warder. We were informed that the Prison Justices had met that morning, and that as a matter of special favour to myself they had decided that I should be permitted to see the hon. Member without the presence of a warder. No such permission was given to the hon. Member for Galway, Connemara, and the result was that I alone was permitted to see him. Upon this I communicated with the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland; told him what had occurred; and claimed, as a matter of right, that prisoners on bail were entitled to receive visitors without the presence of a warder. Apart from the question of law, I also contended as a matter of policy that the Prisons Board ought, if necessary, to adopt a rule to that effect. I showed that prisoners on bail and first-class misdemeanants in England were allowed to receive their friends without the presence of a warder. I referred to the cases of Mr. Stead, of Mr. Yates, and of Colonel Valentine Baker, who, while in prison as first-class misdemeanants, were allowed to see their friends without the presence of a warder. In the case of the hon. Member for Belfast, who was imprisoned as a first-class misdemeanant some years ago, Lord Mayo, who was the then Chief Secretary, gave directions that he should be allowed to see his friends without the presence of a warder. On the legal point allow me to call attention to the 13th section of the Irish Prisons Act. The section directs, in reference to prisoners who are unconvicted—and I believe a bail prisoner comes within that category—that the Prisons Board shall make rules on certain subjects, and one of these subjects is having regard to the necessity of preventing any attempt at escape, and so on. I have ascertained that no rules have been made by the Prisons Board under this section—at all events, none inconsistent with the sub-section—and I contend that, as a matter both of law and policy, in the absence of any rule, the prisoners detained on bail in Ireland as first class misdemeanants ought to be allowed to see their friends without the presence of a warder. I understand that at the present time in Ireland prisoners on bail are not allowed to receive their friends without the presence of the warder—and that even husbands are not allowed to see their wives without such presence. That is an outrage, and it ought not to be allowed to exist. Why should there be this distinction between these prisoners in Ireland and first-class misdemeanants in England? In England imprisoned editors of newspapers are always allowed to edit their papers from the prison. That was so in the cases of Mr. Stead and Mr. Yates. But when the hon. Gentleman (Mr. T. D. Sullivan) was imprisoned, he was denied that privilege, and indeed he was not allowed to see his paper. I say that in all points of detail the Irish Prisons Board carry out the rules with a degree of severity unknown in England. I therefore raise this question as one of law and practice, and I urge it upon the attention of the Chief Secretary. I wrote the Chief Secretary at some length on the matter, but I have not been favoured with a reply, and I think I have a right to complain of some little want of courtesy. It was a matter affecting not myself, but a considerable number of prisoners, and I think I was justified in calling the attention of the Prisons Board and the Chief Secretary to it. I am not quite certain whether I wrote to the Chief Secretary or to the Prisons Board, but it was to one or the other, and I received no reply, and from then until now I have not heard a word. Therefore, I felt it my duty to raise this question in order that the matter might be cleared up, and in order that the treatment of prisoners in Ireland might be brought into harmony with the treatment of prisoners in England.

(5.40.) MR. W. O'BRIEN (Cork Co., N.E.): Some of the details of prison administration have been dwelt upon, but I wish we could find an opportunity to discuss the general question of prison treatment. But this we know, that whatever the right hon. Gentleman's policy was in the beginning, whether good or bad, it has utterly collapsed. He has run away from it. At the present moment the Prison Rules in Ireland are a perfect mass of inconsistencies and chaos. I will not discuss now all that the right hon. Gentleman said in his famous interview with Mr. Blunt. That interview has not been forgotten. I do not think it has ever been explained. People will retain their own opinions about it. At all events, I do not think the right hon. Gentleman has ever denied, or that he will deny, that his original policy was to degrade us into criminals and to make ourselves and others feel that we were criminals. I ask the most infatuated admirer of the right hon. Gentleman whether he has succeeded in persuading a single human being that any criminality attaches to us. If we are criminals, why are we in the House of Commons? The right hon. Gentleman has tried hard to treat us just as he would treat thieves and burglars. Are thieves and burglars allowed to sit in this House? Are the Sessions Courts adjourned in Ireland to enable thieves and burglars to attend the British Legislature? I venture to say that the right hon. Gentleman in that, as in every portion of his policy, has absolutely broken down. We are here, and I ask him by what right does he dare to affect to treat us as criminals? The right hon. Gentleman has not the courage of his convictions. He has withdrawn his Prison Rules, altered them, and cancelled them, without the smallest bit of grace on his part. His rules are torn to tatters by his own hand, yet we have not got him to thank. He did his worst, so long as he thought the English people would stand it, and until the Magistrates found that they had power to visit the gaols. He has savagely attacked Dr. Moorhead, who was the first to discover this right of the Justices to visit the gaols. Had that discovery not been made, I believe the right hon. Gentleman would have continued his policy to this hour. He once described my objection and that of others to wearing prison garments as a monomania. I am sorry that John Mandeville, who suffered from the same monomania, is lying in his grave to-day. Notwithstanding the sarcastic speech of the right hon. Gentleman he changed his opinion. The monomania was catching. The right hon. Gentleman has a real monomania on this prison question, because he is the only human being who for one moment affects to believe that the change of clothing was necessary for the purpose of personal cleanliness or for sanitary considerations. But I do not think that anyone believes that it was considerations of hygiene that caused the right hon. Gentleman to give up night attacks and sentences of bread and water in winter. I venture to say that the right hon. Gentleman has been driven to a most ignominious surrender on that subject. The right hon. Gentleman has again and again been the medium of the false charge that we desired to be treated differently to our humbler comrades. He knows in his heart that is not so. On the contrary, we claimed to be treated just as the humblest of our comrades. We wanted a classification of offences, not of persons. But the right hon. Gentleman would not give us that. He was coerced to change his plans. What did he do? He set up a most offensive distinction between the well-dressed and the ill-dressed prisoners. He set up the distinction of the cut of the coat and the length of the purse, with the result that the Belfast swindlers and criminals of the very worst stamp were, because they happened to be well dressed, treated with a consideration that was not extended to the poor peasants guilty of political offences, and who were dealt with as common thieves and burglars. On that subject the right hon. Gentleman has been driven to a most shameless and miserable policy. I am not speaking of his theory of degrading or ill-treating us. I am only speaking of his inconsistency from the beginning—of the meanness, cowardliness, and utter collapse of this attempt to put thousands of respected and respectable men in Ireland to the level of footpads. Upon every point on which the right hon. Gentleman has been tackled he has been beaten. Take the question of exercise, for instance. He began by trying to breakdown the resistance of the prisoners by depriving them of exercise altogether. My friend, Mr. Hooper, formerly a Member of this House, was kept 28 days without exercise, because he refused to exercise with criminals. My hon. Friend the Member for Mid Cork was confined to his cell because he refused to exercise with thieves and scoundrels. What has been the result? The right hon. Gentleman, and not the prisoners, has surrendered. John Kelly was punished again and again, by being put on bread and water in Derry Prison, for refusing to exercise with criminals. Two weeks after he was allowed to exercise by himself. I will now call attention to another point which is of great importance. I refer to the question of prison labour. It was on the question of the reform of prison tasks that poor John Mandeville received the punishment which killed him. Another man was sentenced again and again to bread and water and confinement to his cell for refusing to clean the cell out, and that unfortunate man is in his bed to-day. Then my hon. Friend the Member for South Galway refused, when in prison, to perform these tasks, and when it began to be known in England that this was the commencement of another struggle, and that the matter would be fought out to the bitter end, the Prisons Board discovered that there was a legal power under which John Mandeville and the rest would have been entitled to exemption from these prison tasks on payment of one penny a day. It was therefore they and not he who had acted illegally in inflicting this sort of punishment, and the result was that having found this excuse for giving up the struggle against these men they also gave up the penny a day. In point of fact, they have been beaten in every portion of their programme from the original position they took up. This is the reason why they would not allow Lord Aberdare's Committee to inquire into these cases, so "cribbed, cabined, and confined" were they. These things are not the fault of the prison officials in Ireland, and I must say that according to my own experience those officials are thoroughly ashamed of their work. The vast majority of them would be only too glad to have the chance of being humane and of recognising openly those distinctions which every one is forced to recognise at least a hundred times a day. As for the Prisons Board, they are practically driven to their wits' end in carrying out the policy of the right hon. Gentleman. If they were told definitely and distinctly that they must enforce the Prison Rules uniformly and consistently, or if they were instructed to give up the impossible task of forcing political prisoners to believe that they were criminals, and to treat them as human beings, they would understand what they have to do. But the right hon. Gentleman has not the candour to admit that his policy of treating us as brutes has utterly collapsed. He has not—I will not say the courage—but the impudence to carry that policy to its legitimate conclusion. If we could have Lord Aberdare's Committee or any other Committee appointed, with full powers to thrash out the whole subject, it would probably be found that this vacillating and brutal system of prison treatment is about as disgraceful a procedure as was ever countenanced by a civilised Government. I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman will agree to refer this matter to a Committee. I am afraid he will not. I am afraid he does not want the English public to know what is the character of the firm and resolute Government before which the Irish people are expected to fall down and worship—a Government which chops and changes with every breath of public opinion as expressed in the bye-elections—a Government whose whole policy, I am sorry to say, is summed up in these words, "Be just as savage as you dare, but do not injure the Government." That is a fair summary of the policy of the Government in Ireland, and this being so, the right hon. Gentleman does not want the English public to understand the infamous way in which he has treated thousands—at least 4,000—of the most respected citizens of Ireland. I do not wish to say anything harsh of the humiliating change of front to which the right hon. Gentleman has been driven in reference to this question. I should not say one word on this subject if I thought it was his conscience that had pricked him, but I must say that he has adopted a policy which he has not had the imprudence to carry to its legitimate conclusion, while he has not the honesty to admit that he is unable to carry out that policy in the case of Members of Parliament as long as English public opinion is with us, although he thinks he may carry it out in the case of newspaper men like M'Enery and Jasper Tully, who are, at the present moment, picking oakum because they have published reports of branch meetings of the League which I in my paper continue to publish, and which most of the other Nationalist papers are in the regular habit of reporting. I say to the right hon. Gentleman let us have a consistent policy; either carry out your rules and kill us if you have the courage to do so, and are backed by English opinion, or enunciate some other policy that is intelligible and consistent. As it is, you have imprisoned something like 4,000 of the best men in Ireland, not half a dozen of whom are criminals or men with whom any Member of this House would be ashamed to shake hands. I call upon the Chief Secretary either to have the courage to carry out logically and consistently the thoroughgoing execution of these brutal Prison Rules, or else to have the candour to admit that they are utterly untenable and a disgrace to his administration.

(5.57.) THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I am unwilling to disturb the relative solitude of the Benches by any speech couched in the controversial tone which the hon. Gentleman has thought fit to adopt on this congenial topic. ["Oh!"] It is a congenial topic, because it is one on which the hon. Gentleman has favoured the Committee year after year. I will proceed, however, to deal as shortly as I can with the various observations made by the hon. Gentlemen who have taken part in this Debate. With reference to the case of Morrissey, who is in prison for contempt of Court, my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland will at once make himself acquainted with the facts, with a view to considering whether there is a fair case for release or not. As to the case of Mr. M'Enery, the right of the Prisons Board to remove prisoners from the locality in which the offence is committed is one that has been constantly exercised without comment in this House. It must be evident that occasionally, as where the prisoner is a person who might, either through his own action or that of his friends, give rise to excitement or agitation in the town in which he lived, it might be convenient in the public interest to remove the prisoner to some other locality. Tullamore, the prison to which Mr. M'Enery was removed, is a healthy prison, and extremely well suited for the purposes of a prison, and I do not think Mr. M'Enery has any right or reason to complain. The hon.

Mr. W. O'Brien

Member for North Cork raised a number of cases in which he informed the Committee that the Prison Rules with regard to dress had been violated in the case of certain prisoners recently confined. In regard to Mr. James O'Brien, I have no information. I do not think any question has been asked in the House with regard to the treatment of Mr. James O'Brien.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Yes, distinctly.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The question was not addressed to me, or I should doubtless have been aware of it. It does appear to have been the opinion of the Prisons Board that this gentleman was not sufficiently supplied with clothing. With regard to the case of Mr. O'Mahoney, I think the hon. Member for North Cork is mistaken. I find a question was asked in the House on March 14 by the hon. Member for Tipperary. The question in this instance related not to prison dress, but to exercise. In the course of the answer by my right hon. Friend the Attorney General it appeared that the prisoner was exercised alone, inasmuch as he elected to wear his own clothes. I, therefore, think it must be under some misapprehension that the hon. Member has raised the question of Mr. O'Mahoney in this connection. Then the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford gave the Committee a narrative of his experiences connected with his visit to the hon. Member for North-East Cork in Galway Gaol. He told the Committee that he had written a letter either to me or to the Prisons Board giving his views on the legal aspect of the question. I have no recollection of having received any such letter; and if it was addressed to the Prisons Board, I am extremely surprised that the right hon. Gentleman should have received no answer, because, whether the Prisons Board thought it right or not to enter into a controversy with the right hon. Gentleman on the subject, I feel sure they would have sent an official acknowledgment of the receipt of the letter if it was received. I think the letter must have miscarried, but I will make inquiry, and find out why attention was not paid to the communication of the right hon. Gentleman. As regards the main argument of the right hon. Gentleman, it appears that in Ireland the Visiting Justices have a discretion in the matter. They can permit these communications between prisoners and their friends to go on in the presence of a warder or not. The Justices seem to have decided that in this particular case the interview should take place without the presence of a warder. As a general rule, interviews take place in the presence of a warder; but when the right gentleman visited Galway Gaol, the Visiting Justices appear to have paid the right hon. Gentleman the personal compliment of allowing the interview without the presence of a warder. I do not criticise the action of the Visiting Justices; they are not under my control, and, if they thought that a proper compliment to pay to the right hon. Gentleman, I have nothing to say either for or against their action.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I did not claim it on my own behalf, and as a matter between the hon. Member and myself, but as a matter of rule under the law, that the hon. Member was entitled to see a visitor without the presence of a warder.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think the right hon. Gentleman is hardly correct in his interpretation of the law; but if that is so, his view can be legally enforced. No change has been made by the Prisons Board in this connection, and I presume they have founded their invariable procedure on an interpretation of the Prisons Act which they have taken pains to verify. The hon. Gentleman who last sat down went into very ancient history. He went back to the conversation between myself and Mr. Wilfrid Blunt, when staying together in a country house, and of which an extraordinary, garbled, and inaccurate version was given to the public and categorically contradicted by me at the time.

MR. W. O'BRIEN: Will the right hon. Gentleman now give us his version of what he said?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No; I can hardly be expected at this distance of time to recollect exactly what was said, but I can very well recollect that I never said anything of the kind that Mr. Blunt attributed to me. The purport of what Mr. Blunt said was that I expressed a desire to exterminate my political opponents by subjecting them to hardships in Irish prisons. The hon. Gentleman the Member for North-East

Cork himself has been four times an inmate of Irish prisons, and I can point to him as a living testimony to the excellence of the fare received on those occasions.

MR. W. O'BRIEN: Thanks to the English people, not to you.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Gentleman waxed very angry with me over the intention he attributed to me of compelling him to admit himself to be a criminal. I had never any such intention. I have my own views of the actions of the hon. Gentleman, and I have supported those views on certain occasions, but I have never desired that he should be compelled, directly or indirectly, to express any views on the subject. That is entirely a matter for the hon. Gentleman himself. He has a right to his own opinion, and I have an equal right to mine. The hon. Gentleman asks why, if he is a criminal, he is a Member of this House? There are regulations laid down which describe the offences which prevent gentlemen from being Members of the House, and the hon. Gentleman has not committed one of these offences, and, therefore, we shall have the advantage of his presence among us. The hon. Member for Lanark (Mr. Cunningham-Graham) also came into conflict with the laws of his country, not in Ireland, but in England; and in accordance with ordinary procedure, he was brought before a Magistrate and sent to prison, where he was subjected to the severer treatment meted out to prisoners in English prisons, though there is the difference in the case of the hon. Member for Lanark, that he has never made any complaint of the treatment to which, by his own action, he subjected himself. When he had completed his sentence he returned to this House, for he, like the hon. Member for North-East Cork, had not committed any offence against the law for which the Rules of this House prescribe that a person committing such offence shall be disqualified from sitting here, so he remains with us unto this day. In either case the treatment is the same. The question the hon. Gentleman asked about himself might, with equal justice, be asked about the hon. Member for Lanarkshire. Then the hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. O'Brien) went on to develop, at great length, a theme he is very fond of. He is always anxious to prove to the country that the Government are, as he describes it, beaten to their knees, and the particular illustration of that position he has provided relates to the action taken by myself in regard to prison clothes. The hon. Gentleman objected to my describing his opinion on the wearing of prison clothes as a monomania. Well, I think it is. If it should be my lot, which I trust it may never be, to come into conflict with the law and become an inmate of a prison, I should not object to conform to the regulations that govern prisoners, the use of prison clothes among them. But the hon. Gentleman takes a different view. I do not understand why it is he thinks a tremendous victory has been gained over the Government. I am sure I am not concerned to discuss in this connection who has won and who has lost, but, merely as a matter of curiosity, I may ask why it is he claims to have gained a great victory? The hon. Gentleman says that he wanted no distinction made between his lot and the lot of other prisoners, except a distinction founded upon the classification of offences; that he only wanted some distinction by which it should be publicly admitted that he in breaking the law had done something entirely different to other offenders against the law, other criminals who break the law. If the hon. Gentleman—

MR. W. O'BRIEN: How honourable, and yet a criminal?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If that is what the hon. Gentleman says, it is a thing he has not got, because he admits he makes it matter of complaint that we still decline to draw a line between offences he ordinarily and inaccurately describes as political and other offences against the laws of the country. The hon. Gentleman was very angry with me because it has been laid down in the new prison rules that the wearing of prison dress is not to depend in any way upon the class of offence committed. We did decline to make that distinction, and we still decline, and therefore it appears that we have retained the only position we desired to retain, and the hon. Gentleman has failed to obtain the only thing he wished to obtain. Under the circumstances, I think the triumph he claims is deprived of any value, and he must seek some field other than that of prison discipline to gratify his ambition. The broad statistics of the health of the prisoners in Ireland conclusively prove that the condition of Irish prisons is good. The health of prisoners leaves nothing to be desired. The only distinction that has occurred between those whom the hon. Gentleman erroneously describes as political offenders and others is not founded on any action of mine, but is founded on the action of the prison doctors. I believe that a very much larger proportion of those gentlemen have had the advantage of hospital treatment than has been accorded to any other class of prisoners; but whether they have had ordinary prison treatment or hospital treatment I think the record of the health of prisoners is a satisfactory proof of the good condition of Irish prisons.

(6.15.) MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): The right hon. Gentleman has again adopted that sneering manner to which we are well accustomed. I have not the slightest objection. I have myself been the object of such sneers for a good many years, and am not in the least degree the worse for them, and, so far as I can gather, the demeanour of the right hon. Gentleman, his sneers and smiling insults have assisted our cause very much among the English constituencies. Except, therefore, as a matter of personal good taste I do not care how long he continues this demeanour. But is it not a most unworthy tone for a Minister to adopt? He has said nothing in the speech to which we have just listened, or in any of his various speeches on this subject, nothing at all, in answer to the broad charge, the undoubtedly true charge, that a method of petty persecution as regards prison treatment has been adopted against his political opponents in Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman, I believe, did at the time deny the statement attributed to him by Mr. Wilfrid Blunt, and I am not concerned with whether the alleged statements of what took place in the conversation are true or not; but what seems to me to be beyond all controversy, no matter what may have been said on that occasion, is that in the beginning the right hon. Gentleman started on his policy in Ireland with the deliberate intention of degrading, insulting, and inflicting cruel suffering upon his political opponents in Ireland—a mean, shabby, cowardly policy. When the right hon. Gentleman stands at that Table and tells us, with a smile, that we look all the better for our prison treatment—well I question the good taste of his observations. For myself, and others of my comrades in the Irish cause, I say it is false to say that we have made complaints, here or elsewhere, of our prison treatment. The right hon. Gentleman knows that we have never complained. It is true that public comment arose on the details of prison treatment, but it is not true, it is false, to say that we made any complaint of our treatment in Irish prisons. It is not courteous, it is not decent, for the right hon. Gentleman to stand up in this House and refer, as he has, to our prison treatment. The right hon. Gentleman says he hopes he never may have experience of prison life, and I do not suppose he ever will have such experience, for he has always taken care to stand by a Party who are never likely to get into prison. [Cheers.] Yes, but I know this, that all the good causes that were ever fought for and have triumphed in this world were not won by the people who were afraid to go to prison. I am not ashamed, and never shall be ashamed, to remember that I have stood among men who have gone to prison for our cause and may do so again. It is not unnatural that the right hon. Gentleman should sneer at and treat with contempt the squalid details, as he describes them, of prison treatment, but we who have been submitted to these details of prison treatment, some of us four or five times, having regard to the future, naturally take an interest in these details, although they are squalid. I admit they are squalid. I have worn prison linen, and I venture to say it is not spotless, it is not pleasant to wear or to look at. The right hon. Gentleman should look at the clothing before he is qualified to say he would be willing to wear it. I should like to see the right hon. Gentleman walking round a ring in prison uniform. He is a man greatly admired by his friends for his personal appearance. I am reminded of an observation from an old Irishwoman I once overheard. She was looking at a lady whom nature had not endowed with beauty, but who was exquisitely dressed, and she said, "Glory be to God, how much dress will do for a woman." I have thought of this remark as I have seen the right hon. Gentleman walking up the floor of the House. I think his dress does a great deal for him. I congratulate him upon his tailor, and should like to know his address. Ah, but if the right hon. Gentleman's admirers saw him walking round a prisoners' ring in the garb we have worn, I do not think they would consider him such a handsome man as now they do. All this is very laughable as we speak of these things in this House, but they were not so when they were inflicted upon us, and I do not think there is any hon. Gentleman opposite, who thinks it manly to sneer at us, who would not suffer under a sense of cruel wrong if subjected to the treatment we endured. The right hon. Gentleman says he would not object to wear the prison dress. Did he ever see it? Did he ever go into a prison and see the details of prison life? I do not suppose he ever did, or has the least idea of what they are. I recollect that the Dublin Evening Express, the organ of the Irish Conservative Party, rejoicing over the passing of the Coercion Act, said in a leading article—

"At last we shall have an opportunity of seeing the leaders of the National Party dressed in the livery of crime."

Yes, it is an outrage, a cruel outrage. I do not know whether hon. Gentlemen appreciate that the outrage is not connected with the material discomforts of imprisonment, not confined to the outrage connected with what is vulgarly called "grub." Men are anxious to make pairs and leave this House in the evening, because the dinners provided are not sufficiently good for them, and they drive to the "Reform" or the "Carlton." They would, no doubt, suffer from prison food; but let me tell hon. Members, possibly they may not be aware of the fact, that there are people in Ireland who can suffer keenly, with a suffering not of a material kind, men, too, of a humble position in life, with a cruel, bitter sense of wrong, of terrible injury they can never forget, at being compelled to wear the "livery of crime." There is not to-day a man of enlightenment and intelligence in the length and breadth of the Continent of Europe, or in America, who does not regard the whole of this prison treatment to which we have been subjected as an outrage upon civilisation, and an infamy to the Government who inflicted it. I agree to the fullest extent with my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Cork in the view he has laid before the Committee. I say that the conduct of the right hon. Gentleman, for he accepts full responsibility in regard to prison treatment, has been mean and contemptible in the highest degree. He has not pursued, he has not had the courage to pursue, a consistent policy in this. He started by declaring that, come what would, he would make no difference between priest and layman, Member of Parliament or peasant, and inch by inch, as the tide of public opinion rose, and as he saw the use that was made of this prison treatment at the expense of his Party at English bye-elections, inch by inch he gave way. He has removed many of the objectionable features in connection particularly—and this is the meanness of the policy—particularly in connection with the imprisonment of men who can come over to England and address an English audience. The poor peasant is treated like a pickpocket, but for a precisely similar offence the right hon. Gentleman is afraid so to treat the man who can afterwards speak to an English meeting. Is that not base, mean, and contemptible, and not only base and contemptible, but directly contrary to the action to which he pledged himself, in the face of this House and of England, when he entered upon his cruel and most indefensible policy? I will say no more upon the general ground, the "squalid details" of our prison treatment. I have been tried two or three times, and I have suffered imprisonment on a charge of criminal conspiracy. Nothing is more certain than that if it were possible to convict me in England—that is impossible, but supposing it were possible, for the sake of argument, to convict me upon the same evidence as that upon which I was convicted in Ireland of the offence of criminal conspiracy, then I should be ordered to be treated as a first class misdemeanant. I speak not for myself, but for another man, who had not the faintest intention of crime. Does anyone maintain that in England a man convicted for criminal conspiracy, the object being no crime, and only a crime as being in the nature of conspiracy under the Common Law, does anyone say that in England the Judge would not order him to be treated as a first-class misdemeanant? At the present moment Mr. John Kelly is serving a sentence of imprisonment with hard labour at Clonmel. He has refused to do any hard labour, as I am informed, or to conform to the rules which he considers humiliating for the treatment of a hard labour prisoner. Now, I want to know is the right hon. Gentleman going to inflict savage and brutal treatment in order to compel Mr. John Kelly to do labour that he would never be asked to do in this country? I warn him that if he does he will hear a great deal more of this case. I must say that it seems to me this is a gross example of the cruel policy of the right hon. Gentleman. Having said so much with regard to this particular case, and as I suppose I should not be in order in enlarging upon it at any length, and as we may be obliged before long to bring it in another way before the House, I will conclude repeating what I have more than once said: We Irish Members and Members of the Nationalist Party have not complained of our prison treatment, but on general principles we do protest against the Queen's subjects, and still more the people of Ireland, being subjected to humiliating, insulting, treatment, which, in the opinion of all intelligent civilised people in the world, should be reserved for those guilty of disgraceful crimes.

(6.30.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not want to prolong the discussion, but as the hon. Member has taken exception to the tone of my speech, I merely wish to say that I endeavoured studiously to remain within the bounds of moderation, although, as it will be remembered in the speech to which I was replying, I was described as base, contemptible, cowardly, and a would-be murderer. [Mr. W. O'BRIEN: That is absolutely false.] In these circumstances I think that I have been remarkably moderate.

(6.31.) MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): Considering that the right hon. Gentleman never at any time contradicted the letter of Mr. Wilfrid Blunt, I am not at all surprised to learn that his conduct towards prisoners in Ireland has been described in the terms he has just quoted. He has said in his speech he believed we were monomaniacs for having objected to the treatment to which we were subjected, and that he himself, if he were a prisoner, would not object to the treatment of an ordinary common criminal, that he would follow the example of the hon. Member for Lanarkshire (Mr. C. Graham), and willingly allow himself to be subjected to this indignity. But there is no comparison between the offences the Irish Members were charged with and the alleged offence of the hon. Member for Lanarkshire. The hon. Gentleman was punished for violence. I introduced a Bill in this House last year for the purpose of dealing with offences under the Crimes Act, and I specially exempted all cases of violence. I claimed for the men imprisoned under that Act the treatment of political offenders, but I exempted from such treatment all those who were found guilty of acts of violence. During the course of the discussion which took place on my Bill, the right hon. Gentleman stated that, owing to the treatment of the political prisoners in Ireland, we were able to make an impression on the people of Great Britain. He admitted that at the time, and he declared his intention of issuing a Commission for the purpose of inquiring into the treatment of prisoners not only in Ireland but in Great Britain. I stated at the time that that was a make-shift to cover his retreat from the position he had assumed with regard to Irish prisoners, and I was fully borne out in my prediction that before the Commission reported to the Government the right hon. Gentleman, as head of the Prisons Board in Ireland, introduced bye-laws and rules which altered the whole position of the Irish prisoners. All I asked by my Bill was that prisoners under the Coercion Act should not be required to wear the prison dress—the livery of crime—that they should not be subjected to hair-shaving, to clipping and shaving of beards, to bearing company with criminals in the course of their exercise, and that they should not be required to perform menial offices. Every one of those demands has been granted. From that day no man imprisoned under the Crimes Act has been asked to wear the prison dress, or to have his beard shaved, or his hair clipped; no man has been asked to perform menial offices, or to bear company with criminals. My complaint to-day is that while he has made concessions to us on these points in deference to the public opinion of England, he has endeavoured, by his Prisons Board and his Prison Inspectors, to rob us of the benefit of the concessions. Last year we were not required to bear company with criminals, but the right hon. Gentleman managed by his Visiting Justices to reduce us to the position of the lowest criminals in the prison. When I, the hon. Member for Mid Cork, one of my Colleagues in the representation of Tipperary, and another gentleman were imprisoned in Clonmel Gaol, we were allowed to exercise in each other's company. We had to conform to the rules of the prison by marching at intervals of some five or six feet. This, of course, we did, but we had the pleasure and the comfort of taking exercise with one another for two hours per day. The remaining 22 hours we spent in cells 12 feet by six in measurement. But we were removed from Clonmel Prison to the central Bastille at Tullamore. The right hon. Gentleman says that prisoners were sent to Tullamore so that they might be removed from districts where their presence, even within prison walls, was calculated to create excitement. No; the object of sending prisoners to the central Bastille was to punish them by a straining of the prison law. How is the law strained? After our first day's imprisonment in Tullamore the privilege of taking our exercise in each other's company was denied to us. We were brought out at different hours of the day. We were thrown into a large enclosure through an iron gate, like wild beasts. The doors round about the enclosure were closely barred, and there, like wild beasts in a menagerie, we were allowed to pace round without a single soul near us. We were reduced to the position of the lowest criminals in the prison, and I have it on the authority of more than one Governor of a prison in Ireland that when refractory prisoners are to be punished and brought to discipline they are put upon the solitary system. This is the greatest punishment that a criminal can be subjected to, and it is to such punishment that the right hon. Gentleman is subjecting his prisoners at the present time. It has been said in the House of Commons that men are sent to Tullamore because the system is so very perfect, and because the Governor of the prison is specially capable of carrying out the system. Let me relate what happened in my own case. By the order of the Judges of the Royal Commission we were permitted to have an Irish newspaper, which contained a report of what occurred in the Commission Court. While we were imprisoned in Clonmel Gaol we saw a newspaper. Certainly, everything else but the report was cut away, but while the report was on one side there were advertisements or, perhaps, little scraps of news on the other side. What occurred in Tullamore? What did the fertile ingenuity of the model Governor of a model Chief Secretary of a model Prisons Board do? In order to deprive us of the pleasure of reading the advertisements in the Freeman's Journal he got a piece of brown paper, carefully gummed it, and plastered it all over the back of the newspaper to prevent us reading anything but the Report of the Commission. The Russians have a very perfect system of stamping out, but Captain Featherstonhaugh had no such system, and he was obliged to resort to brown paper and gum. I mention this circumstance to show that this model Governor strained every rule of law he possibly could in order to make the position of the prisoners more irksome and cruel than it otherwise would be, and I maintain it is because it is such a prison, and Captain Featherstonhaugh is such a Governor, that the Chief Secretary has selected Tullamore as the place for the punishment of his political opponents. It may be interesting to the Committee to know what I did when I found the advertisements obliterated. I steeped the paper very carefully in my basin of water, and freed the report from the brown paper. I showed the paper to the doctor, and told him I despised such petty tyranny as the Governor had displayed in trying to obliterate all but the Report. From that day I was permitted to read the advertisements. Let me mention the case of Mr. O'Brien, who was in the Cork prison a short time ago. When Mr. O'Brien went to the Cork prison, the Chief Governor must have been away. I should be sorry to believe that Colonel Roberts was capable of such petty tyranny as was practised in the case of Mr. O'Brien. I have been in the charge of Colonel Roberts under all circumstances of imprisonment. I have been under him as a first-class misdemeanant, as a man waiting trial, as a convict, and as an accessory, and I have experienced nothing but the most kindly treatment from Colonel Roberts. But when I was under the charge of Colonel Roberts, it was under the humane administration of the Liberal Government, and I may say I can almost tell by the way in which a gaoler turns the key in the lock who is in Office. By the way in which your gaoler looks at you, by the way in which he hands you your food—if you can call it food—you know what is the spirit that prevails in Dublin Castle. It is said that O'Brien's underclothing was taken from him because it was not perfectly bleached. What an absurd reason to give in the case of a man who is in such a position that he can offer the Magistrates £1,000 down as bail. It is too absurd to say that the linen of such a man will not bear the inspection of a common gaoler. Mr. O'Brien would not have been persecuted as he was if the right hon. Gentleman's gaolers and police did not know that they can with impunity inflict these petty punishments on the right hon. Gentleman's victims, because he is certain to defend them in this House, no matter how atrocious their conduct has been. That is the true meaning of the manner in which law is administered, both in prison and out of prison, in Ireland. The Prison Governors, the gaolers, and the warders of Ireland fast become inoculated and permeated with that spirit of bitter hostility which the right hon. Gentleman expresses in this House, and which is reflected in the proceedings of his subordinates in Ireland.

(6.53.) MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): I will do the right hon. Gentleman the credit of believing that he has not himself realised the measureless sufferings which his policy has inflicted on political opponents who are quite as honourable as himself. If I thought he did realise them I should speak of him not in terms of vituperation, but rather in terms of pity. The right hon. Gentleman has admitted that he never took the trouble of visiting a gaol or realising the régime of a gaol. I would advise him, if it be too irksome to him to visit a gaol, to read a few chapters of that celebrated book by that distinguished man Michael Davitt, Leaves from a Prison Diary. If he wants a scenic representation of sufferings such as those he has inflicted in Ireland, I would advise him to go the Lyceum, and see "The Taking of the Bastille." He will there see the emaciated forms of people from whom all hope of life has gone, and will realise the sufferings he has inflicted on his political opponents in Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman has told us what he would do if he were in prison. I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that, although we do not like his political ways and looks, if he were in prison in our hands not one of us would show him the slightest personal indignity, and we should refrain not for his sake but for our own. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) was allowed to visit the Member for North-East Cork in Galway Gaol without the intervention of a warder. The right hon. Gentleman, however, need not think much of the privilege. The same privilege was, under the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary's régime, accorded to Mr. Shannon, agent of the Times, when he was endeavouring, with the permit of the right hon. Gentleman, to trump up evidence on behalf of the Times. Now, I say that during the right hon. Gentleman's régime there has been a remarkable difference in prison treatment with reference, firstly, to the prison chaplains; secondly, to the prison doctors; and thirdly, to the warders. I will deal with the warders first. Before the right hon. Gentleman entered into Office warders were allowed very generous holidays, and could go about the town without wearing uniform. Since he has entered upon Office warders have been dismissed for refusing to wear the prison uniform in public. I take it to be the policy of the Irish Executive that warders shall be made a distinct class, who shall have no communication with the rest of the community, and who shall be kept as far as possible out of sympathy with the people. I bring this charge not so much against the right hon. Gentleman personally as against his officials. In other days the chaplains in gaols have been the friends of the prisoners. They have been allowed to have special keys to the cells, and have been allowed to visit without being accompanied by a warder. They have, in fact, been regarded by the prisoners as the only friends they have. But now, Sir, all this has been altered and scandalously so in Derry Gaol. In that gaol a number of persons from my constituency were unfortunately lodged for political offences, and will the House believe that the Governor of that gaol remonstrated with the Roman Catholic chaplain because he made more than the usual number of regulation visits. I asked the Attorney General a question on that point a few months ago, and he replied—

"The General Prisons Board report that it is the case that the Governor of Londonderry prison communicated with the Roman Catholic chaplain for calling to see a certain class of prisoners more often than others. He did so in pursuance of general instructions on the subject issued by the General Prisons Board. It is not the duty of a chaplain to see every prisoner on each occasion of visiting a prisoner. His duties are fully defined in the prison rules. When a chaplain uses the privilege of his office in paying frequent or protracted personal visits to individual prisoners of a particular class, in a manner not contemplated by the prison rules, it is, in the opinion of the Board, absolutely necessary that the Governor should interfere to prevent such an abuse of his privileges as chaplain."

Last year I brought a charge of gross personal cruelty and malignity against the Governor of this prison, and he thereupon proceeded, by depriving the prisoners of the ministrations of a chaplain, to make their condition still more miserable. On the 31st August last, the day after the prorogation of Parliament, Mr. Joyce, a Prisons' Inspector, went down to Londonderry Prison and wrote a letter of a friendly kind to the chaplain, asking him to call and see him. Father Doherty did so, and Mr. Joyce then requested him to give evidence at an inquiry by the Prisons Board. Father Doherty replied that he could not do so, and that he knew nothing about prison discipline. He was not in the gaol as a prison officer or a spy, and it would limit his usefulness with prisoners if he did any such thing as had been requested. Thereupon he was dismissed by order of the Prisons Board. At that time—the 16th September—there were no fewer than 125 Catholic prisoners in the gaol, and since then the Roman Catholic prisoners have been without the ministrations of any priest whatever. The compromise which was arrived at only adds to the scandal, for all prisoners sent to gaol for a month or longer, are now sent at vast expense to Belfast and other prisons. All prisoners for a shorter term than one month in Derry gaol, have to do without the ministrations of a priest. Father Doherty having been dismissed, the Prisons Board wrote to the Vicar Capitular of the Diocese, speaking of the matter as an urgent one, and asking his serious attention, in order that the Roman Catholic prisoners in Londonderry Prison might not be deprived of the ordinary services of their Church. I may here state that Father Doherty was asked to give evidence as to how letters written by the hon. Member for Camborne were got out of the prison. The Vicar Capitular, in the course of his reply, said—

“If you require him (Father Doherty) to depose on oath against any of the inmates of the prison, and if he complied, henceforward they would look upon their clergyman as a warder in disguise, and his influence ever after would be useless for good—a result painful to think of. Chaplains, like other professional men, should be safeguarded; they should be perfectly free to observe silence on matters that may come to their official knowledge in their intercourse with prisoners.”

The Prisons Board, in their letter, accused Father Doherty of gross insubordination to prison authority, and in regard to that the Vicar Capitular replied—

“If Father Doherty could have given any information—which I do not admit—touching the subject matter of the inquiry, he could only have obtained that information in his capacity as chaplain, and Acts of Parliament notwithstanding, the Courts of Law have heretofore recognised a clergyman's right to refuse such information for the reasons stated in my former letters. I do hope the Prisons Board will allow no consideration to weigh with them other than the good of the unfortunate prisoners in the gaol.”

The Prisons Board have, however, held out, and from that day to this no Roman Catholic chaplain has been appointed. There has been some correspondence between the right hon. Gentleman and the newly-appointed Bishop of Derry. It has been stated that the Bishop was communicated with, but in a letter, dated the 19th June, the Bishop of Derry denies having received, either directly or indirectly, any communication from the Prisons Board. He adds—

“Supposing Father Doherty had allowed himself to be sworn, then, whether he answered the questions put to him or whether he did not, it would have equally served the ends of the Government, for, from his very silence, conclusions would have been drawn more detrimental, perhaps, to the prisoners than his answers themselves. But had he consented to answer the questions, who does not see that he would have been abusing his position as Catholic chaplain in divulging what he could only have learned as chaplain? Is a medical man expected to abuse the confidence of his patient, or a lawyer to divulge the secrets of his clients?”

Now, I wish to know, are Catholic prisoners all over Ireland to be deprived of the benefits of the ministrations of a priest because he is not content to be a warder in disguise? Can a prisoner communicate with the chaplain without a fear that that official will be hauled before the Star Chamber and compelled to state all he knows? But as if to show the utter absurdity of the suggestion that the letters of the hon. Member for Camborne were conveyed out of the prison by the chaplain, they were far more numerous after Mr. Doherty's dismissal than before. I have one in my hand which was published on September 30, and in which Mr. Conybears ridicules the idea that Mr. Doherty had anything to do with getting the letters out of the gaol. He adds—

“No decent Catholic priest, I am confident, will accept any appointment as chaplain here until Father Doherty is reinstated. If such a one were found he would be a blackleg, or as we may say, a clerical land grabber, and with such a one, I for one will refuse to have anything to do. . . . They have condemned me unheard, and condemned me to the loss of my writing materials for 10 days. Fortunately I found means of being even with them, and being able to write you this letter can, as you see, snap my fingers at their paltry tyranny.”

I am not much of a correspondent, but I can assure the right hon. Gentleman there never was such close correspondence with my hon. Friend the Member for Camborne during the 20 years I have known him, as while he was an inmate of this prison. As a distinguished politician said, “The Derry Gaol Post Office was in full working order.” Whoever brought the letters out I do not know, nor am I concerned to inquire. But I do want to know what the right hon. Gentleman intends to do in connection with these Catholic chaplains. Are the only chaplains to be employed to be men whom the prisoners will regard as the ministers of an odious and atrocious tyranny? Does the right hon. Gentleman wish to make the ministration of religion in Ireland as odious and contemptible as the administration of justice? And now I will pass on to the case of the prison doctors. The most humane men of all are medical men: they love to alleviate suffering, and are not actuated by mercenary motives. But the right hon. Gentleman in his prison administration has used them not to alleviate pain, but for the purpose of torturing them, so far as is consistent, with not murdering them. They have to see not how well a prisoner can be kept, but what amount of suffering he can endure without dying in gaol. No sooner did the right hon. Gentleman accede to office, than down came an order from the Prisons Board, demanding prompt Reports immediately any indulgence, dietary or otherwise, was granted to a prisoner, and the reason for the grant. Poor Dr. Ridley again and again assured the hon. Member for North-East Cork that he would gladly do something for him, but that if he did, he would be dismissed. He asked Mr. Lane, another prisoner, to go into hospital, or otherwise he could do nothing for him. One of the most recent cases that has come under my notice has been that of Michael Cleary, who has been actually murdered—who was given up as a blood offering to the Smith-Barry brigade. These are the circumstances. On the 5th September, a boy named Heffernan was shot by the police, against whom a Coroner's jury returned a verdict of wilful murder. Of course the Government screened their friends, and prevented a prosecution. In the mêlée which attended the murder of this boy, several men were injured by the police, others were prosecuted for throwing stones, and among them was Michael Cleary, the support of an aged mother. He declared that he took no part in these disturbances, but still, he was sentenced to two months hard labour. He went into gaol on the 14th November, he left on the 11th June, and he died on the 26th February. When he went into gaol he was suffering from consumption in an advanced stage, although it was possible he might have been cured of it. Dr. Hewetson, who has been in a lunatic asylum, a fact which may account for his cruelty and want of care in this case—never looked at Cleary until the 25th November, and he then certified him as able to do hard labour. During the whole of the time Cleary was spitting blood, and as a result of his punishment, and the wretched food he had, his illness was aggravated to a fatal extent, for, as I have already stated, he died soon after his release from prison, constituting another victim of this shameful and scandalous system of prison torture. I now pass to another subject. The right hon. Gentleman, with his usual inaccuracy, jauntily declared the other day that the prisons were in a healthy state, whereas, they are in the worst possible condition. A remarkable letter by Dr. Roche, one of the heads of the profession in Dublin—contains these words:—

"The undeniable and indisputable facts which present themselves are that all the prisons were built in olden times, and after an antiquated system, and when the value of light, air, and basement drainage was not understood. There is ample testimony that pallor, tremor, loss of weight, and frequently diarrhoea supervene in many cases after admission to a large number of gaols throughout Ireland. There is no record given by the Prisons Board of the percentage of those constantly sick, but there is of those constantly mad, and this is over 7 per cent., which is 15 times as great as the general community's proportion. The prison officials have admitted that there are cells in Tullamore and Derry Gaols 9ft. by 6ft. by 10ft. high, 540 cubic feet, and without a fireplace or chimney. Mr. Blunt has written that his cell was 10ft. by 7ft. by 9ft., and without a chimney. The history of Larkin, Mandeville, and others all indicate insufficient aeration. The affections of the eyes complained of by many prisoners denote the same."

We know that Mr. Cox, the Member for Clare, and Mr. Wilfrid Blunt, complained of their eyes when they left gaol. If the right hon. Gentleman thinks it necessary to keep people in prison for anything, will he endeavour to secure that their health shall not be ruined? I ask the right hon. Gentleman, in conclusion, will he persist in making chaplains warders and gaolers in disguise, and will he use the medical officers not as protectors of health, but as instruments to enable the Government to torture prisoners without actually murdering them? I hope that he will give us some information on the points I have raised.

(7.30.) DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): Of all the Votes in Supply none deserve more thorough investigation than this Prisons Vote. The Chief Secretary in the course of his remarks just now, which I must stigmatise as "most unladylike," could make no answer to the charges against his prison administration, and the treatment of his political opponents, but his tone and manner were most exasperating. However, we are accustomed to this, and to make allowance for the right hon. Gentleman's shortcomings in temper and manners. I do not hesitate to say that Michael Cleary was foully murdered, done to death in Clonmel Gaol. What was the verdict of the Coroner's Jury which sat on the case? The Coroner was not in the least a sympathiser with Nationalist politics, so it cannot be alleged that he biased the jury. The inquiry lasted a long time, and I listened to the evidence given by Dr. Conway, and the cross-examination of Dr. Hewetson, and I never felt more distressed in my life than I did at the efforts made by that poor medical man, Dr. Hewetson, to make good his position. I do not blame that unfortunate gentleman; it is not his fault; he is a victim of the Chief Secretary's system. Everybody knows he was brought from a lunatic asylum to the gaol. But we have it in black and white that this poor young man, Cleary, was a month in Clonmel Gaol without being examined, and he was suffering from incipient phthisis, as sworn to by his medical adviser. When he became too weak to be neglected longer he was sent into hospital for three weeks. Three weeks! I should like to see the medical card for this case. It does not need to be a doctor to know that consumption cannot be cured in three weeks. The dying boy was sent back at the end of three weeks to pick oakum and lie on a plank bed! Let anybody imagine this frightful condition of things. There was no want of confirmation of the fact that he was suffering from the disease. Every day for three weeks he suffered from vomiting, and, what is more, he spat blood, and this, of course, as we know, thoroughly confirmed the diagnosis of Dr. Conway. The Chief Secretary, I am afraid, has grown callous in the course of his administration, not that at any time he had a very sympathetic turn, but I wish to call attention to this awful example of what may result from the position of these unfortunate people, shut out as it were from the light of day in gaol. The public have no means of knowing what is taking place. I recollect when I was in Clonmel Gaol last year three lads being brought in from one of the northern districts. Their cell was opposite to mine, and I heard their expostulations against being deprived of their clothes, but of course expostulation was in vain; they were stripped and their own clothes taken away. We are told that if this is done in an illegal manner then proceedings can be taken against the warders, but it is quite possible for a man to be in prison for six months and not know the name of one of his warders. I was three months in Clonmel and three months in Galway gaols, and I only happened to learn the name of two or three warders at Clonmel. If you ask for information you are punished for doing so, and so it is difficult to get any light thrown on the system in Irish prisons, which I must call abominable. I had an opportunity of comparing, of differentiating between the Irish and the English systems, because I spent three weeks in Holloway Prison, and I can testify to the striking difference in favour of the humanity of the English system. The right hon. Gentleman sneered at the remark of my hon. Friend the Member for South Tipperary that while in prison it was easy for us to tell how the great political fight was going on by the demeanour of our gaolers as they handed us our food, but that was so. I recollect quite well the hang-dog look of the Governor of the gaol, Mr. Andrews, who was appointed because he was a facile instrument for carrying out the behests of his superiors in the meanest, nastiest way; certainly he was one of the worst of the officials I met with during the time I was the guest of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary. I recollect full well when the Liberal cause was triumphing at Peterborough, Elgin, Nairn, and elsewhere, how we were better treated by the warders, and of course, if there appeared a check to Liberal progress, we suffered a little more, for you see a dog takes his tone from his master. There are three or four questions to which I should like to get answers. First, I demand a reply on the subject of bail prisoners. Last year, in debate I think on this same Vote, in connection with this subject, my own case was brought up. For my own part, I have never made any complaint of my treatment, but I shall try to obtain a reform in prison discipline. In last year's Debate, on this question of bail prisoners, the Chief Secretary was subjected to some pressure, and first he stated that bail prisoners would be quite as well if not better treated than first class misdemeanants. Inquiry being pressed, the right hon. Gentleman found out that bail prisoners were not usually allowed to see their visitors in a private room, but having made the statement that these prisoners should be treated as well as first class misdemeanants, this privilege was granted. This was the result of our agitation, and we can get nothing without that even in gaol. Many advantages I thus secured, and hope to do so again when next I go in. I was allowed a separate room, and any bail prisoner is entitled to a room if he pays for it, and there is one to be had; but in third-class gaols it is not always possible to get one. I also obtained the advantage of seeing my visitors, not in the "cage" as it is called, but in the Governor's room. Now this year, I have tried again and again, by nailing the Chief Secretary to his word, to get him to carry out his promise. I have tried to secure for other prisoners the advantage I obtained under the rules, for of course I should not have got them if I had not been able to point out the rule allowing them. I have pointed out how Mr. John Slattery, a respectable man, a bail prisoner from Cork, was obliged day after day to see his wife in the ordinary "cage." The Chief Secretary said, "Oh, he will have every advantage under the rules that can be offered." Now, that is not the answer we might expect. The right hon. Gentleman gave a pledge that bail prisoners should be as well treated as first-class misdemeanants, and I claim that he shall be as good as his word in the case of Mr. John Slattery. I saw this gentleman on each occasion when I went home to Ireland this Session, and I must say that on each occasion he looked decidedly worse than before. I also took occasion to speak to the prison doctor, a friend of mine, and an estimable gentleman, Dr. Moriarty. I do not like to praise an official, for that may be set down to his disadvantage, for our attacks upon some of them seem to lead to promotion; however, speaking to Dr. Moriarty, he agreed with me it would be a great deal better for Mr. Slattery's health if he were placed in a room with more breathing space. Persons accustomed to outdoor exercise, and confined to a small cell for a long period, suffer materially in their health, and this is certainly the case with Mr. Slattery. With special reference to this case I think we are entitled to have an understanding from the Chief Secretary that bail prisoners should have the advantages they are entitled to under the rules and in accordance with his promise. There is another matter I should like to ventilate, and that is in relation to the exercise allowed to prisoners. In our country we must expect during the year considerable rainfall, and when bad weather sets in and prevents open-air exercise prisoners suffer severely. It may be remembered that a former Member of this House, Alderman Hooper, suffered severely in health from confinement to his cell, he refusing to take exercise with criminals. Very frequently for weeks together, and notably in Galway, Sligo, and some of our western counties, we have a continuous rainfall, and then unfortunate prisoners are deprived of the daily two hours' exercise to which they are entitled. A remedy for this can easily be provided. I gather from the remarks of the Chief Secretary, and I see from the Estimates, that a certain amount of money is to be expended upon Irish prisons, and I certainly ask on grounds of common humanity that covered exercise grounds should be provided for all prisons. It could be done at very small cost. At Galway Gaol, for instance, the cost would be very slight indeed, simply the enlarging and extending of a shed that already exists. I am not going into the case of Mr. James O'Brien, for my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Cork has sufficiently dealt with that, but there is another small matter in connection with Galway Gaol which has rather a ludicrous side to it. Prisoners committed at Clifden for a week are sent to Galway because at Clifden there is only a Bridewell. The first night they sleep in the Clifden Bridewell and then the next day they are taken in a special outside car to Galway Gaol in the custody of a constable and two sub-constables; at Galway they pass three days in gaol and then they are brought away from Galway and lodged in Clifden again. So that a person fined 2s. 6d., or sentenced in default to a week's imprisonment, spends a couple of days of that time in driving round the country with an armed escort, and the sum total of the cost of every such conviction is, when all is defrayed, something like £3 10s. This sheds a little light on the way money is wasted in this Department. Then there is one small personal matter I have to mention. I do not like speaking about my own imprisonment, because if ever a Member on these Benches illustrates an argument by reference to his own experience in prison, the Chief Secretary gets up afterwards and says that Gentlemen opposite are always complaining, and never satisfied with their prison accommodation. Certainly I did feel hurt at one incident. When I was sent to Clonmel, on the third or fourth occasion, on arrival at the station I found a horrible old prison van, a ramshackle, antediluvian instrument of torture, drawn up at the station door. I am sure if any hon. Member here had an opportunity of inspecting the vehicle, he would condemn it in a most emphatic way, as I certainly did when I was required to ride in it. To my certain knowledge it had not been used for three or four months before. In this superannuated old vehicle, which was not considered good enough for the conveyance of passengers of a more distinguished criminal character, I was conveyed to my very considerable personal inconvenience. The Chief Secretary may smile at the incident, and think I am unduly fastidious, but I may mention that the warder who accompanied me inside got sick from the shaking and jolting of the machine on the way from the station to the gaol. Of course, I suppose the Chief Secretary thought my physique was equal to the trial. The vehicle had not been used before since Special Assize time, and on three previous occasions I had been taken on to the gaol without this additional torture, but this was in keeping with the policy of insult towards Irish Members inside and outside prison. There is good work to be done in connection with Irish gaols. In England you have a good gaol system, properly looked after by responsible people, but in Ireland there is a bad system controlled by a selection from the Castle Party. The sooner the system is swept away the better for people inside and outside the prisons; and it is for us who have had experience as guests of the right hon. Gentleman to let in the light "on the ways that are dark and the tricks that are vain" of the right hon. Gentleman and his subordinates.

(7.47.) MR. H. HARRISON (Tipperary, Mid): I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary what course he proposes to pursue with reference to Londonderry Gaol. In a Debate upon the Estimates last year the condition of this gaol was raised with fulness in somewhat heated discussions. I do not propose now to hark back at any length on the matter, for the circumstances must be fresh in the recollection of most Members, but the Debates are instructive reading, and admirably illustrate the temper and touch of the right hon. Gentleman when he handles questions of Irish administration brought before him. At that time there had been reports that the sanitary arrangements of Londonderry Gaol were not all that they should be; there were rumours that typhoid fever was prevalent in the city, and that there had been cases in the gaol itself. Beyond that, there was the undoubted, undenied, and undisputed fact that five persons within six weeks had been dismissed from the gaol on account of ill-health, and that two of these, at least, had died shortly after their release, one of them within 48 hours, of typhoid fever, contracted, according to the testimony of a competent medical authority, in the gaol. There was also the notorious fact, well known in Londonderry, that a peculiar unhealthy pallor was the accompaniment in almost all cases of a tenure for any length of time of a cell in Londonderry Gaol. Furthermore, there was the fact that my hon. Friend the Member for Camborne (Mr. Conybeare) suffered from a pest not necessary for me to describe. Beyond this were the experiences related in Committee by the hon. Member for South Armagh (Mr. Blane), experiences which formed a formidable indictment against the prison officials and prison administration—an indictment to which, I am sorry to say, the Chief Secretary did not see fit, so far as the Debates are reported in Hansard, to return any reply. In answering the strong prima facie case for inquiry, what course did the right hon. Gentleman take? He scoffed at the rumours, denied or minimised the facts and scouted the inferences based upon them, and, mounting the high horse, rode off on a side issue, denouncing, in most vehement terms, those Members of the House who had seen fit, or dared, as he put it, to question either the competency or the integrity of the medical officer of the gaol, and who had dared to hint that any of the responsibility for what had occurred should be brought home to his door. The right hon. Gentleman, in the first instance, relied on the information given by the officials, and when further pressed he relied on the Report made by Dr. O'Farrell, the Medical Officer of the Prisons Board, in which the right hon. Gentleman professed to find ample refutation of all the allegations made against the condition of Derry Gaol. The complaints were that the cells were unhealthy, that the prison arrangements were not such as to ensure cleanliness, and that the whole of the drains were in a bad condition, and likely to create sickness. But, after the Debate, the right hon. Gentleman, though professing to see no ground to doubt the condition of Derry Gaol, and, therefore, no ground for granting an Inquiry, said that, in order to allay apprehension on the subject, he would have the state of the gaol inquired into by an independent official of the English Prisons Board; and the result is that we now have the Report of Major Beamish before us. With regard to the cells in Derry Gaol, it is found, according to this Report, that the ventilation is excessively insufficient, and that, in consequence, the prisoners confined there must suffer from the effects of bad air or from draughts;

while it is evident that the arrangements are not, in all cases, such as to ensure cleanliness, and, although the question of the sewers is dealt with in guarded language, it is abundantly clear that they are not all they ought to be. I do not now propose to enter into the question of the sanitary arrangements of Derry Gaol at any length, though, if the right hon. Gentleman wishes it, I am quite prepared to do so. But the significance of this Report is thrown into the shade by the admissions made by the Prisons Board attached to the Report of Major Beamish. Hon. Members who study the question will find that quite sufficient justification is made out for the action taken by those who raised this question last year, and that, in point of fact, there is substantial confirmation for every complaint then brought against Derry Gaol. The General Prisons Board give away the whole case in the first few words of their remarks. They say—

"This gaol is one of the old type, and is so constructed that unless it be entirely levelled and rebuilt, it would be impossible to adopt it to the latest requirements as regards size of the cells, ventilation, and sanitary arrangements."

Can any more sweeping condemnation of the whole arrangements be well imagined? The Prisons Board also say that, in the future, they do not propose to confine within the walls of the gaol any prisoners sentenced to terms exceeding three months, while in many minor respects they have seen fit to adopt the recommendations of Major Beamish. Therefore, I say that hon. Members who brought forward complaints as to the state of this gaol last year were completely justified in the course they took. I now wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he intends to continue to confine prisoners in a gaol which is found to be so unhealthy, and by what process of reasoning it is considered justifiable that prisoners whose offences are so small that they are sentenced to less than three months' imprisonment, should be kept there at imminent peril to their health, while those whose guilt is far greater are to be sent to more healthy establishments? I put it to the right hon. Gentleman whether, in view of the observations of the Prisons Board, he cannot see his way to have this gaol closed for the time being, so that it may be re-constructed in conformity with the sanitary principles applicable to modern gaols.

(8.10.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I must remind the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down that the accusations he has made are not the same as were brought forward on previous occasions. The prison is undoubtedly an old one, and many of the cells are not equal in size to those that are to be found in modern prisons. All that is required at present is that the number of prisoners in Derry Gaol should not be such as to necessitate the use of the small cells. With regard to the case of Cleary, I may state that it was by his own express wish that he had been discharged from hospital. I assume that his was a case of very rapid consumption. With regard to the prison chaplain to whom the hon. Member for South Donegal has referred, it should be remembered that the chaplain of a gaol is an official of the gaol, and when the Prisons Board had to hold an inquiry the chaplain in question refused to give information, which, as chaplain of the gaol, it was his duty to give. It was, therefore, obviously impossible that he should be allowed to remain. The Bishop, or the gentleman who acted for the Bishop at the time, refused to appoint another chaplain, and the result was that the Roman Catholic prisoners in Derry Gaol had been deprived of the services of their religion. It appears to me that that concerned not so much the Prisons Board as the Bishop of the diocese. At all events, no other course than that which they have taken was left open to the Board.

(8.14.) MR. J. G. FITZGERALD (Longford, S.): It is impossible in the course of a single evening, to say nothing of a mere two or three hours, to travel over the whole of the barren waste of the Irish prisons question. During the régime of the right hon. Gentleman the prisons of Ireland have been filled to overflowing, and, unfortunately, many of those who have been confined in them are now dead, and it is the duty of the Irish Representatives to ask the Committee of this House for some consolation for the relatives of those persons, and to press for some guarantee that in future those who are sent to these places shall not be dealt with in the same way as those whose lives have thus been sacrificed. When we were upon this Vote last year it was my duty to direct attention to the sanitary condition of Derry Prison. Owing to the state of the prison it became necessary for the Government to institute a special inquiry, which was carried out by the successor of Dr. Barr, as representative of the Irish Government. The right hon. Gentleman still undertakes to say that Derry Prison is a healthy prison. Here is the Report of Mr. O'Farrel. He says—

"A careful examination of the sanitary condition of this prison has satisfied me that there is nothing in the condition of the prison which could in any way be injurious to health."

I apprehend that the Chief Secretary, when he made his statement to-night, had in his mind the Report of Dr. O'Farrel rather than the Report of the English Inspector, Mr. Edward Beamish, who says, in this prison three Irish prisoners have to put up with 1,592 cubic feet of air, whereas in an English prison one prisoner gets 1,200 cubic feet. He reports that there are 75 square inches of space for the inlet and outlet of air in the Irish cell, whereas in the English cell there are 108 square inches. With regard to the drainage of Derry Prison, he reports that the soil pipe is not trapped, and that it is defective, and states that one of the dust-holes has been left uncleaned six months at a time. Is there any reason for the Chief Secretary standing up and declaring, on the authority of a Report made 12 months ago, and now clearly discarded, that this prison, really a pest-hole, is in a sanitary condition. If any hon. Member is satisfied to live in a residence in which the soil pipe is untrapped, and if he is prepared to say that no sewer gas passes up through that pipe, then I say that he has arrived at a lamentable state of sanitary knowledge. I am perfectly sure that the right hon. Gentleman must have been misled by the Report of Dr. O'Farrel, and forgotten altogether the Report of Mr. Beamish. The prison is apparently condemned by the Prisons

Board, and is said to be only worthy of being razed, that a fitting receptacle for prisoners may be erected. But I am not so much concerned with the sanitary condition of the prison as with what happened to the prisoners confined there. I do not wish to rake up old sores, but this House is the last Court of Appeal to the humblest in the land, and we ought not to forget, because a few months have passed, the poor people who have been done to death. It is certain, Mr. Courtney, that in a prison where there is not sufficient air, and in which the drainage is defective, the disease will be generated of which the prisoners died in Derry. Last year I made the charge that Dr. O'Farrel had issued a garbled Report in order to shield Sir William Miller. The Report of Mr. Beamish enables me to drive that charge home. I assert that Sir William Miller is an incompetent physician; that he did not treat these poor prisoners with inhumanity, but that he treated them wrongly on account of his ignorance and incompetency; that he saw these prisoners day after day, and hour after hour; and that he actually did not know the disease from which they were suffering. And I accuse Dr. O'Farrel, if he did know, of not having stated it in his Report. We have the case of four prisoners, two of whom died, one got well, and the fourth, a woman, left the prison with typhoid fever and afterwards died. It was stated in the Report of Dr. O'Farrel that there had never been any typhoid fever in the prison for 10 years. I do not see how else it could have been, seeing that Sir William Miller always took care to turn out every prisoner before he found out what was the matter with him. It has been actually proved, beyond yea or nay, that he did turn out one man, who died on the roadside, though he had known, from the evidence of the warder, that the man had been delirious the night before. We have heard, though it is hard to conceive, that any professional man should still be retained in the service even of the Government of Ireland after hearing such a statement, that in the case of one man he would allow him to go 12 days without knowing what was the matter, and without using that instrument which would have told him at once the nature of the disease—the thermometer. I charge the Government with being party to the murder of three persons. I say that Sir William Miller did not know what was the matter with them. I say they had typhoid fever with pneumonia, and that, in consequence of that disease, generated in this fever den, they died. On behalf of those poor dead people and their friends I protest in this House. If they want to kill people let them do it in the open like men and not put men in those fever dens which generate disease and end in death. I charge them not to put these fever dens in charge of men so incompetent that they will not have a dust-bin cleared out once in six months. Another case I would allude to in the hope of getting some satisfaction from the right hon. Gentleman is that of Jasper Tully, of the Roscommon Herald, who was confined in Sligo Gaol for four weeks for a Press offence under the Crimes Act. I put a question to the right hon. Gentleman about the case, and asked why Mr. Tully was removed from Sligo Gaol to Tullamore, but he did not give me a very precise answer. I shall, perhaps, be in order in calling the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the fact that the recent Commission which was appointed to inquire into the grievances of prisoners in Her Majesty's convict prison at Chatham—where prisoners are detained for treason-felony, and where there are many who have received the dreadful sentence of penal servitude for life—recommended that prisoners who had committed offences at a distance from home, though they were confined in gaols nearest to the places where the offences had been committed, should be allowed to receive letters in lieu of visits from their friends. The Commission found that it is undoubtedly a dreadful hardship for prisoners who have committed offences in certain places to be moved into penal servitude at great distances away, because such prisoners cannot receive the visits from their friends to which they are entitled. I say that there was ample accommodation in Sligo Gaol for Jasper Tully. He has made no complaint, but if he had been confined in the district in which his offence was committed, he would have been able to receive visits from his friends. We say it is a piece of petty spite on the part of the Prison Authorities to remove him to Tullamore, and so deprive him of the visits of his friends. I think the right hon. Gentleman ought to give us some satisfaction on this point. I am bound to say I get very little satisfaction either from the right hon. Gentleman the Irish Attorney General or the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary. Probably it is because I speak so little in this House, and I am sometimes inclined to think, notwithstanding the persuasion of hon. Friends who sit around me, that one day I shall have to commence and be troublesome and keep the right hon. Gentlemen and their Friends here until morning unless they give me the satisfaction on these points for which I am entitled to ask. In connection with the case to which I have referred a warder was dismissed. He asked what he was dismissed for—whether his conduct had not been good—and he was simply told that though his previous conduct and character had been perfectly right he was to be dismissed. We want some assurance from the Government that this man will be restored to his position, or if not restored that he should have some compensation for having had his character damaged by being dismissed summarily without being told what his offence was. (9.15.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I think it would be well if the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury, who, I presume, will be in his place in a moment, would upon this Vote make the statement which I understand he is prepared to make. It is being looked forward to with considerable interest in all the counties in Ireland, and I imagine that sufficient time has now elapsed to enable him to speak with fulness and completeness. Various complaints are made with regard to the conduct of certain contractors in Ireland who have been sitting in one part of the country as Judges and acting in another part of the country as contractors. A gentleman who has acted in one part of the country as a contractor sits under a Judge who has acted as a contractor in another part of the country. Each gentleman contracts and judges in rotation, and in this way the contractor of one man can be the judge of another, and the judge of one man the contractor of another. This state of things has given rise to great suspicion on this side of the House. I have no doubt, however, that the right hon. Gentleman will be able to remove from our minds the suspicion we not unnaturally entertain of this sort of procedure. It is hardly necessary now to go into the matter with any minuteness.

*(9.20.) THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): Questions have been put in the House with reference to two lines which were inquired into by a Court of Inquiry appointed by the Board of Works under their statutory powers, and reference has also been made to two engineers who were appointed as members of the Courts, and who, I believe, have enjoyed a reputation for professional ability and skill, and as being men of great experience in connection with railways in Ireland. When the Courts of Inquiry had to be constituted, the Board of Works had to consider first the securing of the services of men who were thoroughly competent to discharge the duties. It would be almost impossible to obtain the services of any engineer of eminence in Ireland and of great experience in connection with railways who had not been at some previous time connected with one or other of the schemes which had been brought forward from time to time. It was important to secure the services of men who had experience, and it was the object of the Board of Works to select for the office of engineers men in whom they had confidence, and men whose opinions they believed would carry with them the confidence of the public. They had only one object, and that was to secure men who were competent and whose opinion would carry weight. It is true, no doubt, that two of the engineers who were selected had been connected in previous years with schemes for railways, two of which formed part of the schemes brought forward under the Act of last year. It has been said in the case of the Donegal and Killybegs line that the line was reported on by an engineer who, although not connected with that particular line, was interested in a line which had been promoted in County Galway, which it was said was reported upon by an engineer who was interested in the Donegal line. This is not quite correct. The scheme put forward of the line from Donegal to Killybegs included a branch from Inver to Glenties. The Court of Inquiry decided that it was not desirable to approach Glenties by means of the Donegal and Killybegs line, and that portion of the line was struck out of the scheme. The line was further altered by the Court of Inquiry because the limits of deviation were altered at the Killybegs end of the line; and I believe that those alterations of deviation were deemed to be great improvements in the scheme as put forward. The line, as approved, was approved by the Court as a whole, and I think that no one who knows the district can fail to come to the conclusion that the line from Donegal to Killybegs is one which will serve a useful purpose. It travels from Donegal through a district which is capable of considerable improvement, and at Killybegs it is possible to develop the fishing industry. I think that if this line is constructed it will prove to be a useful one for the fishing industry, and the development of the district. It also taps a district to the South-West of Donegal which, according to certain maps which have been prepared, is shown to be one of the most congested districts of Donegal; and it brings within reach the whole of that congested district of South-West Donegal. As to the Galway and Clifden line, I think that every one is agreed that the communication between those two places is essentially necessary, and that that communication should take the route via Oughterard. I have had the advantage of driving over a considerable portion of the route of this line, and I may remind the Committee that the project has been before the public for a great many years. I believe that in 1883 this line was promoted in competition with another line, and that it obtained the presentment of the Grand Jury in competition with another line which followed almost the same route. Following the presentment of the Grand Jury, the question was again fought out before the Privy Council, and the line which was in competition with it at that time was practically withdrawn. There has been a new and further inquiry, and several lines have again been brought forward and carefully inquired into, the inquiry being presided over by Sir John Ball Greene, the Commissioner of Valuation, and again after full and complete inquiry—

MR. T. M. HEALY: When was Sir John Ball Greene's inquiry?

MR. T. M. HEALY: When?

*MR. JACKSON: This year. The same result has been brought about this time. After full and complete inquiry, and with sworn evidence taken relating to the various schemes, because there were at least three courses open: one to follow the coastline from Galway, and then work up to Clifden, and two lines via Oughterard, and following inland through the country, the Court of Inquiry decided that the line which had obtained the presentment of the Grand Jury was the best line put forward. The facts that the Courts of Inquiry were composed of men of eminence and reputation, that they had no other object but to find the best possible route for serving the districts through which the proposed lines would travel, that they came to the conclusion that the lines selected are the best for the purposes desired, and the fact also that these lines obtained the presentment of the Grand Jury, must carry weight. I need not go into the question of the evidence of the engineers, men of high position in their profession and character to command confidence, and the Committee may dismiss from their minds any doubt as to interested motives or bias in the minds of the engineers in favour of any particular route. With regard to the carrying out of those schemes, it has been the object of the Government, as far as possible, to secure the lines which are best calculated to serve the districts and counties through which they travel; and, secondly, as far as they can to secure the counties against future liability. I will not say they shall be entirely free from liability, for, as the Committee is aware, a baronial guarantee is given under Section 10, carrying with it liability for future maintenance and working. It has been, and still is, the object of the Government to secure, if possible, in every case where it is practicable—I do not say it is possible in every case—that the lines shall be entrusted to some contractor or company capable of carrying out the work in a satisfactory manner, and again, as far as possible, to make the working arrangements of the lines, when they are constructed, such as will relieve, if not entirely, at least as far as possible, the districts from further liability. I hope, therefore, that the Committee will place some confidence in the Government in connection with the schemes, because I need hardly say that the hands of the Government will be very much tied if they are called upon to declare absolutely they will make certain lines in any case or under any conditions. It is very desirable that the hands of the Government should be free to negotiate in the interests of the counties, so as to secure, as far as they can, by a first payment, the construction of the lines in a satisfactory manner, and so that they may endeavour, as far as possible, by that first payment to secure the counties from further liability.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Has any arrangement been arrived at with the Midland Great Western with reference to the lines?

*MR. JACKSON: With reference to the Midland Great Western, the district of that line covers not only the Galway and Clifden line and the means of communication between Westport and Mulranny and Ballina and Killala, but also the Mayo lines, and these would make a junction with the Midland Great Western. It has been the desire of the Government to ascertain whether it is possible to enlist the full and complete co-operation of the Midland Great Western Company with regard to the construction, working, and maintenance of those lines. The negotiations, however, are not complete, and it would not be in the interests of the districts or counties concerned that I should be called upon at present to enter into details. I trust, therefore, that the Committee will accept what I have said as an assurance that the Government are doing their utmost in the interests of the districts affected; and I am not without hope that they will successfully accomplish their object. There are other lines, and I would indicate those which the Government think it desirable should be made. In indicating those lines I would again impress on the Committee the extreme importance, not only to the Government, but to the districts concerned that the Government should have a free hand for their negotiations, and should not be hampered by unnecessary pledges, in order that they may be able to make the best bargain they can. Subject to the reservation that before any of the companies promoting a line can go for an Order in Council it must obtain the assent of the Government, and the arrangements must satisfy the Treasury. I may tell the Committee the lines the Government think may be aided or ought to be aided and carried into practical operation. There is a line projected from Baltimore to Skibbereen, and I need not point out that Baltimore is already a very important fishing station for a district in which the fishing industry has been largely developed by the great energy of Father Davis and others, aided as they have been by the munificence of Lady Burdett-Coutts. It is desirable the line should be made from Baltimore to Skibbereen, and I believe it will be possible to make satisfactory working arrangements with the adjoining company, the Cork and Bandon Company. Subject to this, I hope matters will before long be in such a condition that the work may be entered upon. There are also two lines in Kerry, both of them important, and in districts which it is desirable to open out—the Headford to Kenmare and the Killorglin to Valentia lines, both travelling through districts where the burden of rate is as heavy as anywhere in Ireland, and I assume that satisfactory arrangements will be made for the construction and subsequent working of the lines, and also with the companies with which the lines will be brought into connexion. I have, then, referred to the line from Galway to Clifden, and to the two lines in Mayo—Westport to Mulranny and Ballina to Killala—as railways the Government are anxious to see constructed. There are also two lines in Donegal, the Stranorlar to Fintown, possibly to Glenties, and the Donegal to Killybegs lines—and possibly a line from Buncrana to Carnadonagh in the north-east of the county—to which I will refer. The line from Stranorlar to Fintown has been recommended as having received the approval of the Grand Jury, and the entire facts show that it is desirable that some means of communication should be given to what I may call the northern or the north-west portion of Donegal. It may become a question whether the line from Stranorlar should stop at Fintown or Glenties. Fintown is the point of junction with the southern portion of what is, perhaps, the second most congested district of Donegal; it was within easy reach, or six or seven miles, of a very large and much congested district. The line proposed to be made is a narrow gauge line, corresponding with that from Stranorlar to Donegal, now in existence, and the proposed line from Donegal to Killybegs, and it does appear to me essential to the harmonious working of the whole of these lines that the arrangements should be under one Board of Management. It is obvious that this would be a great advantage, because one management would arrange suitable times for trains through each district, and the rolling stock would be of the same type, and available for one line or another, according as interchange might be necessary to meet emergencies. This is one object the Government keep in view. There is a short line from Downpatrick to Ardglass, with respect to which I have received a deputation representing the district. Certainly Ardglass is an important fishing port. The County Down Railway Company are promoting this line, and I learn that the Grand Jury have made a presentment, which the Railway Company is prepared to accept; and I hope that arrangements may be made for the construction of this line and its working and maintenance by the County Down Railway Company, without any further liability being thrown on the county. These schemes will involve a total expenditure of between £800,000 and £900,000. I know of no reason when the basis of an agreement is satisfactorily settled—and I may say that to this end we have been for some time working—when once a satisfactory agreement is come to with respect to two or three of these lines, why it should not form a basis of negotiation in the other cases. There are one or two other lines it is desirable should be made if money is at our disposal. One is a short, but costly, extension from Bantry to Bantry Pier. I hope it may be possible to come to arrangements for the making of that communication. There is another projected line from Buncrana to Carnadonagh, promoted by the Louth Swilly Company, about which I also hope that some satisfactory arrangement may be made. It is certainly desirable that further means of communication should be provided for the north or north-western portion of Donegal. If the Government can make arrangements by which the lines indicated can be constructed and worked, a very important step will have been taken in the opening up of these districts, and establishing communications with some of the most congested districts in Ireland. I hope that some of the lines will be promptly made, and that the results will soon be seen in an improvement in the condition of the people.

(9.53.) COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): We have had a clear, and, I think, upon the whole, a satisfactory statement from the right hon. Gentleman. ["No, no."] Those expostulations come from Members who represent what cannot be called the congested districts. There can be no doubt the lines indicated will be of great benefit to Ireland. There is an immense amount of fishing undeveloped, because no market is available. There is in Connemara a mining industry in copper and lead unemployed for want of the assistance which only the railway can provide. You may say there is means of transit by sea, but it is perhaps the most stormy coast in the world, and internal means of communication are absolutely necessary, and in times of famine and scarcity the lamentable condition of these districts is felt throughout all Ireland; and, indeed, the whole of the Kingdom. I do not believe it is possible for the Government to take any step in Irish administration that will give more satisfaction than this opening of the congested districts by railway communication. I know some of the districts referred to, and my attention has been specially drawn to the Connemara lines. I appreciate the attention the right hon. Gentleman has given to proposed lines there, and his desire to be fair as between the conflicting interests in carrying on negotiations. My only fear is from want of expedition in arriving at a conclusion. Some of these lines were projected four years ago by the noble Lord the Member for Paddington (Lord Randolph Churchill), and yet in Connemara absolutely nothing has been done. The Galway Grand Jury met to-day, but I do not know that they were expected to take any action to-day, and if the Report of the Grand Jury is to wait until next March, and then goes before the Privy Council, work may be deferred for another year. I would beg the Secretary to the Treasury to expedite the negotiations as much as possible. As to the particular line through Connemara

I am perfectly neutral. I know the feeling is strong among the clergy there, and owners of property, in favour of the Oughterard route, and the whole question has been well thrashed out. I am only anxious that the decision should be carried out at once. My only fear is that the negotiations between the three bodies, the Treasury, the Grand Jury, and the Midland Great Western Company may break down. So far as I know the district, I do not care which plan is adopted, only I am anxious the line should be made at once, and I think I may say that if the Government act with expedition there will be few people who will not endorse their action. The Midland and Great Western Railway Company required a guarantee of £30,000 or £40,000 for the district. But a poor district does not like to guarantee more than the working expenses; they prefer to do that than to pay a lump sum. There are three other constituencies in the county, and two out of the three are making railroads of their own, and will naturally not derive much benefit from this scheme. But this I may say: I hope that the Treasury will use expedition. When they do right they ought to be praised, and in this thing they have done what is right and generous, but the value of their action will be lost if they allow the work to be put off from year to year.

(10.2.) MR. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.): I cannot altogether agree with my hon. Friend who has just spoken. Of course, the statement of the Secretary to the Treasury is, to some extent, satisfactory. It is well to know that the Government intend to do something of the kind, but, considering how long they have had it in hand, I think we ought to have a little more definite statement as to the intentions of the Government. I think that in all probability they will fail in their designs. I maintain that if the Government really want to have these districts opened up, and if they wish to secure the prosperity of these places, they would allow us to do these things ourselves. Over and over again have different Governments embarked on enterprises of this kind. Large sums of public money have been mis-spent and wasted through the incapacity of the Treasury. Of course, I shall be very glad to see anything done for the benefit of these districts, which have been so shamefully neglected such a long time by successive Governments. But, in my opinion, they never will be benefited until we have a Government of our own.

(10.9.) MR. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.): Four years have now elapsed since the Leader of this House and the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced a great policy of light railways for Ireland, but up to the present time not a single penny has been spent. It is now nearly six months since the inquiries into these light railway projects were completed, and since then the right hon. Gentleman and his Board of Works in Ireland have been making up their minds which lines to promote. Had we a Parliament in Dublin we should not have wasted so much time; but when matters of this sort are left to strangers, and to strange officials, the schemes are naturally put off Session after Session. Now, I desire to-night to protest against the adoption of one of these schemes. During the last few months I have asked several questions about the projected Killybegs and Donegal line, and also about the Galway scheme. I say nothing about the latter, because I am extremely impressed with the desirability of some line being constructed in that district. But I may say I wish some engineer other than Mr. Barton had promoted the line.—[An hon. MEMBER: Mr. Price.]—It does not matter whether it was Mr. Price or Mr. Barton. They have been working this thing together, and the line promoted by one in Donegal is reported on by his confederate, while the other promotes a line in Galway which his confederate reports upon. This is the real gist of my complaint against the Government. They have a large number of engineers they can select from, but they actually choose two gentlemen who are personally pecuniarily interested to report on lines promoted by each other. I think that that is a scandalous thing, which requires explaining by the Government. Now I come to the question of the Donegal and Killybegs line, which is one of the most scandalous jobs ever perpetrated in my memory. In the first place, the line is being promoted by the West Donegal Railway Company, which is notoriously insolvent, and the sub-section of the Act passed last year, which forbids the granting of laws to a company of that kind, has been violated in this case. The Royal Commission reported against this line last year, but when I questioned the right hon. Gentleman on that point he told me the Report was against the route, and not against the line. But what is the difference? The Grand Jury are in favour of a different route, but because that is convenient for a noble Lord, who is a supporter of the Government, it is to be carried out. It is said that it will serve a congested district; but the only congested district that it is near is that of Glencolumbkille, and that district is separated from the proposed line of railway by a high range of mountains. It is equally absurd to say that this line will be of any use in developing the fisheries. From a Report which was issued a few days ago we find that in the Killybegs division there are 142 fishing-boats and 817 fishermen registered. But this relates to no less than 135 miles of coast, whereas the railway could only serve about 15 miles. If that fact cannot be disputed, what justification is there for the adoption of this route? I invite the right hon. Gentleman to deny the accuracy of the facts I have stated. But that is not all. This line is in competition with the Stranorlar line, which has been unanimously approved by the Grand Jury of Donegal, who have passed a guarantee for the working expenses of the line. Then there has been no opposition to this line from any quarter whatever, while it has been officially declared that upon its merits the line is superior to any other line which could be constructed in the district. Yet the Treasury prefer to adopt the Killybegs scheme, and reject this Stranorlar line. I call on the Secretary to the Treasury, if he can, to explain this proposed scandalous waste of public money.

(10.23.) MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): Before saying a few words on the Donegal scheme I desire to recall to the House the fact that we are not now discussing the appropriation of money from the British Exchequer. We shall, no doubt, hereafter be told of the ungracious way in which the Irish Members accepted or declined to accept British money for the development of Irish resources. But this is not British money. It is Irish money. No British money is spent in Ireland, nor has any been spent since the Union; on the contrary, Ireland has for years overpaid its fair proportion to the British Exchequer. What the landlords draw from Ireland is but a small portion of the money taken out of the island. The money now under discussion is Irish money, and who are to be the arbitrators of the manner in which it shall be expended? The right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Manchester and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Leeds, while the Members for Ireland are to have no effective voice in its appropriation. The history of these schemes is in itself sufficient to convince all reasoning men of the utter inability of the English portion of this House to administer the affairs of Ireland. What does this particular scheme, however the details may be carried out, involve? It involves a certain charge on the cesspayers of Ireland. One would have considered it was the initial duty of the Treasury, before sanctioning a scheme involving such a charge, to ascertain the condition of cess in the county of Donegal. If they had done so they would have found that in some portions of Donegal the cess is two years in arrear. Within the last week the Grand Jury have passed a resolution that they are unable to undertake any new works for want of money. How can the Government expect to get a contribution equal to 5 per cent. of the cess for Donegal over and above what the people there are now paying? You cannot do it. How can the Government bring forward schemes which will further increase the burden of the cesspayers? I wash my hands of the whole scheme. In the name of my constituency I protest against any further imposition in the shape of cess being thrown upon it.

(10.28.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Gentleman is much more anxious to preserve the interests of the cesspayers than are the cesspayers themselves. He knows perfectly well that if the proposed lines in this country were abandoned no people in Donegal would be more bitterly disappointed than those whom he represents.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: I am prepared to take that responsibility.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Member said we were dealing with Irish money. But the hon. Member was a party to the Home Rule Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian and to the financial arrangements embodied in that Bill. As the hon. Member himself will perfectly know, England and Scotland will pay not merely two-thirds but five-sixths of the whole money given.

MR. T. M. HEALY: What about the Union?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I presume the hon. and learned Gentleman is referring to what occurred in 1800.

MR. T. M. HEALY: 1815.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am alluding to a much more recent transaction—to what occurred in 1886. Both the hon. Gentleman who interrupts me and the hon. Gentleman who has last spoken must be perfectly well aware that they were not merely consenting parties, but enthusiastically consenting parties to the financial arrangements embodied in the Bill of 1886 between the two countries. That being so it does not lie in their mouths to say that the money now voted out of the Imperial Exchequer is Irish and not British money.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: The right hon. Gentleman has not the least ground for saying that or anything like it. I was not only not an enthusiastic supporter of that portion of the scheme, but it was distinctly understood among our own ranks that that was open to Amendment.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes; but I never heard it stated to Home Rule constituencies in England that one of the incidents of Home Rule would be that Ireland would bear much less than its present share of the common burdens of the two countries. I learn that now for the first time. I am very glad to learn now that an integral part of the policy of hon. Gentlemen opposite is to make the Home Rule Bill an occasion for greatly increasing the burdens of the English taxpayer and greatly lightening the burdens of the Irish taxpayer. Now, on the question of the charge on the cesspayer, I would point out to hon. Gentlemen that one thing to be aimed at in this Bill, and in the negotiations, is to diminish as far as possible the charge on the Irish cesspayer. It was a necessary incident of the Tramways Act passed in 1883 by the right hon. Member for the Bridgeton Division of Glasgow that a great charge should be made upon the cesspayers in any district where tramways or light railways were carried out. We felt, as we still feel, the evils of that system. We felt when we passed the Bill, and we still feel, that the more we can make arrangements by which the liability of the cesspayer shall be diminished, and the responsibility of working those lines shall be thrown on independent companies, the better it will be for the future of the districts through which the railways pass; and when the Government are reproached for delay I would remind the hon. Member that that delay is due to our anxiety to form such arrangements with responsible railway companies as will relieve the cesspayer of that particular liability which the hon. Member for Galway complains of. The hon. Member for North Dublin told the Committee that if he had had the management of this affair, or an Irish Parliament had had the management of it, the whole thing would have been settled in a month. If so it would have been very badly settled. I am perfectly confident, from my knowledge of the negotiations that have been carried on upon this matter, that, if the Government had come forward and said that whatever anybody else might do they were determined to have a railway constructed between this point and that point, the railway would have been constructed, but a very great and unnecessary expense and a very superfluous burden would have been cast on the cesspayers of the district through which the railway passed, and it was in the interest not of the Government but of the cesspayers that the delay occurred.

The Committee knows, or the Committee might know, that localities do not look very far ahead in these matters. Provided they can be assured that a certain number of hundreds or thousands of pounds of public money are to be spent in the course of two or three years on works of public utility, they are apt to shut their eyes to the question of future liability. I am afraid examples of that have already occurred in Ireland, and if it were not for the care exercised by the Government in spending the money voted last year, such cases would be multiplied. Only to-day a question was asked across the floor of the House regarding a threatened strike against a cess voluntarily accepted by the locality under the Act of 1883. Whether our efforts will or will not be found a success I at all events claim for my right hon. Friend and myself that both in framing the Bill and in carrying it out we have never for one instant lost sight of the absolute necessity of trying to frame these schemes in a manner which shall, as far as possible, relieve the localities of future liability. The hon. Gentleman has told us that four years have elapsed since this policy was announced. Why, the Bill under which we are now acting was only passed last year, and that it was not passed some years before was no fault of Her Majesty's Government.

MR. CLANCY: You did not bring it in until last year.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am perfectly aware of that. The hon. Gentleman is unable to restrain his ardour for interruption. It was not brought in until last year. Why? Because the House was occupied in carrying out in other Departments the policy of my noble Friend the Member for Paddington. And when it was brought in last year does not everybody know that it was only with the utmost difficulty, in face of the opposition given to it by Members sitting on the other side, that the Government were able to carry it into law? This measure has been truly described by the hon. and gallant Member for North Galway as one which is likely to do more good than any other which has been passed, yet it was carried with the utmost difficulty against the opposition of hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House—["Oh"]—some of them; I do not say all. The opposition set up came from the other side of the House, and I am afraid the reception which my right hon. Friend's statement has met with shows that, whether the Government succeed or not in benefiting the districts through which these railways are to pass, we shall not earn the gratitude of those who profess to represent those districts. With reference to the criticisms upon the scheme for constructing a railway from Donegal to Killybegs, I have only to reply that it does not require 15 miles of coast line to justify you in making a railway for the purpose of assisting a fishing industry. Whether a line is or is not fitted to encourage such industry does not depend on the length of coast along which it passes. ["Bosh."] I should have thought that was elementary knowledge—but on the character of the harbour on which it abuts and its capacity for supporting a fishing population. This line meets the West Donegal line. The hon. Member told us that the West Donegal lines are bad. I cannot pretend that they are strong; but I believe the proposal to join the lines, thus giving control of a common rolling stock, will do much to improve their prospects. With regard to the proposed line for Stranorlar, it was not proposed to carry that beyond Glenties. That is a question which not only depends upon the character of the country, but upon the total amount of money we have to deal with. How the money will be disposed of must depend upon the careful consideration of the circumstances of the case, and it is not necessary nor even advisable that we should commit ourselves to additional lines beyond Glenties, until we know what other claims we shall have upon us. I will not pretend to be disappointed with the reception which my right hon. Friend's clear and able statement has met with from hon. Gentlemen opposite, but I am nevertheless convinced that nothing has yet ever been proposed for the benefit of the population of the West of Ireland which is more likely to develop their resources, and in a healthy, salutary manner enable them to develop the industries and capacities of the country which they inhabit. I trust that whatever hon. Gentlemen may think it proper to say in this Committee, they will not, at all events, throw any substantial obstacle in the way of the Government carrying these schemes into effect.

(10.55.) MR. T. M. HEALY: The right hon. Gentleman, in consequence of the remarks of my hon. Friend, has entered into a discussion of the Home Rule Bill of 1886, and the financial arrangements made thereunder between the two countries, with a species of ingenuity that is his own, and I find it difficult, Sir, to deal effectually with a subject which he has discussed to-night in such a remarkable manner. That we are dealing with Irish money and not Imperial money cannot be doubted. When our country was swindled at the time of the Union it was only paying on a debt of £12,000,000. It is now paying on a debt of £600,000,000 or £700,000,000. I maintain that since 1852 or 1853, when Ireland was first obliged to pay Income Tax and increased Spirit Duty, she has paid to England a sum greater than that paid by France to Germany for the War Indemnity. When, in consequence of the discussions on this year's Budget, you found yourselves obliged to appoint a Committee to inquire into the fiscal relations between the two countries, is it surprising that we, with our strong sense of grievance on this matter, should declare that this is Irish money which you are now dealing with, and is only a portion of the restitution which you should make in much larger measure towards Ireland? I decline at the present moment to discuss what are the transactions which we had hoped to see carried out under the Home Rule Bill. That is a matter which we shall be able to deal with when the proper time comes. In spite of the seductive invitation of the right hon. Gentleman, who sat down twice in order that he might get himself interrupted, I refuse to insert in the interstices of this Debate a discussion as to what were our views, and what were our objections to the Home Rule Bill. I altogether deny the statement the right hon. Gentleman has made that, but for the care and anxiety of the Government, the localities would have compensated themselves to a much larger extent than they are able to bear.

The right hon. Gentleman has stated that under the Tramways Act of 1883 the localities, which gladly and freely entered into fiscal arrangements, are now threatening to strike, in consequence of the grievous burden. Now, if there ever was a case capable of confutation it is that; and if the right hon. Gentleman had considered his words for a moment he would not have advanced it, because the localities which entered into these arrangements had no more to say to them than the people of Laputa. The gentlemen who passed these schemes were the Grand Jurors, who do not pay a single shilling of the rates. All they want is to have railways running up to their doors, and other people to pay for them; just as the magnificent walls which are built around their estates, and which excite the wonder of all who see them, have all been built out of the rates imposed by the Grand Jurors, who always put these jobs on the counties when they can. It is only within the last 40 years that the people have asserted themselves and traversed this state of things, and, for my part, I would say that, bad as the Grand Jurors are, I should not be afraid to trust them with the entire administration of the Tramways Act, if the rates were equally divided between the owner and occupier. If this were done the Government would as easily get a milestone to dance as get a Grand Juror to pass a tramway scheme. The right hon. Gentleman has excused himself by saying that the ratepayers are willing to undertake these great and heavy burdens. That I altogether deny; but, at the same time, I am not prepared to say that the Government have not considerable difficulty in dealing with this matter. Indeed, I will not criticise the attitude of the Secretary to the Treasury in regard to the Midland Railway, either in Galway or in Mayo. But this is quite apart from the question of the delays, which I think has been needless. I say I think it was desirable to pass the Act and get the money, and, Parliament having provided the means, we are here now to consider their allocation. I think the Treasury have taken needless time in preparing their scheme. The right hon. Gentleman has omitted some of the chief factors for our consideration. For instance, he has not stated, in the case of any single line, what is the amount to be allotted to that line. Consequently, the right hon. Gentleman has left out the chief element for enabling us to come to a determination; and we have not been treated with that fulness of exposition which we have a right to expect in this matter. Again, the Committee has not heard how many of these lines are to be narrow-gauge railways. That is a most crucial point for examination. For my own part, I entirely deprecate the making of any more narrow-gauge lines. It may be said "that half a loaf is better than no bread," and that half a railway being better than none at all, a line of three-feet gauge is better than being unable to make one of five feet three inches. But I say, is it desirable? Supposing you intend to make arrangements with the Midland Company that you should travel on the broad-gauge to Galway and then change carriages and get upon a narrow-gauge line. I would rather have one good line in Ireland than half a dozen bad ones. I admit that the Government are anxious to mete out the gold which is bursting the Treasury to as great an extent as possible; but if the districts were prepared to take a national, instead of a local, view of the matter, they would agree that one good broad-gauge line would be better than a number of narrow-gauge lines. When I contemplate the list of railways the Government hope to be able to bring into existence, I am naturally struck by the supposition that they are going to make them as cheaply as possible, and, if so, they will be narrow-gauge lines. The Committee will remember that poor Lord Redesdale had one good idea: he was bitterly opposed to narrow-gauge railways, against which he always set his face, one consequence of which was that we in Ireland were spared from a good deal of the commotion that would have arisen from the construction of such lines. I deprecate the suggestion that a lot of these lines are to be narrow-gauge lines. Some of them must be so because of their connection with existing narrow-gauge lines; but so great is the scandal of the narrow-gauge system that there is a bit of broad-gauge line in Donegal which runs up to the Lough Swilly line, and because the Letterkenny line was a broad-gauge line, will it be believed that they pulled it up and made it a narrow-gauge to fit the other line? I concur in every word uttered by my hon. Friend the Member for North Dublin with regard to the Galway line. I do not think it is a line which the Government should be called on to make, although I approve of the proposed line from Galway to Clifden. To say that eminent engineers approve of the line is to say that all engineers are eminent who have an eminent disregard for the Ten Commandments. I once heard a man ask another what religion he was, and the answer was "a civil engineer." That is exactly the religion of Messrs. Barton and Price. The psalm-singing person Mr. Barton, when he was promoting these lines, needed to hold an evangelistic service at Ballina, and I have no doubt that is the method by which Mr. Barton secured the sympathy of the Government and secured the success of his scheme. If the Government like to throw away their money on Messrs. Barton and Price that is their affair—though we shall be prepared to criticise and attack the proceeding—but do not let them say, "We have employed eminent engineers." We shall have but one answer for them, whatever excuse or explanation they offer—"Barton and Price," "Price and Barton"—and upon those two names we shall ring the changes. Another thing I wish to say with regard to this matter is this: Why were not the Irish Members consulted with regard to the making of some of these lines? I do not say that they have thrown away their money in all these cases, but I do say that the case was one in which the Irish Party should have been consulted. If they had been, Scotch lines affecting the Highlands and Islands of Scotland, will it be suggested for a moment that the Unionist Members from Scotland would not have been consulted? Why they would have been up the Lord Advocate's sleeve every afternoon. But so far as I am aware not a single Irish Member has been consulted in regard to these Irish Railways. No one can say that we could have a more reasonable Secretary to the Treasury than the right hon. Gentleman opposite. We all recognise his courtesy, but, at the same time, we are entitled to complain of the way this business has been conducted. We are told that we are an integral part of the Imperial Parliament, but we are forgotten when it becomes inconvenient to remember our existence. The Irish Members not having been consulted, they repudiate all responsibility in connection with this matter. It is for us to see that, however you lay out this money, you do not make the localities responsible. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, when he talks about his anxiety not to make the localities responsible, should listen to the tale of woe I can present to him. When he boasts of the bounty of the Government, in the matter of these light railways, I would refer him to page 64 of the estimate. He will find there mention made of the Cork and Muskerry line; and in connection with that I would point out that the Government have broken their pledges, and that, although scandals are pretty generally associated with the action of the Government, the financial meanness they have exhibited in this matter is something altogether new. They have acted with financial meanness in breach of their own Act of Parliament—the Tramway Act of 1883—in the case of this Cork and Muskerry line. The estimate says that the whole length of this railway is 18½ miles; the percentage guaranteed is 5 per cent., and the authorised capital £75,000. It says, further, that the probable claim on the baronies for interest—which is for 12 months, I presume—will be £2,463. The estimated contribution shows a maximum of £986. That, of course, is a 5 per cent. guarantee, and the county only gets from the Government two-fifths, or less than £986. By the 9th section of the Tramways Act the Treasury are required to contribute 2 per cent., but the Treasury has shirked this obligation. It has not carried out that which it is obliged to carry out, and has refused the Directors of this Cork and Muskerry Railway, who are Loyalists to a man, this 2 per cent. I know what I am talking about, because I have seen all the correspondence. I have seen the repudiation by the Treasury and the Board of Works of their obligation under the Act. If they do not repudiate it they must have changed their ground during the past fortnight. What are the Cork and Muskerry Directors going to do now? Why, in their extremity they are going to apply to the Irish Attorney General for leave to file a petition of right to compel the Treasury to pay the money they claim.

*MR. JACKSON: The hon. and learned Member will see that the £986 to be paid by the Treasury is two-fifths of the whole amount.

MR. T. M. HEALY: That is not so. The figures as the right hon. Gentleman has arranged them in the estimate may carry out his view; but he cannot deny that there is a question pending between himself and the Directors of the Cork and Muskerry Railway. Does the right hon. Gentleman deny that?

*MR. JACKSON: I have no knowledge of it.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Will he deny that the Board of Works have refused to assist the Cork and Muskerry Company? I have seen the letters bearing upon the question myself. The point was raised by question in this House, and yet the right hon. Gentleman opposite says he has no knowledge of it. The Directors are about to take steps to recover the money; but how are they to recover it if the Treasury persist in their refusal? It is a serious question whether the petition of right would lie, as all sorts of technicalities can be raised. I do not see how the company can apply for a petition of right, as they are not aggrieved—they can get it from the baronies. Who, then, is the party to bring an action? Only some cesspayer in the County of Cork who may not be affected to a greater amount than £1 a year, and can it be expected of such a person to enter into a litigation with the Treasury? I should like to know whether the right hon. Gentleman is prepared to guarantee that in the future no liability shall fall on the baronies.

*(11.17.) MR. KNOX (Cavan, W.): I maintain that the two speeches we have heard from the Treasury Bench are absolutely inconsistent, not only in tone but in substance. We do not, of course, expect to get from the Chief Secretary that courtesy which we always get from the Secretary to the Treasury, but I maintain that, apart from the question of tone, the two speeches were absolutely inconsistent in their substance. The Chief Secretary says that the great care of the Government will be to prevent any burden falling on the localities which the localities will be unable to bear. Well, but if only half the scheme indicated by the Chief Secretary is carried out, a burden upon the cesspayers will be inevitable. The Secretary to the Treasury has the best of intentions for our people, but good intentions by themselves will not be sufficient to make railways in Ireland, and the money that the Government has at its disposal under Acts of Parliament is not anything like sufficient to pay for the railways referred to. Why, I venture to say that one railway alone—that from Galway to Clifden—will not cost less than £300,000, and I make that statement on good authority. If so much money as this is required, how, I ask, are all these other railways to be constructed with the small amount of money which the Government has at its disposal? If all these railways are attempted, they can only be completed by resorting to the ruinous system of baronial guarantees, which has been tried and has failed. The answer of the Secretary to the Treasury is that the baronial guarantee is accepted by the locality. I think my hon. and learned Friend has dealt with that matter. It is a mere farce to say that the Grand Juries in any part of Ireland represent the localities. They do not. They represent the landlords of the localities. If the right hon. Gentleman means that the landlords of a particular locality, having accepted a burden, are bound to bear that burden, then in those counties in which there is default in cess, levy it on the landlords, and you will be pursuing a course of natural justice. But the people who are now bound by law to pay this money are not the people who have accepted the burden. They have never been consulted, and there is no form in which they can be consulted. I grant it may be possible in some cases to get a meeting together to approve a scheme. We all know what that means. A number of people get together and pass resolutions, because they think it a cheap way of obtaining railway facilities for their district. Such resolutions are not worth anything. Let me give an instance in which, according to the right hon. Gentleman's phrase, a burden has been accepted by a locality. I want to know whether the hon. and gallant Member for North Down (Colonel Waring) thinks his constituents approve of the burden which the Grand Jury has imposed on some of them in the case of the Ardglass Railway. Ardglass is a place to which a railway certainly ought to have been made, and I believe would have been made before this had it not been for the pernicious influence of this system of legislation, by which everybody is taught to look for Government grants instead of relying on his own resources. The County Down Railway Company pays 6 per cent. on its ordinary shares, and they should make this line themselves as a feeder. No doubt the line would not pay by itself, but it would pay as a feeder, and I believe the company would have constructed it themselves had it not been for the hope that they would get the Government to make it. The cesspayers, some of whom are nearly 30 miles away from the district affected, will have to pay cess for the construction of this line, which to many of them will be of no benefit whatever. I deny that it would be possible to obtain by representative means any authority for putting this burden on the county. As the County Down is a rich county, I do not suppose it will be a very serious burden, but I am certain that if it were as serious to the County Down as similar burdens are to counties in the West of Ireland, many of the right hon. Gentleman's own supporters would carry their opposition to it so far as to strike against a tax to which they never assented. I do not know whether the House has considered the ruinous terms on which this money has been and will be raised. The hon. Member for South Belfast (Mr. Johnston) said a little while ago that if there were a Home Rule Parliament in Ireland this money could not be raised on as good terms. I deny that entirely. On all the railways made under the Act of 1883, except the West Clare, there was a guarantee of 5 per cent., which I contend is a ridiculous guarantee to give an investor in these days. Two per cent. of that is an Imperial guarantee. I suppose that if 2 per cent. Imperial Stock were issued to-morrow it would be at about £70 for each £100. You have, therefore, only £30 left. There is a 3 per cent. baronial guarantee to cover this remaining £30. This is equivalent to saying that if the barony wanted to borrow money it would have to pay 10 per cent. for it. That is preposterous. The fact is, that under the present system such good terms cannot be obtained as could be obtained if, under a representative system, the people were able to go into the open market and get the money for themselves. I believe the Government will find that there will be considerable difficulties to contend with as a consequence of the existing guarantees. Take the case of the Cavan, Leitrim, and Roscommon Railway, the longest of the lines made under the Act of 1883. The total capital amounted to £200,000. The burden on the districts concerned is so heavy that they are almost unable to bear it, and soon they will be entirely unable to bear it. Leitrim is a poor county. A great part of it was scheduled as a congested district under the Land Purchase Bill of this Session. In part of Cavan, too, the burden is very heavy, and I have the authority of the Grand Jury of Cavan for saying that the burden upon the people is too heavy for them to bear. In a resolution sent to me by the Grand Jury, with their strong recommendation, they talk of the people as "an over-taxed and extremely poor class of small farmers residing on bad mountain land" and "who are totally unable to pay this enormous tax in addition to the ordinary county cess." Well, these men will not go on much longer endeavouring to do what the Grand Jury say they are unable to do, and the Government will find that, instead of making any more railways, they will have first to pay off the burden that they by their incompetence have thrown on these localities under the Act of 1883. The people in some parts of Ireland, where there was a guarantee under another Act, have already combined against the payment of the extra railway cess. Several men have been sent to gaol for resisting the Sheriff in attempts to resist payment of the cess, and the Government will, perhaps, find in the end that, in view of the heavy cost of the police, and the extra expenses of levying the county cess, it would have been better for the Government to have assumed part of the burden by substituting a 3 per cent. Government guarantee, and so relieving the cesspayers. The shareholders are selling their shares at considerably over par. Having invested their money on a 5 per cent. guarantee, they are now getting an enormous profit out of the poverty of the people, and I think it possible that the people may not go on very long ministering to the riches of these shareholders. No doubt the intentions of the Government are excellent. The Secretary to the Treasury thinks he is working for the good of Ireland. The Chief Secretary thinks he is providing his followers in this country with an excellent argument to use on the platforms against us. He thinks they will be able to point to the largesses he has bestowed on the people of Ireland. I think it very possible that the result of the Chief Secretary's action will not be to illustrate the great merit of his policy, but rather to show the want of merit of his proposed policy under the Land Purchase Bill. What would be the value of his guarantees under the Land Purchase Bill if it be proved by strikes against extra cess that the Government cannot levy an extra tax which has been imposed upon the people without the people's consent? I beg to move the reduction of the Vote by £200.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Item K, Light Railways, be reduced by £200."—(Mr. Knox.)

(11.35.) MR. CRILLY (Mayo, N.): I was one of the Irish Members who last year supported the passage of the Bill, in the hope that it would, to some extent, develop the resources and establish the prosperity and comfort of the poor people in the West of Mayo and the North of Mayo, whom I have the honour to represent. I have no doubt that had the Bill of last year been received by the House with a little more consideration, we who supported it might have been able to make it a better measure, and one that would have been more workable in the interest both of the poorer districts of Ireland and of the cesspayers of Ireland. However, we have to take the Bill as it stands, and I am afraid that, after having listened to the greater portion of the statement of the right hon. Gentleman, it is a case of much cry and little wool. To my mind, the scheme as he set it forth to-night, will do very little indeed in developing the resources, or in improving the position and increasing the comfort, of the people of the Western coast of Mayo. Like my hon. Friend who sits below me, I have no desire to press the right hon. Gentleman as to what arrangement he intends to make with the Chairman of the Midland Railway Company, but I would impress on him the necessity of making some early arrangement with the Midland Company, in order that the main line, which is to be constructed, if possible, under this Bill, shall be made from Ballina to Belmullet. There are only three courses open to the Government in this matter. They must run a line round the South Coast to Belmullet, or they must run a line of railway from Ballina round the coast to Belmullet, or run one direct from Ballina to Belmullet. Each of these three routes has been reported on favourably. In connection with this matter it is an extraordinary thing that the ubiquitous Mr. Barton turns up again. This Mr. Barton seems to have had a finger in every railway pie in Ireland. He reported favourably upon this line, but the Government have delayed making it, whilst they are doing their utmost to push on the two lines in which Mr. Barton and Mr. Price are themselves concerned. I know that the right hon. Gentleman is anxious to develop as much as he can the light railway system of Ireland, but I wish he would push on as rapidly as possible the arrangement he intends to make with the Midland Railway Company. The Committee will admit that a considerable time has elapsed since the Board of Works and the Treasury came together to decide as to what lines should be constructed. I do trust that the right hon. Gentleman will not allow an equally long period to elapse before he lays before the House the arrangement he has come to on behalf of the Treasury with the Midland Railway Company, because he himself will acknowledge that you cannot open out the west and north of Mayo unless by some means or other you connect Belmullet on the extreme west coast of Mayo with Ballina, or Castlebar, or some of the other towns. It is essential that Belmullet should be placed in communication with the markets where the people can find a ready sale for the fish which they catch in such large quantities.

(11.45.) MR. DILLON: I have sat here in silence for the last two hours a witness of the extraordinary spectacle of the Treasury pressing on Ireland large sums of money that have not been urgently asked for by the people. I do not oppose these grants, although to me it is most melancholy that the construction of these railways cannot be taken in hand by private enterprise. Here am I, the Representative of one of the most congested districts in Ireland. I want half a dozen railroads made. I have not opposed the scheme of the Government, and yet to my horror and despair I find my district entirely left out of consideration. I would be glad to accompany the right hon. Gentleman on a tour of the district. I would invite him to gridiron the district with railroads and spend as large a sum as possible out of the British Exchequer in opening up communication between the various villages I have the honour to represent. There cannot be the slightest doubt in the world that a more foolish measure could not possibly be adopted. The right hon. Gentleman has accused us of obstructing a beneficent Treasury. I invite him to spend £500,000 in East Mayo, where he has not proposed to spend a single shilling. My constituents are poor, and they will turn out and construct the railways. As long as they are paid decent wages for making the railways, they will make them. If you make the bribe sufficiently large and tempting they will give you any quantity of guarantees, because they know perfectly well they will not be able to pay them. I have no doubt that the Grand Jury of Mayo will guarantee 5, 6, or 10 per cent. Let the Government come forward next year and bring in a proper Bill, a reasonable proposal to open up proper communication through Northern Mayo, Eastern Mayo, Southern and Western Mayo, regardless of expense, and regardless, also, of the question whether the railroads will pay for the coal burnt or the grease which is necessary for the wheels. I venture to say that if the object of the right hon. Gentleman is to checkmate us and compel us to vote this English money, he will succeed. If he proposes to spend a quarter or even half a million sterling in Eastern Mayo on the guarantee of the cess of that district, I certainly would not find myself in a position to vote against the proposal. I do not pretend to say he would ever get the money back; but I do not find myself in a position to oppose such a scheme. I rose to protest against the Secretary to the Treasury or the Chief Secretary even complaining that we obstruct any quantity of English money being spent in Ireland. Get shovels, get all the ships of the British Navy, and shovel or ship over as much gold as you like. Pave the bogs with British sovereigns, and I shall vote with you with all my heart.

(11.50.) MR. O'HANLON (Cavan, E.): The Secretary to the Treasury spoke about railways in Donegal, but I venture to say he scarcely knew anything of what he was talking about. The Chief Secretary knows less. The Secretary to the Treasury told us about a line from Donegal to Killybegs. He spoke of great advantages that would accrue to the fishing industry.

What can be gained by a line of railway along the sea coast? He spoke of other lines. He mentioned, for instance, a line from Letterkenny, but he gave us no particulars. Still, the right hon. Gentleman and the Chief Secretary receive the pay of the nation; for what? For doing nothing but making statements to the British public about something of which they know nothing. It is astonishing that the English people can with patience listen to such statements as are constantly made from the Treasury Bench. The Chief Secretary delivered a speech upon this Vote, but did not wait five minutes to hear the discussion. Will any hon. Gentleman tell me the Secretary to the Treasury or the Chief Secretary know anything of what they have been talking about? The noes have it. I believe the object the Chief Secretary had in bringing this matter before the House was to see if we would offer any opposition, so that the Unionist Member for South Tyrone and other parts of Ireland could go to Ireland and say that the Nationalist Members opposed the light railway scheme. We are not going to give the scheme any opposition, but we are going to tell the country and the world that the gentlemen whose duty it is to give information to the House know nothing of what they have been talking about. I do not think there is any use in me wasting the time of the House, but I could not remain silent when I heard such statements as those made from the Treasury Bench.

*(11.57.) MR. JACKSON: In answer to a question of the hon. and learned Member for Longford, let me say that the lines which join other railways will be of the usual gauge, but that the others will be of a narrower gauge.

Question put, and negatived.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—REPORT.

Resolution [July 17th], reported [see page 103.]

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House doth agree with the Committee in the said Resolution."

MR. T. M. HEALY: May I ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he has yet got the Fermoy depositions in the case of David Kent? We asked yesterday if the right hon. Gentleman's statement was borne out by the depositions. We were promised that they should be telegraphed for, and I ask if they have been received; if not, it would be only reasonable to postpone the Report of this Vote to Monday.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN, Dublin University): As a matter of fact, they have not yet been received, but I hope to have them to-morrow or Monday.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Will the right hon. Gentleman have any objection to postpone the Vote?

MR. FLYNN: It is essential that we should have the depositions. The question is important. When we addressed an interrogation to the right hon. Gentleman on the subject, we were met with a denial of the accuracy of our statement, and a promise was made or implied that we should have a copy of the depositions. The case was heard on Monday, and we could have had the depositions here by Wednesday or Thursday. It is important to have them.

MR. T. M. HEALY: We do not wish to press the matter unreasonably—

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If there is any strong desire we will not resist a postponement to Monday, but we are not sure that we shall have the depositions by then.

MR. T. M. HEALY: No doubt they will be here if telegraphed for.

Order deferred till Monday next.

CONSOLIDATED FUND (No. 2) BILL.

Bill read the third time, and passed. [New Title.]

COURSE OF BUSINESS.

On the Motion for Adjournment:—

MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): Can the right hon. Gentleman say when the Scotch Estimates will be taken?

SIR W. LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth): And the Local Taxation Bill?

*THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I cannot say when the Scotch Estimates will be taken. The Housing of the Working Classes Bill and the Census Bill will be taken on Monday. I cannot say when the Local Taxation Bill will be taken.

DR. TANNER: Can the right hon. Gentleman inform us whether there is any truth in the report that the 2nd Battalion Grenadier Guards is going to be sent to Natal?

*MR. JACKSON: I have no knowledge on the point.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): Can the Chancellor of the Exchequer state his intention with regard to the Committee on the fiscal relations between England and Ireland?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I should be extremely glad if the hon. Member would use his influence towards assisting us to the appointment of the Committee. The chief Amendment in the way is that of a Welsh Member. It is impossible for us to assent to the separation of Wales from the rest of the United Kingdom in this connection; and if this Amendment were not pressed, we might dispose of the matter in a short discussion after 12 o'clock. I am very anxious to get the Committee appointed.

MR. SEXTON: I share the desire of the right hon. Gentleman, but of course I am not in a position to make any promise on behalf of the hon. Member for Glamorgan. May I suggest that there would be no difficulty if the Motion were taken at a time to allow of a short Debate?

*MR. H. J. WILSON (York, W.R., Holmfirth): May I ask if the Industrial Schools Bill is to be withdrawn? I understand that the Under Secretary has given some intimation to that effect.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. STUART WORTLEY, Sheffield, Hallam): My right hon. Friend informs me that it is not his intention to ask the House to proceed with the Bill.

*MR. H. J. WILSON: Then why keep it on the Papers?

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): As probably there will be only short discussions upon the Housing of the Working Classes Bill and the Census Bill, perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will say what is to be proposed as the next business on Monday?

MR. GOSCHEN: The Savings Banks Bill and then Report of Supply.

MR. SEXTON: With your leave, Sir, may I ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he intends to allow his Motion on the fiscal relations between this country and Ireland to become abortive because of the notice of Amendment given by a Welsh Member? Will he take no steps to secure a discussion?

MR. GOSCHEN: If it can be reached on Monday by half-past 11, I will arrange to bring on the Motion then, but beyond that I cannot pledge myself.

SIR W. LAWSON: If he cannot fix a day for the Local Taxation Bill, will the right hon. Gentleman make a statement on Monday as to the disposal of the surplus money?

MR. GOSCHEN: Yes; I hope on Monday to make a statement as to the intentions of the Government with regard to the unapplied surplus caused by the withdrawal of certain portions of this Bill.

MR. STUART WORTLEY: The hon. Member who asked me a question just now will understand that my remark referred only to the Industrial Schools Bill.

House adjourned at a quarter after Twelve o'clock, till Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, 21st July, 1890.

THE EARL OF MAYO

Took the Oath.

COLONIAL COURTS OF ADMIRALTY
BILL—(No. 44.)

Returned from the Commons agreed to, with an Amendment.

REGISTRATION OF VOTERS (BOROUGH OF BELFAST) BILL—(No. 91.)Commons Amendment to Lords Amendment considered, and agreed to.

CONSOLIDATED FUND (No. 2) BILL.

Brought from the Commons; read 1^a; to be read 2^a To-morrow; and Standing Orders Nos. XXXIX. and XLV. to be considered in order to their being dispensed with.—(The Marquess of Salisbury.)ELECTRIC LIGHTING PROVISIONAL
ORDERS CONFIRMATION (No. 15)
BILL.

A Bill to confirm certain Provisional Orders made by the Board of Trade under the Electric Lighting Acts, 1882 and 1888, relating to the City of London—Was presented by the Lord Balfour.

*THE SECRETARY TO THE BOARD OF TRADE (Lord BALFOUR of BURLEIGH): My Lords, I beg to present a Bill to confirm certain Provisional Orders which have been made by the Board of Trade under the Electric Lighting Acts relating to the City of London; and, in pursuance of the notice which stands in my name on the Paper, I have to ask the House to suspend the Sessional Order of the 10th March last, and to allow the Bill to be read a first time. The circumstances are these: The Brush Electric Engineering Company and another syndicate applied for Provisional Orders, authorising them to supply electricity in the City of London. At first the Local Authority, that body being the Commissioners of Sewers, objected to it, but after a time they agreed to let certain portions of the City be so supplied under an agreement with the parties concerned. The agreement was not one which the Board of Trade could make the subject of a Provisional Order, and, therefore, all the complicated arrangements which are necessitated in adjusting a Provisional Order had to be gone through. Although the period of the year was somewhat late, the Board of Trade, desiring to carry out the wishes expressed, thought it was their duty to proceed with the Order. It took somewhat longer than was anticipated, but it has been completed, and under all the circumstances, and, as I may say, this will be the last time I shall have to ask your Lordships for indulgence in regard to the Sessional Orders this year, I hope your Lordships will agree to suspend the Sessional Order and to read the Bill a first time.

Moved, "That the Sessional Order of the 10th of March last, 'That no Bill originating in this House confirming any Provisional Order or Provisional Certificate shall be read a first time after Friday, the 16th day of May next,' be dispensed with in respect of the said Bill, and that the Bill be now read 1^a;" agreed to: Bill read 1^a accordingly; to be printed; and referred to the Examiners."

PHARMACY ACT (IRELAND) (1875)
AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 172.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

*THE EARL OF ERNE: The objects of the Bill which I am now asking your Lordships to read a second time, and which I may say has passed the House of Commons practically without opposition, are two-fold: the first is to provide for the registration of chemists and druggists in Ireland, for the purpose of their selling poisons, who were in business before 1889, and for the examination of all persons who shall desire to become such henceforth. The second object is to give those chemists and druggists representation upon the Pharmaceutical Council, which they do not at present possess. The original Pharmacy Act, passed in the year 1875, contemplated two grades; the first grade to pass the higher examination and to be empowered to compound medicines, as well as to sell poisons: the second grade to pass a modified examination, and to be qualified to sell poisons only. But, in consequence of the absence of a restrictive clause in the Act, it was found that if the second-class were registered they would be entitled to do all that the first-class could do, that is to say, to compound medicines as well as sell poisons; and, in consequence, the Pharmaceutical Society of that day passed a resolution that, for the present at all events, there should only be one grade. After the passing of that Act nothing practically was done until the year 1888. In that year a Bill was introduced into Parliament by a Member of your Lordships' House, at whose sudden death all those who had the privilege of his friendship were deeply shocked and grieved, and whose loss has been keenly felt by all who are interested in Irish affairs, upon which he was so high an authority. I allude to the late Lord Milltown. He introduced a Bill in that year which passed through this House after having been referred to a Select Committee; but when it went down to the House of Commons it was opposed as being of too restrictive a character, and, after some negotiation, a compromise was effected, but unfortunately the period of the Session at which this compromise was arrived at was so late that the Bill had to be dropped. The Bill which I am now asking your Lordships to read a second time is mainly drawn upon the lines of that compromise. The necessity for this Bill arises from the defective nature of the Act of 1875, under which the Pharmaceutical Council considered they were prevented from registering the second grade, as was contemplated in the Act. In consequence of this condition of things a number of chemists and druggists throughout Ireland are carrying on the sale of poisons at their own peril, and are liable to prosecution; and I believe, in more than one instance, prosecutions are pending against members of that body. It may be said that the pharmaceutical chemists can supply the want which is admittedly felt; but the pharmaceutical chemists are of a superior class, and are only to be found in the large towns, and it is, of course, of very great importance to the small farmers who are scattered up and down through the country that they should be able to buy their cattle medicines and sheep wash, and things of that kind—and also I may add that the same remark applies to the manufacturers in the North of Ireland in regard to their requirements in the way of chemicals for bleaching purposes, which are more or less in the nature of poisons—without having to go to the pharmaceutical chemists in the large towns. I believe that the chief objection which is taken to this Bill is in reference to the provisions for the registration of these chemists and druggists for the sale of poisons without their having to pass an examination. But I venture to suggest that that is really a matter for Committee, and if your Lordships will be good enough to give a Second Reading to this Bill it can there be more minutely considered and better dealt with. I beg to move the Second Reading of the Bill.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."
—(The Lord Fermanagh [E. Erne].)

*THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD (who spoke, by leave of the House, sitting): My Lords, as I take great interest in the Bill which has been brought forward by the noble Earl, I would venture to say a few words upon it. It is a much more important Bill than the noble Earl has led your Lordships to suppose. This Bill has really the intention of permitting any man throughout Ireland who chooses to call himself a chemist or druggist to act in that capacity without an examination. There was an Act passed, called the Pharmacy Act, in 1875, by which it was enacted that after that time all persons who wished to carry on the trade of a chemist should pass an examination. Unfortunately that Act was not very carefully drawn, and there was no proper provision made for registering chemists and druggists in practice before 1875. Well, that made it most difficult for the Pharmaceutical Society of Ireland, who look after such matters, to ascertain (because the onus of proof rested upon them) who were the people who were entitled to carry on this trade without examination. There was another flaw in this Act of Parliament. It provided for an arrangement by which two grades could be created in Ireland, the members of one of which were to be pharmaceutical chemist. I believe the Act was drawn by Sir Michael Hicks Beach in 1875, and he arranged to make it as much like the English Act as possible. In England, both classes pass an examination that would entitle them to have the making up of prescriptions; the procedure in Ireland is rather different from that in England. The men who had been in the habit of selling poisons did not seek to be allowed to make up prescriptions, and they did not want to pass an examination, and they wished to continue as before. This Bill now provides that everybody who has been breaking the law since 1875 should be recognised and should be allowed to continue to sell poisons without examination. I can hardly believe that your Lordships will agree to such a proposal as that. The noble Earl suggested that the Bill might be amended in Committee; and I hope sincerely that it will be, because if there were not a promise of that kind made I should most decidedly move the rejection of the Bill. Perhaps your Lordships can hardly imagine the difficulties which would occur from the recognition of such a state of things as exists at present in Ireland, where such men as grocers, hucksters, dealers, and iron-mongers are all selling poisons. A grocer may be serving out pounds of butter having beside it oxalic acid on the same shelf, and another man may be selling baking powder which is lying beside arsenic. These men are all perfectly unqualified, they pass no examination whatever, and this Bill is to legalise them and perpetuate the mischief. What I should propose would be that the Bill should be amended very much in Committee. I may tell your Lordships that the Act of 1875 did legalise and permit such men as these to sell poisons without examination if in practice before 1875, but they had been in the habit of doing it and had some experience. Since 1875 a large number of men have taken up the trade, and are selling poisons indiscriminately all over Ireland. The noble Earl spoke of the desirability of small farmers being able to get poisons for cattle and sheep washes, but in these days, with the existence of the Parcels Post, there is no difficulty in people getting whatever they want from the pharmaceutical chemists in the towns. The noble Earl said that this Bill is virtually the same as the compromise measure of the Earl of Milltown, but I cannot quite agree with him.

*THE EARL OF ERNE: I said as altered in the House of Commons.

*THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD: I cannot agree with the noble Earl, because that was in the direction of registration on examination, and the point of this Bill is no examination. One of the main points of that Bill was that examination should be enforced. Therefore on the main point that measure differed materially from this Bill. A general practitioner from Belfast, Mr. Rankin, gave very important evidence before Lord Milltown's Committee upon this point. He said that if men of this description, hucksters, grocers, and men of that description, were allowed to sell poisons throughout Ireland it would imperil the lives of the public. I think your Lordships will agree with that, that it certainly would imperil the lives of the public. But to my astonishment I find that Mr. Rankin is one of the promoters of this Bill, and the fact is that Mr. Rankin himself has been carrying on the sale of poisons against the law, and was not very long ago brought up before the Magistrates in Belfast and fined £5 for so doing. Hence, I believe, one of the reasons why this Bill has been brought forward is, Mr. Rankin is Secretary of the Druggists' Association in Belfast. I have also seen a paragraph in a paper which is called the British and Colonial Druggists' paper, I forget its exact title, in which it is suggested that the druggists throughout Ireland should begin to make up prescriptions; that is to say, that these men who pass no examination and have no knowledge whatever of the subject should begin to make up prescriptions, in order to cause the Pharmaceutical Society to prosecute them all, and thus, as the Pharmaceutical Society has but a small amount of fund at their disposal, that they should break the Pharmaceutical Society, and by doing so get themselves recognised. That shows the animus with which this Bill is brought forward. I am told that the great misfortune in Ireland is that the police do not prosecute those men who are breaking the law. I believe that in England in the analogous cases of the sale of adulterated foods or anything of that kind the police do prosecute. There was evidence before Lord Milltown's Committee of a case of poisoning which occurred before 1886 being brought before the attention of the police, and where the police refused to prosecute. I think it is a very serious matter that this illegal practice should have been going on in Ireland of selling poisons indiscriminately all over the country, and that yet you should have the police taking no notice of it whatever. The Pharmaceutical Society no doubt do prosecute, but the onus of proof rests with that Society, and their funds have only enabled them to bring forward very few cases where they could institute prosecutions. This is a very serious matter, and I think the Irish Government ought to take notice of it. There are certain points which I think ought to be amended in this Bill, but I will not detain your Lordships with them now; I will only express the hope that the noble Earl will agree to the amendment of those points when the Bill comes into Committee.

LORD HERSCHELL: My Lords, my attention was only called to this Bill this morning, but I have received some letters and a telegram of rather an alarming character with regard to its provisions. It comes no doubt from a source from which one would not have expected correspondence of that description. One correspondent alleges that—

And I am sure that everyone will agree that is not a good thing for the Government to do in regard to Ireland either at the present or at any other time. Another correspondent writes—

“It is very hard that political services, such as have been rendered to the Conservative Party by wholesale chemists and druggists, should be rewarded at the expense of the public morality and by danger to the public safety in the manner proposed.”

Those two quotations show, I think, that this Bill will require very careful consideration, the necessity for which has been added to by the details which have been entered into by the noble Marquess who has just spoken.

THE DUKE OF ABERCORN: I do not rise for the purpose of assisting to raise any controversy upon this Bill, but to emphasise that it is an important measure, affecting Ireland very materially as to the sale of poisons. I do not know but that there would be some difficulty in regard to people selling whatever may be required near the large towns, but in the country that is not the case. There there is no difficulty in obtaining them, and therefore it has been thought necessary that this Bill should be brought in for the purpose of licensing this large class of persons, some 2,000 in number, I think, to sell poisons. This Bill has met with some opposition from the Pharmaceutical Society, but that body does not wish that the Bill should not pass. On the contrary, they are anxious that it should become law; but they are also anxious that it should only pass with certain Amendments which they will propose at a fitting time. The Amendments which they propose refer to the number of chemists and druggists who have been practising since 1875 under the old Act, and they think that if those persons are to be registered they should pass a very small examination, in order to prove their fitness to sell these poisons and dangerous drugs. Another Amendment which they wish to be introduced is as to the position of their Council. But these matters will, I hope, be gone into in detail in Committee, and I should venture to hope that the noble Earl who is at the head of Irish affairs in this House might be willing that this Bill should be referred to the Standing Committee, where all the Amendments that may be proposed can be fully gone into. But, whatever may happen, your Lordships will agree with me, I think, that poisons should not be permitted to be sold in Ireland in this way at a wholesale rate. Although my noble and learned Friend seemed to think that the Conservative Party owe something to those who had to do with the selling of poisons, I hope no bad result has taken place from it. At the same time, if poisons are allowed to be sold without restriction wholesale all over the country, great harm might be done, persons might disappear on such occasions, and it would then be rather hard to find out whence the poisons had been derived. Therefore, I think the restrictions which the Pharmaceutical Society desire should be placed on the sale of poisons will receive due consideration when the Bill comes before the Committee.

*LORD MORRIS: I should not have intervened in this discussion had it not been for the suggestion of my noble and learned Friend opposite, that this Bill has been promoted for the advantage of persons in the Conservative interest in Belfast, because I have been asked to oppose it on the opposite ground. I have been asked to oppose the Bill on the ground that it has been supported by the Member for Belfast, who represents Nationalist views, and from the fact that some of his colleagues who had given notice of opposition had been solicited to withdraw, and did withdraw, their notices of opposition. So that it appears persons have been asked to oppose this Bill, and solicited to do so from a variety of motives. It appears to me that the Bill ought to be allowed to pass the Second Reading, and that in Standing Committee all the modifications that may be necessary in it can be there made.

*THE LORD PRIVY SEAL (Earl CADOGAN): My Lords, I was under the impression that the Bill was for a very technical purpose and of a somewhat dull character; but after the statement of my noble and learned Friend opposite there appears to be some fear that if this Debate should be prolonged we should be landed in a discussion more exciting than was to be expected. I rise merely to say that the Bill has received the countenance and support of the Government in the other House. It is the result of a compromise which was effected between certain Members of the other House last Session upon Amendments on the Bill of Lord Milltown. As far as the principle of the Bill is concerned, the Government is prepared on the present occasion also to support it. On the other hand, I am bound to say that the points which have been mentioned by the noble Marquess behind and others certainly seem to render it desirable that the Bill should receive careful consideration in Committee. I should be very glad that the suggestion of the noble Duke should be adopted, and, if it be the wish of the House, that the Bill should be referred to the Standing Committee on General Bills, when the Amendments which have been mentioned by my noble Friend can be carefully taken into consideration.

*THE EARL OF ERNE: I am quite prepared to accede to the suggestion of my noble Friend that this Bill, if your Lordships will consent to read it a second time, should be referred to the Standing Committee on General Bills.

On Question, agreed to.

Bill read 2^d accordingly, and committed to the Standing Committee for General Bills.

SETTLED LAND BILL.—(No. 185.)

House in Committee (on Re-commitment) (according to order).

Clause 4.

LORD HERSCHELL: I have to propose an Amendment in this clause which is little more than verbal. It is to meet a doubt which has been raised by my noble and learned Friend Lord Selborne in Standing Committee, whether this clause might not cover, and ought not to cover, arrangements where money has been advanced, and where, therefore, the arrangement made is part of the security.

Moved, to insert in line 15, after "arrangement," the words "not being a security for the payment of money advanced."—(The Lord Herschell.)—Agreed to.

Clause 11.

LORD HERSCHELL: I have to move to add at the end of this clause a sub-section to define incumbrances, so as to exclude determinable, annual, and other sums, which were clearly not intended to be included in its terms; but before doing so I have an Amendment to move in line 23, after the word "required," to insert the words "and also the amount properly required for payment of the costs of the transaction." That is in cases where mortgages are consolidated and arrangements made for the payment of a lower rate of interest.

Amendment agreed to.

Another Amendment moved, at the end of the clause to insert the following sub-section:—

"Incumbrance in this section does not include any annual sum payable only during a life or lives or during a term of years absolute or determinable.—(The Lord Herschell.)—Agreed to.

Clause 13.

THE EARL OF FEVERSHAM: The Amendment of which I have given notice, or the substance of it, was proposed in the Standing Committee on Law by the noble and learned Lord who introduced this Bill. His Amendment did not meet with the full concurrence of the Committee, and I have now to propose an Amendment which I think is a very important addition to that which was proposed by my noble and learned Friend, namely, a proviso limiting the power of tenants for life to raise money under this clause to the amount of half the rental of the estates. I think it should be borne in mind that the Act of 1882, which is generally called, I believe, Lord Cairns' Act, was brought forward very much in connection with the Act which had been passed in the year 1864 for giving powers to limited owners to raise money for the purpose of making permanent improvements upon their estates. Under the Act of 1864 a great variety of objects could be attained by limited owners, but it did not include, among the permanent improvements provided for, the restoration of the mansion house or residence of the owner of the property. But in the year 1871 an Act was passed to which I should wish to call your Lordships' attention, namely, the Limited Owners Residences Act, which gave the same powers as were given by the Act of 1864 to limited owners to raise money for the re-building of their houses. The Limited Owners Residences Act, 1871, enables a tenant-for-life to re-build the mansion house under the powers of the Improvements of Lands Act, 1864, with which Act it is incorporated, and the Act of 1871 enacts that the re-building of a mansion house is to be deemed to be an improvement within the meaning of the Improvements of Lands Act of 1864. The other improvements within the meaning of that Act are all introduced in the Settled Land Act of 1882; but the provisions of the Act of 1871 were, unfortunately, excluded from the provisions of the Act of 1882. The result is that that improvement which was introduced in the Act of 1871, and incorporated into the Act of 1864 was excluded in 1882, and, therefore, all the benefits which accrued from the Settled Lands Act of 1882 are lost entirely as regards the Act of 1871. I have said that under the Act of 1882 a limited owner can sell his property, or can sell a portion of his land, and expend the proceeds in a variety of ways; he can spend it in irrigation, in draining, in plantation, in the building of cottages, in the building of homesteads, and in building farm-houses. He can do a great many other things; he can build for a good many other people; but there is one thing he cannot do, and that is he cannot build a house for himself. Well, my Lords, the question is, Is it fair, is it just, to have excluded this provision, which was incorporated in the Act of 1871, from the provisions of the Act of 1882; and now that your Lordships have an opportunity of re-enacting and bringing this improvement back again, of incorporating it with the provisions of the Act of 1864, and assimilating it to the other improvements which were included in the Act of 1882, I would humbly suggest that it ought to be taken advantage of. The noble and learned Lord opposite evidently thought that this was an opportunity of doing so, that it was in conformity with the principles of this Bill that this Amendment should be introduced. I have brought it down, I think, to very small dimensions. I am only asking that a limited owner shall be able to raise by the sale of land to the amount of as much as one-half the rental of his property for the purpose of effecting this very important object of permanent improvement. It is said by those who are opposed to this that it will discourage insurance. I must say I do not propose it with any idea of that kind. It is a great deal too small an addition to the powers given to act as a discouragement to insurance, and I propose it not at all to discourage, but as a supplement to, insurance. We know perfectly well when a house is destroyed by fire there is not only the loss of the fabric, but there is the loss of contents. Does the insurance meet that loss? When you come to counting the cost of restoration the insurance very rarely covers the loss, and I think this Amendment would give great assistance to those who, like myself, have had the misfortune to lose their houses, and are still under the obligation to restore them. Those who are connected with the agricultural interest, and who are dependent on the soil, know well that this country has passed through a period of great depression, and I think that every assistance which Parliament can give to relieve both landowners and tenants from the effects of that depression should be given. It is said, and I cordially agree in the statement, that property has its duties as well as its rights. A landowner to perform his duties must reside upon his property. Absenteeism is one of the evils which statesmen and Parliament have had to deal with in regard to Ireland. We do not want absenteeism here; it is an evil which we wish to avoid. In order that a man may reside upon his property he must have a house in which he can live, in order that he may perform those duties which devolve upon him. It is to assist in that object that I now propose this Amendment should be adopted in the name of my noble and learned Friend opposite, which I believe to be just and fair, and one which, I think, on grounds of public policy worthy the support of your Lordships' House.

(iv.) "The re-building of the principal mansion house on the settled land; provided that the sum to be applied under this sub-section shall not exceed one-half of the annual rental of the settled land."—(The Earl of Feversham.)

THE MARQUESS OF BATH: I trust your Lordships will not agree to the Amendment which has been moved by my noble Friend. This matter was considered in the Standing Committee to which the Bill was referred, and the Standing Committee did not think fit to recommend this Amendment to the House. Let me call your Lordships' attention to this point: it is the duty of every wise man to insure his house, and if he does not insure it, it is on him and not on the inheritance that the burden ought to fall. Then your Lordships should bear in mind also this: that a property is not improved by increasing the mortgages upon it. The powers of charging estates under Lord Cairns's Act are thought by some to be of doubtful expediency, and they are only justified on the ground that you charge the estate for re-productive work. It is supposed, and I hope the supposition will prove true, that precautions are taken that the money which the tenant for life is empowered to charge upon the inheritance is so laid out that the value and the proceeds of the inheritance will be in future increased. Now, I will ask how the inheritance can be in any way benefited by the building of a mansion house? Clearly it is the duty of the tenant for life to insure, and it is his duty to re-build, if he chooses to re-build, should his house be burned down. But the increasing of charges upon the inheritance for works that are not in themselves re-productive must end in the ruin of properties, and be of no sort of benefit to the community. I have every sympathy with my noble Friend who has had this very misfortune, having had a house burned down some years ago, which is now in course of re-building, but I do not think the laws of the land ought to be altered to suit the convenience of Members of your Lordships' House.

*THE EARL OF POWIS: This Amendment is somewhat vaguely worded. It says that the sum to be applied under this sub-section "shall not exceed one-half of the annual rental of the settled land." Now, what does the "settled land" mean? Does it mean the estate which surrounds the house, or does it mean any property the owner may possess in half a dozen counties which may be under the same settlement? Does it mean that money may be raised upon, or part of an estate in Devonshire sold to improve a house in Northumberland, or that money may be raised upon property in Derbyshire to improve or re-build a house in Leicestershire? The noble Earl spoke of this power not having been given in the Lands Improvement Act. I think if any money is to be raised on an estate for re-building a mansion-house it ought to be done under similar arrangements to those specified in the Estates Improvement Act, namely, that it should be paid back by instalments within a certain number of years; because clearly the restoration or re-building of a house does not add to the improvement of an estate: it is simply putting it in the same position as it was in before, which would be guarded by insurance. And it very often happens that the building of a mansion house, under the direction of a lavish architect, makes the house a burden to the estate which it is not able to bear. I think, therefore, that this clause, if it is to be adopted at all, would have to be limited, and that it should, at all events, be made more distinct that the land that is to be brought in and charged with the re-building of the mansion house should be the property upon which the mansion house is situate. I feel disposed to concur with the noble Marquess that it would be better to maintain the decision of the Standing Committee.

LORD NORTON : There seems to be a considerable amount of caprice in the arguments which have been put forward on this subject. I believe that until lately if a man over insured his house and it was burnt down he was in danger of being hung ; and now it seems if a man under insures his house it is an argument to be used against him that he ought not to be able to charge his estate for the restoration. I had an experience the other day in having my house burned down, and I had insured it as far as I might safely do without endangering my neck under the law. I have, therefore, to meet the over expense of re-building the house by loan. The noble Marquess says such a charge ought not to be thrown on the estate, but it bears just as much on the estate to make up the sum required for re-building the house by loan, as by the charge possible, if this Bill passed. The noble Marquess says that a Bill should not be passed for the benefit of Members of this House, but it is not at all exclusively for the benefit of Members of this House that this Bill is proposed, but for all people who have houses with settled estates round them which may be burnt down. The noble Earl near me says he does not understand what "settled estate" the Bill means to charge ; whether it means if a man has property in half-a-dozen counties he is to be empowered to charge to the amount of half the rent of all his estates for the restoration of his house. I quite understand that what the noble Earl who moves the Amendment means is that the property surrounding the mansion house burnt down should bear the cost up to half the rental. That seems to me to be a very moderate proposition. I do not suppose that any mansion house which is burnt down is insured to such an extent, or can be safely insured to such an extent as that the very moderate sum of half a year's rental of the property adjoining the mansion would not be a fair amount to contribute to such restoration.

The Earl of Powis

THE LORD CHANCELLOR : My Lords, I did not mean to intervene in this interesting discussion, but I must say I am rather astonished by what my noble Friend, who has just spoken, has said. I was not aware that it was an offence in law to insure your house to its full value, and until the noble Lord points out the statute to which his statement would seem to have reference, I shall still remain under the impression which I hold that such insurance is a prudent, a proper, and an ordinary thing to effect.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY : I will only add one sentence. I see no objection to "re-building ;" but I confess that "restoration" somewhat frightens me. Restoration is a term which is usually applied in the case of churches and buildings of an ecclesiastical character, and is generally understood to mean the destruction of the ancient character of a building, and in the case of a mansion house I should be very sorry that it should be done at the expense of the estate. I very much doubt whether it would not be better to confine it to re-building.

THE EARL OF FEVERSHAM : I shall be perfectly willing to accept the suggestion of my noble Friend.

A noble LORD : My noble Friends have attempted to raise a discussion on the principle of the Bill, but even if we could do so I think it would not be expedient upon re-commitment. I should view the Bill very differently according to whether it was to be regarded as a final measure or as a compromise, in other words, what is popularly called "the thin end of the wedge." But I am quite sure it is not introduced in that sense by the noble and learned Lord, Lord Herschell ; and if it was to be one of a series of measures of this sort I am quite sure he would tell us so. I had the honour of being upon a Committee with that noble and learned Lord, and I must say, if I may be allowed, he showed so much consideration for the objections of his opponents, and of delicate feeling for the views of those with whom he did not altogether agree, that it will always be a satisfaction to me to, if possible, meet him half way. Taking this Bill, then, in the sense of being a final measure, and not in the way of a compromise, I will say that I should not oppose it if it came to a vote. But I object to the principle of this legislation on two grounds. I think the Bill so far from attaining the object desired, as it is regarded outside, frustrates it. I am not in the least speaking now of the motive of the noble and learned Lord in introducing the Bill, and very likely he knows of special cases where it may be of urgent importance on grounds of expense and practical convenience in cases of small properties of perhaps 25 acres; but there is a large section of the public who support legislation in this direction under the idea that it will facilitate the extension of land holding and the multiplication of freehold lodgings. Mr. Alm, before the Allotments Committee, said that was the ground of his support of the Land Transfer Bill. I would ask your Lordships to consider for a moment what is the most likely way in which these multiplications of holdings can be brought about in the way of sale; and I say, unhesitatingly, that it is in cases where the mansion and demesne are reserved. Where the mansion and demesne are sold, they pass away from the proprietor, whose family has, perhaps, held them for generations, it may be to some capitalist; whereas, if there is a reservation of the mansion and demesne, there is no reason why the land outside should not be sold in separate lots and to different persons. It is not the majority of those who support legislation of this kind who would wish to see the manors of England dismantled, or the parks, which are the distinguishing feature of the landscapes of England, destroyed and broken up. Wherever the mansion and demesne are reserved there is always a chance given to a family which has held the estate of recovering its position and maintaining itself in the locality where it has existed, perhaps, for centuries. Of course, the Bill is promoted in the interest of landowners, and it is so far of advantage to them that they will be in a better position to maintain their mansions. It occurs to me that where there is a difference between the tenant for life and the Trustees in nine cases out of 10 the members of the family are in favour of the retention of the mansion and demesne, and are with the Trustees as against the individual; and I say, in this legislation you are sacrificing the family to the individual. Those are the grounds upon which, though I should not vote against the Bill upon the principle, I should not vote for it as it is introduced before your Lordships' House by the noble Earl.

On Question, their Lordships divided :
—Contents 22 ; Not-Contents 21.

Resolved in the affirmative.

*THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY : I would make one suggestion to the noble and learned Lord. It may be unnecessary, because the Court, as I understand, has to approve of these schemes, and it might, perhaps, deal with the matter; but it is quite obvious, supposing an insurance upon the house which has been burned down, it would not be reasonable for the tenant for life to put the money in his pocket and raise the amount upon the estate necessary for the purpose of re-building the house. It ought, I think, to be made clear that the money received from the Insurance Company should go as far as necessary towards the re-building of the house, and that if sufficient for entirely re-building the house, no money ought to be raised. That ought certainly to be made plain.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR : I think so too, and also that the calamity must have happened—that the house must have been burnt down; because otherwise the tenant for life might pull down the house by way of improvement, and re-build it at the expense of the remainder man.

*THE EARL OF POWIS : I would suggest to the noble Lord in charge of the Bill that the power should be limited to the estate on which the house is situate.

EARL CADOGAN : As the word "rental" is used in the Bill, I would ask, Does that mean gross or net rental?

LORD HERSCHELL : With regard to the noble Earl's suggestion, I am not sure that the security against what has been pointed out would not arise in this way. These are improvements within the meaning of the original Act, and Section 26 of that Act provides that—

"Where the tenant for life is desirous that capital money arising under this Act shall be applied in or towards payment for an improvement authorised by this Act, he may submit for approval to the Trustees of the Settlement or to the Court, as the case may require, a scheme for the execution of the improvement, showing the proposed expenditure thereon."

So that the tenant for life would not be able to expend the money at his own pleasure without a scheme. Probably in that way he would be prevented doing what the noble Earl has suggested. With regard to its being confined to the particular estate, I apprehend the power ought to be confined; but I suppose the Court would see that it was an estate settled to similar uses to that for which the mansion house existed. It would not do for some remainderman to expend the money raised from one estate upon another estate. That ought obviously to be guarded against. If it were confined to estates settled to the same uses, I do not know that there would be any harm. The remainderman would be the same, although the money would not arise from the same piece of land as that surrounding the principal mansion house. I take it, it would be better for the remainderman, as a rule, because he would get the estate with the mansion house upon the estate habitable instead of ruinous. That is the advantage he gets out of it.

Report of Amendments to be received on Thursday next: and Bill to be printed, as amended. (No. 212.)

AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 152.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

LORD MACNAGHTEN: My Lords, this Bill has passed the House of Commons, as I understand, with the assent of the Government. It proposes to amend one clause in the Customs Consolidation Act, 1876, which defines the penalty attaching to vessels for breach of the Revenue Laws. As that section at present stands, the penalty is forfeiture, whatever may be the size or value of the vessel. This Bill proposes to substitute a fine in the case of vessels of 250 tons burden and over. I beg to move the Second Reading of the Bill, and that it be referred to the Committee on Law.

Bill read 2^a (according to order), and committed to the Standing Committee for Bills relating to Law, &c.

Lord Herschell

PAUPER LUNATIC ASYLUMS (IRELAND) (OFFICERS' SUPERANNUATION) BILL.—(No. 209.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

LORD DE ROS: In asking your Lordships to give a Second Reading to this Bill, I will merely say that it has received the sanction of the other House of Parliament, and also of Her Majesty's Government. It is for the purpose of benefiting a class of persons, the officers and servants of pauper lunatic asylums in Ireland, who have a very great amount of wear and tear, and whose duties require the exercise of a great amount of humanity and discretion in performing them. The Bill provides that the Governors may, at their discretion, recommend certain sums to be given to the officers or servants when incapacitated by sickness, age, or infirmity, or who have attained the age of 50, and have been in the Asylums not less than 15 years. That recommendation is to be approved by one of the Inspectors, and is to receive eventually the sanction of the Lord President in Council. I hope your Lordships will grant a Second Reading to this Bill.

Bill read 2^a (according to order), and committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

COMMITTEE OF SELECTION FOR STANDING COMMITTEES.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

QUESTIONS.

CROFTERS IN SOUTH UIST.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH (Invernessshire): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether he is aware that the large island of South Uist is divided the one half and richer among 12 farmers, and the other and poorer among 1,250 families; that the Crofters have been in use to gather for sale the perishable commodity of sea ware called tangles, not only on the shores of their own lands, but also on those of the large farmers, without let or hindrance; but that, so soon as the Crofters, who had formerly considered themselves bound to sell to the proprietrix, understood they were entitled to free market, and began their operations this season in usual form, the proprietrix instigated some of the larger tenants, who do not themselves engage in the work, to interdict the Crofters from pursuing their occupation, and has in her own and their name instituted process to this effect in the highest and most expensive legal Court in Scotland; whether he is aware that, at a great open-air meeting held at Daliburgh on the 16th of June, the people loudly complained of their treatment, and demanded legislative redress; and whether he will take steps to legislate for the relief of the people primarily interested, and against the closing of a valuable chemical trade?

A LORD OF THE TREASURY (Sir H. MAXWELL, Wigtonshire): I have been requested by my right hon. and learned Friend to answer this question. I am informed that it is not the fact that the Crofters have been in use to gather tangles on the shores of South Uist; nor is it the fact that they have sold the tangles to the proprietor. The industry, which is comparatively of modern growth, has always been conducted by the proprietor of the foreshore on the island, who pays to those Crofters employed to gather the tangles the whole proceeds under deduction of expense of supervision and incidental outgoings, and these Crofters are under no obligation to work if they are dissatisfied with the remuneration the proprietor is able to give them. I am further informed that some months ago some Crofters asserted a right to enter upon and use a farm for gathering and drying tangles. An interdict has been brought against them and is now sub judice. I believe it is the case that an open-air meeting was held on or about June 16, at which this, among other subjects, was discussed. My information being that no valuable chemical trade has been closed, and that no change has taken place in the manner of conducting this industry, I am unable to discover any legitimate grievance which calls for remedy by legislation.

NUISANCE AT BATTERSEA.

MR. OCTAVIUS V. MORGAN (Battersea): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been drawn to proceedings which have been instituted by the Vestry of the Parish of St. Mary, Battersea, against Messrs. Hudson and Covington, under the provisions of the Nuisances Removal Act, 1855, 18 and 19 Vic., cap. 121, before the Magistrate sitting at the Wandsworth Police Court, for the purpose of obtaining an order prohibiting the nuisance arising from the deposit of house refuse, &c., on premises in Victoria Road, Battersea; and whether, bearing in mind that the population of the Metropolis has about doubled, while in the same time the population of Battersea has grown from 11,000 to nearly 200,000 since the Act referred to was passed, he will state whether Her Majesty's Government intend to take steps with a view to the insertion of a clause in either the Infectious Disease (Prevention) or the Public Health (London) Consolidation Bills, now under the consideration of the Standing Committee on General Bills of the House of Lords, prohibiting the sorting, sifting, or accumulation of refuse in any part of the metropolitan area?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I am informed that the Vestry of St. Mary, Battersea, are instituting proceedings under the Nuisance Removal Acts against the occupier of certain lands for creating a nuisance by the deposit of house refuse and other offensive matter. No decision in the case has, so far as I am aware, been as yet obtained. I may remind the hon. Member that the Infectious Disease Prevention Bill has been passed in the House of Commons, and was read the third time in the House of Lords on the 17th instant, and that there is no Public Health (London) Consolidation Bill at present before the House. Consequently, the Government cannot, apart from any other consideration, act upon his suggestion.

INDIA COUNCIL BILLS.

Mr. SAMUEL SMITH (Flintshire): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether (1) it is the case that for some time past India Council Bills have been sold much beyond the average monthly rate; (2) whether this was done to take advantage of the higher exchange caused by anticipated silver legislation in America; (3) whether the present rate of exchange is much higher than that at which those surplus sales of Council Bills were made; (4) whether the Indian Treasury has thereby sustained a considerable loss; (5) and whether he will consider the advisability of delaying action as far as possible and await the full effect of the passage of the American Silver Bill, in view of the possibility of a rise to about 1s. 11d. per rupee, the old rate of exchange before silver demonetisation took place?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): The answer to the first paragraph of the hon. Member's question is in the negative. India Council Bills have not been sold for some time past much beyond the average monthly rate. The answer to the second part of the question is also in the negative. The expectation of legislation in the United States has not influenced the amount of the sales. The answer to the third paragraph is that the present rate is higher than it has been for the last five years. The answer to the fourth paragraph is in the negative. There has been no surplus sale, and consequently no loss. As regards the last paragraph, the Secretary of State cannot delay such sale of bills as is necessary to meet the wants of the Service on the chance of a future rise in the value of silver.

Mr. Ritchie

THE SALT TAX IN INDIA.

Mr. HOYLE (Lancashire, S.E., Heywood): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India what was the total amount paid into the Indian Exchequer from the Salt Tax during the last financial year; and what, during the fifteen weeks that have elapsed of the current financial year, is the amount received from the sale of bills and transfers over and above the estimate of the Finance Minister of India owing to the rate of exchange having risen higher than his estimate of the probable exchangeable value of the rupee?

*Sir J. GORST: The gross receipts from the Salt Tax for 1889-90 were 8,192,500 tens of rupees. The answer to the second question of the hon. Member is that the amount received during the current financial year from the sale of bills in excess of the estimate is £437,000.

*Mr. HOYLE: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the present rate of exchange will yield a surplus of £2,500,000?

*Sir J. GORST: I must ask for notice of that question.

THE BURMA RUBY MINES COMPANY.

Dr. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether his attention has been called to the statement made by the Chairman of the Burma Ruby Mines Company, Limited, at the ordinary general meeting of shareholders of that company, held on the 16th instant, to the effect that the Board had that day discussed the propriety of applying to the Government of India to relieve them of the payment of four lakhs of rupees per annum agreed on as the price of their concession, on the ground that the operations of the company had not resulted profitably; and whether he will undertake that no remission of this portion of the Indian Revenue shall take place without the House of Commons being previously informed of the fact?

Sir J. GORST: The Secretary of State has received no official communication on the subject, but he has seen a newspaper report of the meeting. The Secretary of State cannot give the pledge suggested. But no such application has been made either to him or, so far as he knows, to the Government of India, and he is not aware of any grounds upon which the rent of the Ruby Mines could be justly remitted.

SILVER.

MR. STEPHEN WILLIAMSON (Kilmarnock Burghs): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if, in view of the marked influence of American legislation on the gold price of silver in the London market, he is taking steps to secure a full supply for mintage purposes for our token silver currency?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. Goschen, St. George's, Hanover Square): No, Sir; the Mint does not speculate in silver. But, subject to reasonable foresight and forecast, it must buy according to its requirements.

WILLESDEN BOARD SCHOOL.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether complaints have reached him that the temporary School Board school at Willesden has no playground, no class room, is dark and ill-ventilated, and its sanitary arrangements are of the worst possible character; whether any complaints have been made by Her Majesty's Inspector as to the structural condition of this school; whether he is aware that the present School Board has acquired a site for a building to accommodate 1,000 children, and, notwithstanding their engagement to build for this number of children, have persistently neglected to do so; and what action the Education Department intends taking under the circumstances?

*THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): I am aware that the temporary school is in a defective condition, but the Board is being pressed to improve the sanitary arrangements, as well as to proceed with the permanent building, which it is their duty to provide; and there is no intention to permit them to evade their responsibility in either regard.

MR. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside): Seeing the length of time which has elapsed, may I ask why the Department has not stirred in the matter?

*SIR W. HART DYKE: I have just said that I have received information that the School Board are taking steps.

MR. MUNDELLA: In the meantime there is no class room, and it is not a suitable building at all for a school.

MR. CHANNING: Has the right hon. Gentleman received any assurance that the School Board are about to proceed with the building?

*SIR W. HART DYKE: Yes, Sir; I have received an assurance.

BRITISH GUIANA.

MR. WATT (Glasgow, Camlachie): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he is now in a position to give the House any information with regard to the scheme of Constitutional reform for the Colony of British Guiana, as approved by the Secretary of State?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de Worms, Liverpool, East Toxteth): The Secretary of State has formulated his views in a Despatch to the Governor, who has replied on certain points, and pending the completion of the correspondence it would not be to the public interest to give further information.

THE FACTORIES ACT.

MR. WATT: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the refusal of the Certifying Surgeon of the Retford district of Nottingham to grant a certificate under the Factories Act, 1878, to John Rutherford, aged 15 years, of fitness to work in an iron foundry, upon grounds which another factory Inspector, as well as two other independent medical men, have stated are insufficient to preclude the lad obtaining a certificate; and whether, as it is a serious matter, preventing the lad from following his occupation, he will cause an inquiry to be made into the circumstances of the case?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. STUART WOOLLEY, Sheffield, Hallam): The Chief Inspector has made inquiry and reports that the father wished his son, aged 14, to be apprenticed to him as an ironfounder. The Certifying Surgeon, not considering him fit for employment in an ironfoundry, declined to give him a certificate. The father then had the boy examined by two surgeons, who saw no objection to his being employed. These opinions were placed in the hands of the Certifying Surgeon, who, however, still retained his opinion. There is no appeal from the decision of the Certifying Surgeon. The boy is, therefore, debarred from working in the ironfoundry, but a certificate of fitness would be given to him for other occupations.

MACHINE GUNS.

MR. GRAY (Essex, Maldon): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether the Government will issue to Volunteer Battalions possessing machine guns the requisite ammunition for practice with such guns?

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I beg, also, to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, as Volunteer Battalions to which machine guns are attached are subject to a charge for ammunition on the occasion of field days with the Regular Forces, an allowance, or a free supply, can be issued to them?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): Machine guns having been obtained by the Volunteers themselves do not come within the rule which authorises the free issue of ammunition for use in rifle practice. But I will consider the matter before next year's Estimates.

ARMENIA.

MR. SCHWANN (Manchester, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he has yet obtained information as to whether the assertion that there are still Christian Armenian prisoners lying untried for the last two years in the gaols of Erzeroum and Erzingian be true; and, if so, will he use his influence to cause them to be tried, and, if innocent, set at liberty?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): The Consul at Erzeroum reported in February last that five Armenians, who had been imprisoned for two years, were awaiting confirmation of a sentence of banishment. Her Majesty's Ambassador brought the matter unofficially to the notice of the Grand Vizier. Further inquiries will be made.

MR. SCHWANN: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether his attention has been drawn to the statement in the Daily News of 18th July, that it was owing to the advice of the British Government that the Turks are increasing the military in Armenia, and also to the report, in the same paper, that in Erzeroum people disappear, no one knows how or whither, and that during the late riots about one hundred persons disappeared, mostly women, who were at the public baths at the time, and are supposed to have been abducted by Mussulmans; and, if he has no information on the latter point, would he cause inquiries to be made into the truth of those reports?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: As was stated in reply to a question from the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent on the 14th inst., certain recommendations made by the British, French, and Russian Consuls have been communicated to the Porte. A re-inforcement of the garrison of Erzeroum, and the patrolling of the country districts with cavalry, with a view to the protection of the rural population, were amongst the measures recommended. No corroboration has been received of the alleged abduction of women.

MR. SCHWANN: Is it intended to use Turkish irregular cavalry in Armenia?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: No, Sir; I believe they are regular cavalry.

MAIL SERVICE IN THE NORTH OF SCOTLAND.

MR. ANGUS SUTHERLAND (Sutherland): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether, seeing the Highland Railway Company have now expressed their readiness to continue the letter-sorting carriage at present stopping short at Tain on to Helmsdale without additional charge to the Post Office, and seeing this can be done without interference with or prejudice to the general re-arrangements of the mail service in the North of Scotland now under the consideration of his Department, he will without delay give effect to the improvement by ordering the sorting clerks to continue their duties on to Helmsdale?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): It is true that the Highland Railway Company have liberally offered to extend as far as Helmsdale, without charge, the journey of the letter-sorting carriage which is now detached from the down day mail train at Tain, thus increasing the daily journey by 113 train miles. The employment, however, of the requisite sorting force would throw extra expense on the Post Office, and the number of letters which would be benefited is very small. I will consider whether, under these circumstances, I shall be justified in accepting the company's offer.

GAMBIA.

MR. BARBOUR (Paisley): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if his attention has been called to a communication in the Times of the 16th instant, in which negotiations are said to be in progress which may result in the transfer of the British Envoy of Gambia to France; if there is any foundation for this statement; and if, in the case of the transfer being ultimately decided on, due precautions will be taken for the preservation of British commercial interests?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: There is no foundation for the report that any negotiations are proceeding in reference to the Gambia.

PAROCHIAL RECORDS.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): I beg to ask the Scottish Lord of the Treasury whether he is aware that the Rev. Thomas Bruce, of the Free Church, Rhynie, Aberdeenshire, was refused permission, on the 24th of May, to inspect and make extracts at the Register House, Edinburgh, from the records of the parish of Calluce, on the ground that he was not the minister of that parish; and whether this restriction has been framed by the authorities, or has been sanctioned by them?

SIR H. MAXWELL: Permission to inspect and make extracts from the register is never refused to anyone who applies and pays the statutory fees. There is no record or recollection in the office of Mr. Bruce having been there on the date mentioned in the question; but, from the search book, it appears that a Thomas Bruce, presumably the reverend gentleman referred to, made a search on the 27th May in the birth register of the parish of Calluce, and paid the fee of one shilling. The inspection of, and making extracts from, these registers is regulated by statute, and the regulations apply equally to all persons and denominations, except in the case of a Kirk Session of a parish, or anyone acting under its authority, desiring to have access to certain sessional records of such parish referred to in the statute.

MORTALITY AMONG ARMY MEDICAL OFFICERS.

DR. FARQUHARSON: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he accepts the statement made by Mr. Denham Robinson, Actuary to the War Office, before the Departmental Committee, presided over by Lord Camperdown, that the rate of mortality among the officers of the Army Medical Department is nearly double that among combatant officers, or in the proportion of seven combatant officers to 13 medical officers serving; and whether, in view of this high mortality, he is prepared to re-consider the question of allowing the medical officers only six months of sick leave as compared with the twelve months which are granted to combatant officers?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: Taking the years of service as from 24 to 55, the loss by death out of 1,000 combatant officers would be 335.2, as compared with 497.7 out of 1,000 medical officers—nearly two to three. This medical mortality is based on the experience of the years 1852 to 1871. As I stated in reply to a previous question, the increase of sick leave is a question of expense, as substitutes would have to be provided.

THE RAILWAY AND CANAL TRAFFIC ACT.

MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether any communication has taken place between the Board of Trade and any railway company, since the termination of the public inquiry with reference to the classification and Schedule under "The Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888"; and, if so, will he lay such communication upon the Table?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): Yes, Sir: letters were written on Saturday to the London and North Western Railway Company and the Great Western Railway Company, enclosing, with the object of coming to an agreement, draft Schedules proposed to be made applicable to those companies respectively. Copies of these letters and Schedules were forwarded to the Railway Association. Copies of all these communications will be on sale at the Stationery Office.

PRIVATE BILL PROCEDURE.

MR. LENG (Dundee): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he has observed that within a few days the decisions of Committees of this House in the cases of the North British and Glasgow and South Western Railway Bill, the London Central Railway Bill, and the Ayr Harbour Bill have been reversed by Committees of the House of Lords; and whether he will consider the propriety of proposing the substitution of one tribunal, representing both Houses of Parliament, for the present system of double inquiries before Committees of each House?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: Yes, Sir; I have noticed the decisions referred to by the hon. Member. The question raised is one of great importance, affecting the whole procedure on Private Business. Her Majesty's Government have proposed a change in this matter with regard to Scotland, and until the House has considered that proposal I do not think it is likely that any legislation on the subject with regard to England can be undertaken.

WELSH WITNESSES.

MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to a case decided by the Justices in Petty Sessions at Colwyn Bay, on the 5th July, in which the defendant was fined 1s. and costs, and it was sought to include in such costs a fee of 5s. for interpreting the evidence of a Welsh witness, the Clerk to the Magistrates stating that it was the practice to charge that fee when the services of an interpreter were required; whether the Magistrates expressed their disapproval of the practice, on the ground that it was equivalent to punishing a man because the witnesses were Welshmen, and disallowed the charge; and whether, if the practice be as stated, he could take any steps to put a stop to it in future?

MR. STUART WORTLEY: Yes, Sir; the Secretary of State has seen a newspaper report, from which he gathers that the facts are as stated in the first and second paragraphs. The practice which prevails in the Metropolitan Police Courts is that the cost of an interpreter whose intervention is necessary to prove the case is paid out of the Police Court fund. The Secretary of State is now in communication with the Justices, with the view of removing any grievance from which Welsh witnesses may suffer in this respect.

INSPECTORS OF WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

MR. PICTON (Leicester): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether Inspectors of Weights and Measures who present themselves for examination, with a view of obtaining their certificates of qualification from the Board of Trade, and who happen to fail in any one of the prescribed subjects, are debarred from further examination for a period of six months; and, if so, whether he is aware that this rule is the cause of great inconvenience to Local Authorities and officers concerned; and whether he can amend the regulations with a view of reducing the limit of time between one examination and another?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: Yes, Sir; the rule is as stated by the hon. Member, but I am not aware that its application has been a cause of inconvenience to Local Authorities, who are quite free to appoint another Inspector for the period which must elapse before a failed candidate can again present himself for examination. As the prescribed test is by no means a difficult one, and is chiefly of a practical nature, I am not prepared, as at present advised, to make any change in the regulations.

MR. PICTON: If a man failed in some insignificant matter is it not a hardship to put him back for six months?

*MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): Might it not be possible not to require re-examination on subjects in which the candidate has already passed?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I understand the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. Picton) to desire more frequent examinations.

MR. PICTON: The point I wished to raise was that if a man fails in some insignificant particular, a period of six months should not elapse before he is re-examined. I understand that that is the case now.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: Yes, Sir.

THE CENSUS.

MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he will call the attention of the Registrars to the observations of the Census Committee on the manner in which enumerators have hitherto been selected, and will give instructions that in future a large proportion of the enumerators chosen shall be women?

*MR. RITCHIE: The special attention of Superintendent Registrars and Registrars will, as suggested by the Census Committee, be directed to the importance of a very careful selection of enumerators and to the particular educational qualifications which it is essential that the persons employed should possess. The Committee observe that women are eligible for appointment as enumerators, and that they think that in many instances they might be so employed with advantage. There will be no objection to the Registrars being informed as to this.

OUTRAGES AT VAN.

MR. F. S. STEVENSON (Suffolk, Eye): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he now has any information to communicate with respect to the outrages committed in and near Van?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: No further information has been received since the date of the hon. Member's question on July 1. Inquiry will be made.

VOL. CCCXLVII. [THIRD SERIES.]

THE LOCAL TAXATION PROPOSALS.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if Her Majesty's Government have yet determined upon their recommendation as to the application of the extra taxation upon spirits, approved by this House in the belief that it would be utilised for the benefit of the contributors?

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I have also to ask the right hon. Gentleman to what purposes the Government propose to appropriate the sum of £40,000 allotted to Ireland as the Exchequer contribution in respect of Local Taxation Licences, and the sum of £40,000, the unallotted portion of the Irish share of the new Beer and Spirit Duties?

MR. GOSCHEN: Some misapprehension may possibly be conveyed by the wording of the question of my hon. and gallant Friend. He uses the word "contributors," but a controversy may arise as to who the contributors really are, the distillers and brewers, or the retailers, or the consumers. But there is the possibility of a farther misapprehension. The extra taxation upon spirits and beer was not approved by the House of Commons in the belief that the whole amount would be utilised for the benefit of the contributors, but with a proposal before it that one-third should be devoted to a certain purpose, an amount of £440,000, out of £1,304,000. If my hon. and gallant Friend's question is intended to suggest that, the purpose having failed, the tax ought to be repealed, the suggestion would only carry us to the repeal of one-third of the tax—namely, 2d. on spirits and 1d. on beer. Such a fractional repeal would, however, I have been given to understand, be unpalatable to those interested in the tax. It would disturb arrangements, contracts, price lists, &c., without offering any appreciable relief. We, therefore, discard that solution of the application of the money set free. And further we shall abide by the principle of this extra tax—namely, that it shall be devoted to local purposes spread over the whole country. This precludes the adoption of the suggestion contained in the question put by the hon. Member for Camborne to the First Lord of the Treasury that a large portion should be devoted to purchasing the Crystal Palace for the nation. I will now state what we propose as regards England, Scotland, and Ireland respectively. As regards England we propose to add the amount set free by the abandoned licensing clauses to the residue which, under the Bill as it stands, goes to the County Councils, accompanying this inclusion by an intimation that possibly new charges may, by-and-by, be put upon them, with reference to intermediate, technical, or agricultural education. It seems very desirable, if more is to be done in this respect, that the localities, and especially County Councils, should be interested in the work. In England there is at present little machinery available for carrying out such an object, and it would be impossible to create such a machinery at this period of the Session. But in Wales and in Monmouthshire the machinery does exist. County Councils may supply funds to the Joint Committee for intermediate education under the Act of last year out of the county rate, but to the extent of a halfpenny of such rates only. We shall propose that the County Councils in Wales should have authority to increase the sum out of the additional funds now placed at their disposal. As regards the £50,000 which falls to the share of Scotland, we also propose that the amount set free should go to the County Councils. The House will bear in mind, that while in England and Ireland much has been done for the ratepayer, so far in Scotland the ratepayer has scarcely had any advantage whatever out of the revision of local taxation, and it seems but just that his case should receive some consideration. As regards Ireland, we shall propose that the £40,000 which falls to her share should be utilised for the further promotion of intermediate education, and for this purpose should be placed at the disposal of the Intermediate Education Board for Ireland, a body which, I believe, commands the confidence of the Irish public generally, irrespective of political and religious differences.

*MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): May I ask whether the right hon. Gentleman will consider the revision of this extra taxation in his next year's Budget?

Mr. Goschen

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): Do the same reservations apply to Scotland as to England?

MR. GOSCHEN: No, Sir; there is no such reservation.

MR. BUCHANAN: Will it simply become a part of the residue under the Bill?

MR. GOSCHEN: Yes, Sir.

MR. SEXTON: To what purposes do the Government propose to appropriate the sum of £40,000 allotted to Ireland, and the sum of £40,000, the un-allotted portion of the Irish share of the new Beer and Spirit Duties?

MR. GOSCHEN: The £40,000 allotted to Ireland as a set-off against the gain derived by England and Scotland from the excess of licences received over grants dropped, we propose to devote to assisting the Irish Local Authorities who have taken action, or should hereafter take action, under the Irish Labourers' Dwellings Acts of 1882 and 1885.

MR. A. ACLAND (York, W.R., Rotherham): Are the English County Councils to be allowed to use the money for intermediate and technical education, or do the Government only express an opinion that some day they may have to do so? With reference to Wales I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the County Councils there are to be directed to use this money to help the intermediate education which now exists, or whether they are only to be allowed to do so if they choose to pass a vote to that effect?

MR. SINCLAIR (Falkirk Burghs): Will it be competent to the County Councils in Scotland to devote their share, or any part of it, for the purposes of education?

MR. GOSCHEN: No, Sir. I believe it would not be possible for them to devote any part of that sum to purposes to which, by law, they cannot apply them. I am aware that the desire of a good many Scotch members is that this money should be devoted to setting education entirely free in Scotland; but that would have to be done by legislation. With regard to the question put to me by the hon. Member for Rotherham, I have explained that at this period of the Session it would be impossible to set up machinery for technical and intermediate education in England. The money will be placed at the disposal of the English County Councils, but an intimation will be given to them which may guide them so that they may not spend it in a manner which would seem to stereotype in any way that payment to them. It will be pointed out to them that charges may, in the future, be put upon them in regard to intermediate education. It will be rather in the nature of a warning to them not to employ the money in such a manner as might imply the permanency of the payment.

MR. A. ACLAND: What is to be done about Wales?

MR. GOSCHEN: They will not receive any direction. They have the authority to use the money in that way. I would ask hon. Members whether it would not be better to wait until they see our proposals embodied in the new clauses, as, in answering questions across the Table, I might be guilty of some slip, which might lead to misunderstanding by-and-by.

CLARENCE BARRACKS, PORTSMOUTH.

SIR WILLIAM CROSSMAN (Portsmouth): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether it is intended to cut down the clump of old trees now standing on what was part of the old fortifications behind the old Clarence Barracks at Portsmouth; and, if so, if it is on account of their interfering with the new barracks which are about to be built; and whether some modification in the plan, could be made so that so great an ornament to the place might be preserved?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: This question has been referred to the Army Sanitary Committee as one likely to affect the sanitary condition of the proposed new barracks. Their Report is expected shortly, and upon it will depend the decision as to whether it will be possible so to modify the plans of the barracks as to preserve the trees.

BRUNEL.

MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether any correspondence has taken place between the Sultan of Brunei and the Colonial Authorities on the subject of recent transactions between him and Rajah Brooke; and if he will lay the correspondence upon the Table of the House?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Some correspondence has taken place between the Sultan of Brunei and the Colonial Authorities on the subject of transactions between him and Rajah Brooke. That correspondence is, however, incomplete, and, the subject being still under consideration, no Papers can be laid at present.

MR. SEXTON: Is there any truth in the statement that Labuan is to be handed over to this country?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: No, Sir; it is not the case.

COMPOSITIONS FOR SHIPS.

SIR WILLIAM PLOWDEN (Wolverhampton, W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty who is the officer specially deputed to watch the result of compositions applied to ships of the Navy and those of the mercantile marine; is this officer an expert, and what previous technical experience and education has he had to qualify him for his duty; and when will Treasury sanction be obtained for his appointment?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): The officer in question is Commander Pitt, R.N. Commander Pitt, in addition to his naval experience and training, was a member of an Admiralty Committee on compositions for coating ships' bottoms, and when that Committee, as a body, ceased their investigations, this officer was retained to watch the matter for a period of six months from the 1st of April, 1888. His services in this capacity were found so valuable that he has since been retained for two further periods of 12 months each, which were renewed as they expired. The term of his present appointment expires on September 30. The sanction of the Treasury has not been asked, the employment of this officer being special, and involving no addition to the permanent establishment.

THE GRENADEER GUARDS.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether the 2nd Battalion of the Grenadier Guards has been ordered to proceed abroad; and, if so, whither; what regiment will it replace; and when was the last occasion of the Foot Guards being sent abroad in time of peace?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: It is true that, after considering very carefully the evidence taken by the Court of Inquiry and all the circumstances of the case, His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief has decided to order the 2nd Battalion of the Grenadier Guards to proceed to Bermuda. I deeply regret that anything should have occurred to bring any discredit on the battalion, and I am sure that both officers and men will desire at the earliest date to regain the high reputation which attaches to the whole regiment. His Royal Highness has also directed that the command of the battalion shall be taken up by Colonel Eaton, and that no leave is to be granted to officers or men till further orders. The events which have occurred open up some questions which will be very carefully considered by His Royal Highness. But there is one point as to which no responsibility whatever attaches to the Guards, but which ought to be dealt with. I allude to the absence of any sufficient accommodation in the barracks for the officers, a fact which places them at a disadvantage as compared with Line regiments, and for this I hope to be able to provide under the Barracks Bill recently passed by this House, so that an officer per company shall always reside in barracks. The 2nd Battalion of the Grenadier Guards will replace at Bermuda the 1st Battalion of the Leicestershire Regiment, who are proceeding in the ordinary course to Halifax. The Guards are going instead of the 1st Battalion of the Liverpool Regiment from Aldershot, and, therefore, no extra expense is incurred.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): Is this course to be regarded as being by way of punishment?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I have stated the facts; the hon. Member can draw his own conclusion.

MR. PICKERSGILL: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered the last paragraph of my question?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I should have said that Canada is the last place abroad to which the Guards were sent in time of peace.

MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): Can the right hon. Gentleman state
Mr. Pickersgill

what is the present position of Colonel Maitland?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: Colonel Maitland no longer commands the 2nd Battalion. The command has been taken up by Colonel Eaton.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: Is he on the retired list?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: He is, or will be, on half-pay.

MR. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.): I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it was not originally intended to send the battalion to the Cape?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: No, never.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): Can the right hon. Gentleman state how long the battalion is to be away?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: No, I can say nothing on that point.

*CAPTAIN VERNEY (Bucks, N.): Do men who enlist in the Guards do so upon the understanding that they shall not be sent abroad except in the case of war?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: Certainly not.

THE HESSIAN FLY.

MR. F. S. STEVENSON: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether it is true that the Hessian Fly has appeared in the neighbourhood of Grantham; and what steps will be taken by the wide-spread diffusion of information, and by other means, to meet the danger which threatens the corn-growing counties?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): We have received no complaints as yet of the presence of the Hessian Fly in the course of the present summer in the neighbourhood of Grantham. But inquiries are now being made by the Board as to the truth of the statements which have appeared in certain newspapers respecting the appearance of the fly in that district and elsewhere. Repeated information has been circulated by the Board of Agriculture as to the methods to be employed in recognising and dealing with this insect plague. I have already desired that Circulars on the subject shall be re-issued, and every effort will be made to spread information on the subject as widely as possible, with the view of counteracting as far as possible any danger from that source which may threaten the corn-growing counties.

ILLEGAL FISHING IN SCOTLAND.

MR. LENG: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether it has been brought to his knowledge that not only the nets, but the whole gear was taken by the gunboat Watchful from several steam trawlers, which were fishing within the limits in St. Andrew's Bay, on the 6th instant; whether he will state under what Act of Parliament the commanders of gunboats are authorised to seize the gear, which is of considerable value, in addition to the nets; whether he is aware that, when the cases were tried at the Sheriff Court in Cupar, on the 14th July, no copy of the Act containing such authority could be produced; and whether, if it is found that the gear was improperly seized, he will cause it to be returned to the owners of the trawlers without delay.

SIR H. MAXWELL: I am aware of the facts regarding the seizure of the nets and other fishing gear belonging to the trawler Skylark, on the recent occasion of her being caught fishing illegally in St. Andrew's Bay. The seizure of nets is authorised by the Herring Fishery Act of last Session. Whether or not the word "net" includes the other apparatus to which the net is attached, and which it is necessary to use for the purpose of trawling, is a question of law, depending upon somewhat minute facts about the apparatus. I am informed that when the case was tried the right to seize the gear was not questioned, but that the fact of its being seized was successfully pleaded in mitigation of sentence, the accused having tendered a plea of guilty. It is a question for a Court of Law to decide whether the seizure was illegal, but I have no doubt that if a Court held it was illegal, the owners of the nets would recover their property.

IRELAND—KILRUSH QUARTER SESSIONS COURT.

MR. JORDAN (Clare, W.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether it is a fact that there is an unsettled case at the instance of Patrick Lynan, Queen Street, Kilkee, in the Kilrush Quarter Sessions Court, for the past six years and nine months, and which has on some point of law been adjourned from Sessions to Sessions; and whether he will inquire into the cause of the delay?

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): I am informed that the case referred to, which is one for the administration of assets, was commenced in 1882. Three different solicitors undertook subsequently the case at various times but abandoned it. It was, however, again undertaken by another solicitor, and was partly heard at the last January Sessions and adjourned, not on a point of law, but for further evidence, to a subsequent Sessions. It now stands adjourned, both parties consenting, to the October Sessions, and will, it is presumed, be then finally disposed of.

COUNTY SURVEYORS.

MR. PINKERTON (Galway): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if county surveyors in Ireland have power, under any Act of Parliament, to fine contractors (without bringing them before any Court of Justice) for non-fulfilment of contract; if he is aware that, in the county of Londonderry, owing to the fines levied by the county surveyor, many contractors, or their sureties, have forfeited the full amounts of their bonds rather than submit to those exactions, and if the county surveyor has since altered the form of bond, and requires security to be given for double the amount of the contract; and if he can state the amount of fines levied, during the past three years, from contractors by the county surveyor of Londonderry without the defaulters being brought before any independent tribunal, or having any right of appeal?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The reply to the inquiry in the first paragraph is, I am advised, in the negative. I have no official information with regard to the matters referred to in the remaining portion of the question, as they are not under the control of the Executive Government. But from a Report received from the county surveyor of Londonderry it appears that in no instance has he inflicted a fine, the practice being, in cases where contractors do not entirely fulfil their contract, for the Grand Jury to deduct from the total amount of the contract the amount of the deficiency as calculated by the county surveyor. No contractor has, to the knowledge of the county surveyor, ever voluntarily forfeited the full amount of his bond in the manner suggested in the question. But in some cases contractors have been decreed in those amounts either in the Court of Quarter Sessions or at Superior Court. He states that no alteration has been made in the form of bond; but that the form of tender heretofore in use has been altered, under the advice of counsel, to amend a defect in the old form of which contractors had taken advantage to evade carrying out the terms of their contract. He reports that the amounts deducted for deficiencies in respect of all contracts during the years mentioned were as follows: Year ending Spring Assizes, 1888, £2,368; year ending Spring Assizes, 1889, £3,505; year ending Spring Assizes, 1890, £3,046.

"SHADOWING."

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland in reference to the case against a Mr. Kent at last Fermoy Sessions, whether he can state if the Constabulary regulations on the question of "shadowing" override the Common Law; and if a police constable or officer has any rights in connection with following or shadowing a civilian which a civilian has not with regard to a police constable or officer?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The reply to the inquiry in the first paragraph is in the negative. I cannot undertake to reply to the abstract question put in the second paragraph. The justification, or otherwise, for the proceedings referred to either by a police constable or a civilian must obviously depend upon the particular circumstances of the case.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): Has the Attorney General received the depositions in this case?

*MR. MADDEN: Yes.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Do they bear out the allegations made by the right hon. Gentleman in this House?

*MR. MADDEN: Yes; but I shall be happy to show them to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. A. J. Balfour

MR. T. M. HEALY: Was not the offence of which Mr. Kent was convicted the shadowing of a detective who was shadowing him?

*MR. MADDEN: My original statement was that he was a police officer in plain clothes. That was denied. But my statement appears from the depositions to have been accurate.

MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): Is it an offence to follow a police officer in uniform, and not for a police officer to follow a civilian?

*MR. MADDEN: It is not an offence unless the following constitutes an obstruction to the officer in the discharge of his duty.

MR. T. M. HEALY: How is a civilian to know a policeman in the discharge of his duty if he is in plain clothes?

*MR. MADDEN: If the hon. Member will read the depositions he will see what the facts of the case are. The man knew perfectly well that the officer was a police constable engaged in the discharge of his duty.

MR. ROCHE (Galway, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that Mr. Thomas Hayes, of Portumna, on leaving his house on Sunday, the 11th of May, to attend evening service, was shadowed by Constable Murphy, who, when Mr. Hayes met two of his friends and stood to speak to them, stepped in between the three men, and ordered Mr. Hayes, who was smoking at the time, to stop doing so; that, upon Mr. Hayes' refusal to obey the order, and telling the constable that if he did not like the smoke he could easily get rid of it by walking away, he was arrested, brought to the barrack, searched, and £87 found in his pocket; that, although Mr. Hayes told the police he had sent on 15 cattle to the fair of Woodford, which was to be held on the following day, and requested that he should be brought before a Magistrate that evening, or early in the morning, so as to allow him to attend to the sale of his cattle, his request was refused, and he was kept in custody until 12 o'clock noon on Monday, and lost the sale of his cattle; whether Constable Murphy is the same man against whom both Mr. Fahy and Mr. Morrissey obtained decrees for £5 and £2 at last Quarter Sessions, held at Gort, for false arrest; can he explain how it happened that, although Mr. Hayes was arrested on the 11th of May, the matter was allowed to drop until Fahy and Morrissey had obtained decrees against the constable; whether he has seen that it was proved at the trial that the constable had taken several pints of porter before he arrested Mr. Hayes, and that, after a full hearing, the case was dismissed; and, if so, what compensation is Mr. Hayes to get; and what action he proposes to take in reference to the constable?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not gather that the account in the first place can be taken as accurate, but the evidence given at Petty Sessions on the subject appears to have been conflicting. Mr. Hayes did not ask to be brought before a Magistrate, but, as a matter of fact, every effort was made to find a Magistrate at the earliest possible moment. Constable Murphy is the man referred to in the second paragraph. The police have, I believe, appealed. Through a mistake the summonses were not taken out by Hayes for the next Petty Sessions. But this had nothing to do with the claim against Murphy. There is no suggestion that the constable was drunk. The Magistrate, in dismissing the case, said the constable was injudicious, and that he gave Hayes the benefit of the doubt. The constable will be prosecuted at Portumna Petty Sessions, by order of the Solicitor General, under 6 William IV., c. 13.

MR. FLYNN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland in reference to the case of Mr. James O'Brien, of Killeagh, who was arrested for obstructing the constable who shadowed him at a fair, if he can now state whether it is a fact that Mr. O'Brien was compelled to wear the prison garments in Cork Gaol whilst confined as a bail or untried prisoner; and, if so, what explanation the Prisons Board have to offer on the matter?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The General Prisons Board report that the allegation that the prisoner mentioned wore the prison dress is without foundation.

ULSTER ROYAL SCHOOL ENDOWMENTS.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what is the cause of the delay in bringing into operation the scheme for distributing the Ulster Royal School Endowments, published 30th April, 1888, signed 28th June, 1889, remitted 6th November, 1889, and signed, as amended, 6th December, 1889; and can he explain why the scheme was not put in operation last February, in view of the fact that the delay will give the existing endowments the benefit of another half year's rent?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: After the amended scheme, dated December 6, 1889, was submitted to the Lord Lieutenant, further objections were made, which resulted in its being remitted to the Educational Endowments Commission in May last, and a further question has since arisen as to the provision for the superannuation of officers. This necessitates a further sitting of the Judicial Commissioners, notice of which sitting has been given for the 30th inst., the earliest day after the return of the Judicial Commissioners from circuit. It is not possible to put the scheme into operation until it has been finally approved by the Lord Lieutenant in Council, and this cannot be done until after all the objections have been disposed of.

MR. MATTHEW WELD O'CONNOR.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his statement has been called to the report of the judgment of Mr. Justice Monroe, re "King's Estate," in the Dublin papers of 4th July, dismissing Mr. Matthew Weld O'Connor from the receivership, and commenting strongly on his conduct in allowing four tenants to be sued for £27 2s., rent they had already paid, and surcharging him therewith, and with other sums, amounting to £181 13s., "verified" by Mr. O'Connor to have been spent on police huts and emergency men; whether Mr. O'Connor is a Magistrate for the three counties of Longford, Cavan, and Meath, and will be retained in the Commission of the Peace; whether he has observed that Judge Monroe also condemned the conduct of an under agent, named Francis Cooke, of whom his Lordship remarked that his form of receipt was "a curiosity," but that he "Did not feel at liberty in holding on mere suspicion that Cooke had been guilty of perjury and fraud;"

whether Cooke is barony cess collector, process server, and summons server in Longford or Leitrim; will the Government take any steps to have him removed from these positions; will a Secret Inquiry, under Section 1 of the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act, be held to obtain evidence to prosecute Cooke in case that existing already is not considered sufficient; if not, is the judicial suspicion of "perjury and fraud" considered insufficient to ground such inquiry; and is Cooke the same person who was tried for shooting a girl in Mohill, and got off on the plea of self-defence?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I beg to refer the hon. and learned Member to the replies already given on the matters of fact referred to in this question. As regards the alleged statement made in court with respect to Cooke's action, steps are being taken to ascertain what actually occurred in Court, and the Attorney General for Ireland will then consider the matter.

ALLEGED OUTRAGE BY ORANGEMEN.

MR. BLANE (Armagh, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he is aware that, on Sunday, 6th July, a number of Catholic excursionists from Portadown and Armagh, returning from the yearly trip to Lough Neagh, were stoned by an Orange mob at Clonmacate and Cloncore, six miles from Portadown, and that Stephen M'Guigan, senior, and Stephen M'Guigan, junior, were also attacked and threatened with death; and if the authorities will take steps to prevent such attacks on excursionists as are alleged to have taken place?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Constabulary Authorities report that a police party passed through the places at which the alleged attacks occurred, first in the morning and again in the evening, and that they were engaged all day on duty where the excursionists were, and no complaint was made of any person having been molested. Since the question appeared upon the Paper the local police have visited the two men mentioned. They allege that they were struck with stones on the road, but they have no marks of injury, and, up to the inquiry, they had made no complaint to the police. The excursionists had ample police protection on the occasion.

Mr. T. M. Healy

PAWNBROKERS IN IRELAND.

MR. JOHNSTON: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether complaints have reached him as to the state of the law regarding pawnbrokers in Ireland, and that the hours during which pawnbroking establishments are kept open in some localities in Belfast is largely in excess of the time permitted by Act of Parliament; and whether he will consider the propriety of assimilating the law of Ireland with that of England, as regards the granting of licences to pawnbrokers, and the general regulation of the trade?

MR. MADDEN: No complaints have reached me with reference to the particular point mentioned in the question, but I am bound to say that my examination on several occasions of the law of pawnbroking in Ireland has led me to the conclusion that it is in a very unsatisfactory state. It is governed by two old statutes, passed in the 26th and 28th years of George III., the latter of which contains the provisions as to hours referred to in the question. The provisions of this statute as to hours of business apply only to Dublin and a district within three miles of that city. I shall certainly consider the question referred to in the concluding paragraph of the question, with a view to introducing legislation on the subject in the coming Session.

MOONLIGHTING IN DUHALLOW.

MR. FLYNN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the charge of Judge Gibson, at the present Cork County Assizes, in which the learned Judge stated that offences of a moonlighting character are of frequent occurrence in the barony of Duhallow; if he can state at what date was Duhallow proclaimed under the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act; and under what sections of the Act the district is proclaimed?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am informed that it is the case that the Judge referred to in his charge to the prevalence of moonlighting in the barony of Duhallow. The barony was proclaimed (with two others), with regard to Section 7 of the Statute quoted on the 17th of September, 1887. As part of the county it had also been proclaimed on the 23rd of the previous July, with regard to Sections 1, 2, 3, and 4.

IRISH NATIONAL SCHOOLS.

MR. LEAMY (Sligo, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in view of the fact that at the last results examination, John Henry M'Dermot, who has been recommended by Canon Stenson for the position of monitor to the Banamadden Boys' School, was promoted by the Inspector from the first stage of sixth class to the second stage of sixth class, the highest class in the National Schools, and of the difficulty of one person teaching efficiently a large number of boys, the Commissioners will re-consider their decision and comply with the request of Canon Stenson, and appoint the monitor he wishes?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Commissioners of National Education report that, for the reasons stated in reply to the previous question on this subject put by the hon. Member, they cannot sanction the proposed appointment.

IRISH SEED TRADE.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether at the recent sitting of the Land Commission in Cork on the 3rd inst., Mr. Commissioner Wrench is correctly reported to have said, while hearing a fair rent appeal in the case of M'Grath, tenant, and Bullen, landlord, addressing the tenant—

"You are a very wise man to get your grass seeds from England. If more tenants did that they would have better grass. It will pay you well to get your seeds from England;"

and whether intimation will be conveyed to Mr. Wrench that language such as that quoted is likely to do great mischief to the Irish seed trade?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: As Mr. Commissioner Wrench is at present on Circuit perhaps the hon. Member will be good enough to defer this question until Thursday next.

THE QUEEN'S UNIVERSITY.

MR. PINKERTON: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether his attention has been directed to a judgment of the Court of Exchequer, whereby it would appear that certain professors of the late Queen's University have sustained a loss of nearly one-half their incomes by the dissolution of that university, and to the observations of Chief Baron Palles and Mr. Baron Dowse as to the imperfections in the Act, which prevent the legal award of compensation; and whether Government will give effect, by legislation or otherwise, to the suggestions of the learned Judges?

MR. MADDEN: I have carefully examined the judgments delivered in the case referred to in the question by the Judges of the Exchequer Division. It is quite clear from these judgments that losses of the kind mentioned cannot form the basis for a claim for compensation under the University Education (Ireland) Act of 1879. I have ascertained that since the decision of this case, the position of the professors who are affected by it has been brought before the Treasury, and, after full consideration, the Treasury have decided not to re-open the question of compensation, but to leave it as it was determined by the Act of 1879.

LAW BUSINESS OF THE CROWN.

MR. SYDNEY GEDGE (Stockport): I beg to ask the Attorney General, with reference to contentious business in England, what are the rules which regulate the employment of the Law Officers of the Crown in actions to which the Crown is a party, either as plaintiff or defendant; do both of them claim to receive a brief in every such case; if not, how is it determined whether both of them, or only one, and which one of them, shall receive the brief; who fixes the fees to be marked on the briefs; are the fees, however simple the case, larger than would be paid in similar cases to other Queen's Counsel; if so, does the Junior Counsel who appears with the Law Officer receive a fee proportionate to the higher fee paid to his leader, or only such a fee as he would receive if his leader was an ordinary Queen's Counsel, and not the Attorney or Solicitor General; and if the Crown succeeds, and the other party to the action has to pay the costs, has he to pay all these higher fees?

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): The question whether one or both of the Law Officers shall appear in actions to which the Crown is a party depends entirely upon the nature of the case. The standing rule for some time past has been that only one Law Officer is instructed except in cases where, owing to the number of witnesses or difficulty of questions raised, the services of both are considered necessary, and the personal directions of the Attorney General are taken before a second Law Officer is instructed. The brief fees are fixed by the solicitor instructing the Law Officers in the ordinary way, but they are on a scale lower than would be paid in similar cases to other Queen's Counsel. The Junior Counsel receives fees in the ordinary proportion to those fees. If the Crown succeeds the costs are taxed as between party and party in the ordinary way.

MR. SYDNEY GEDGE: Does the Attorney General decide whether he or the Solicitor General shall be briefed?

*SIR R. WEBSTER: Under ordinary circumstances they are taken in rotation; but if any question at all arises the directions of the Attorney General are taken.

MR. PICKERSGILL: Is it not the fact that in the case of "The Queen v. the East and West India Docks" the Master of the Queen's Bench cut down the fees from 77 guineas to 12 guineas, that there was an appeal, and that the Divisional Court refused to review the Master's taxation.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: I have had no notice of this, but I remember that something of the kind occurred after I had made a rule not to go into Court under a certain fee. The Master was, in my opinion, right in not allowing those costs against the other party.

"MITCHELL v. REGINA."

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I beg to ask the Attorney General whether Messrs. Hare and Company, agents to the Solicitor of the Treasury, will only get half the allowance fees or taxed costs in the case of "Mitchell v. Regina," and the other half go to the Exchequer receipts of the Crown; whether this arrangement is in contravention of paragraph 32 of the Solicitors' Act of 1843; whether he will lay upon the Table of the House a copy of the bill of costs in the case of "Mitchell v. Regina," both in the Court of Queen's Bench and in the Court of Appeal; and, what is the amount in each Court of the costs of the Crown?

*SIR R. WEBSTER: In reply to the hon. Member, I have to say that under an arrangement in force since 1806, Messrs. Hare and Company receive half the profit costs, plus disbursements, and pay over all sums received in respect of taxed costs. No portion of the costs in the case referred to will go to the Exchequer receipts of the Crown. Section 32 of the Solicitors Act, 1843, has no application to the case in question. I must decline to lay upon the Table the bill of costs in question. The costs of the Crown, as taxed in the Court below, amount to £160. The costs in the Court of Appeal have not been made out.

ROYAL COMMISSIONS.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he will furnish a Return showing the number and objects of reference of the several Royal Commissions issued since the year 1870, in which the Commissioners were precluded by the terms of Reference from embodying in their Report any recommendations for legislation or otherwise?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): The Government do not see that any useful purpose would be served by the preparation of the proposed Return, which they are therefore unable to assent to.

NEXT SESSION'S WORK.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Lancashire, N.E., Darwen): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether it is the intention of the Government, next Session, to give the Tithe Rent-Charge Bill and the Irish Land Purchase Bill precedence over other Government Bills until they have passed this House?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: It is our intention to put these Bills forward, so that they can be dealt with by the House at the earliest opportunity next Session.

PERPETUAL PENSIONS.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury on what date he will, in fulfilment of the undertaking given on 16th May last, afford the House the opportunity of passing its opinion upon the Motion, of which notice has been placed on the Paper, disapproving the Treasury Minute of 15th July, relating to perpetual pensions?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I have not had time to consider this matter, but if the hon. Gentleman will be so good as to postpone the question I will endeavour to fix a date.

THE INDIAN COUNCILS BILL.

SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in case Her Majesty's Government find themselves unable to deal in the present Session with the question raised in connection with the first part of the Indian Councils Bill, they will consider the expediency of trying, at least, to carry through the non-contentious later portions of the Bill?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I still entertain the hope that the House will deal with the Bill as a whole in the course of the present Session.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: Will the right hon. Gentleman say to when he intends to postpone it from to-day, as I notice the Bill appears on the Orders of the Day?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: If the hon. Gentleman will be so good as to allow the Orders of the Day to be called on we shall then be able to answer the question.

STANDING ORDERS.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether Members will have, at the beginning of the Session to be opened in November next, the same right of balloting for Bills and Motions as at the beginning of ordinary Sessions of this House, and whether they will be able to set down Bills and Motions for the Wednesdays and Tuesdays and Fridays between the beginning of the Session and the adjournment over the Christmas Recess?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The existing Standing Orders or Rules of the House will apply to the next as to the past Session.

ERZEROUH.

SIR JOHN SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, on the occasion of the recent disturbances at Erzeroum, the Mohammedan population of that place organised a demonstration in front of the British Consulate; and whether the windows of the Consulate were smashed and the Union Jack was repeatedly fired at by the Moslem fanatics; and, if so, what reparation, if any, has been demanded of the Turkish authorities for this outrage?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: During the recent disturbances at Erzeroum the mob took possession of the street in which Her Majesty's Consulate is situated; its windows were broken in common with those of other houses in the same street; Her Majesty's Consul hoisted his flag, and communicated with the Vali, who sent a guard of gendarmes, and subsequently troops, who cleared the streets.

THE MALTESE MARRIAGE LAWS.

MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Canon Law is in its entirety the Civil Law of Malta; and, if not, what parts of the Canon Law are the Civil Law of the island, and when and by virtue of what stipulations, proclamations, or enactments, have they become so; and whether he is aware that Mr. John Austin and Sir George Cornwall Lewis, who were sent out as Commissioners to the island in 1838, reported that "most of the law of Malta (like most of the law of many other European Nations) is derived directly from the Roman Law?"

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The Crown Advocate at Malta has reported that—

"The matters which, in Malta, are governed by the canon law are marriages and ecclesiastical benefices (advowsons). The canon law on these matters was introduced in these islands by usage long before the British occupation, and has remained in force to the present day."

and Sir George Cornwall Lewis's Reports (which were laid before Parliament in 1839) is correctly cited by the hon. Member, but it is not inconsistent with the above statement by the Malta Crown Advocate.

MR. SUMMERS: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether it is intended to continue the practice of granting to the clergy of different denominations in Malta licences to celebrate mixed marriages in that island, as was the custom down to the time of the commencement of the negotiations between Her Majesty's Government and the Pope.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: It is understood that the Governor's licence for a marriage has not been granted when it was known to the Governor that one of the parties was a Roman Catholic and had not obtained a dispensation from his Church. The question of the law of marriage in Malta is engaging the anxious attention of Her Majesty's Government, and they are not at present in a position to give a definite answer as to the practice which will be adopted in future in respect of the issue of licences by the Governor.

MEMBERS AND THE POST OFFICE.

MR. CONYBEARE: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he still declines to afford hon. Members who may desire to visit the Post Office, with a view to seeing something of its internal administration before they are called upon to discuss and criticise it on the Post Office Estimates, the necessary facilities for so doing?

*MR. RAIKES: I am not aware that there has been more than one application recently on the part of any Member of this House to visit the General Post Office; and I think every Member who has applied at a convenient time will not be slow to admit that I have always been ready to do all in my power to facilitate his visit. The present moment is, however, not the best to select for such an inspection.

MR. CONYBEARE: Will such a convenient moment offer before the Post Office Estimates come on for discussion?

*MR. RAIKES: No, Sir; I think not.

Mr. W. H. Smith

THE ANTI-SLAVERY CONFERENCE.

MR. SAMUEL SMITH: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he has any information as to the reason given by the representatives of the Netherlands at the Anti-Slavery Conference at Brussels for declining to sign the Convention, and whether this refusal was on account of objection to the articles relating to restrictions on the liquor traffic; whether he is aware that the Netherlands is largely interested in the importation of spirits into the areas affected by the Convention, and whether the objection entertained by the Netherlands to the imposition of import duties in the Congo State could be removed by increasing the duty on spirits and allowing free trade in all other merchandise; whether the refusal of the Netherlands to sign the Convention will render the whole General Act nugatory, or only the particular part to which objection is taken, and, in the absence of the adhesion of the Netherlands, will the General Act in whole or in part be binding on the Powers who have signed; and whether the proposed duty on the importation of spirits to the Congo and elsewhere is only 1½d. per quart, whereas in England the duty is as high as 2s. 7½d. per quart?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The reason given by the Netherlands Representative for declining to sign the Convention was that the imposition of Import Duties was contrary to the provisions of the Berlin Act, which they did not consider the Brussels Conference competent to alter. Her Majesty's Government desired that a much higher rate of duty on spirits should be imposed, but were unable to procure its adoption. The proposed duty will be about 1½d. a quart. I believe that negotiations are going on which, it may be hoped, will procure the removal of the objection; but the General Act will remain in suspense until all the Powers, parties to the Act of Berlin, have signed it.

SHIPWRECKED EMIGRANTS.

MR. JORDAN: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that, after the Dacca was wrecked in the Red Sea last May, two girls, Ann and Maria Walsh, of Ballydinan, County Clare, emigrants to Australia, were brought back to Suez and detained there a month, waiting for the ship Zaroba; that, though their trunks and outfit were lost, the Company only tendered them £2 each, an offer afterwards increased to £8 each, which they were constrained to accept; and whether the law affords any protection to emigrants in such cases; and, if not, if he would take the subject into his consideration, with a view of providing some authority to which friendless emigrants might have recourse for assistance and advice?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I have not received any official Report of the circumstances to which the hon. Member refers, but through the courtesy of a Representative of the Queensland Government, I am informed that the passengers in question were sent out with other emigrants in the Dacca by the Queensland Government. After the wreck of the Dacca, they were transferred to another vessel, on which they were kept and treated, exactly as they would have been on the Dacca, until it was possible to send them on to their destination. I am also informed that they were not in need of advice or assistance, and were not landed at Suez. I need hardly remind the hon. Member that British subjects who may be in need of advice abroad can always have recourse to Her Majesty's Representatives. As regards compensation for loss of outfit, &c., that is obviously a matter for arrangement between the parties concerned, and I do not think the circumstances of this case show the necessity for any alteration of the law with regard to emigrants.

OFFICIAL RECEIVERS IN BANKRUPTCY.

MR. KIMBER (Wandsworth): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the highest, lowest, and average amount of remuneration received by the unsalaried Official Receivers in Bankruptcy, whether by fees, or commission, or otherwise; and the total amount of such remuneration, and the number of such receivers?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The highest and lowest amounts of remuneration paid to the unsalaried Official Receivers for the year 1889 were respectively

£1,517 and £208. The total amount of remuneration paid to 56 unsalaried Receivers during the financial year 1889-90 was £44,308, and the average amount paid to each Receiver was £791. These are the gross amounts paid, out of which the Official Receivers have to provide office accommodation and clerical staffs. The present number of unsalaried Official Receivers is 46.

ARRESTED FOR DRUNKENNESS.

MR. H. J. WILSON (York, W.R., Holmfirth): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that a woman named Margaret Brown, who is known to be drunk frequently and has recently been in prison for drunkenness, was taken up in York Street, Westminster, and obliged to be removed to the King Street Police Station on a stretcher quite drunk at 10 o'clock in the morning on Wednesday, 25th June; whether any and what steps were taken to ascertain where she was supplied with drink; and whether the person who supplied her with the drink has been prosecuted; and, if not, will he explain why this has not been done?

MR. STUART WORTLEY: I am informed by the Commissioner of Police that a woman giving the name of Margaret Brown was arrested as stated. She had been charged with a like offence on the 18th June, and sentenced to seven days' imprisonment. As she was not seen leaving a public house, it was quite impossible to ascertain where she was supplied with drink. In nearly all such cases the drink is procured at several houses, and the difficulty of obtaining proof in a place like London is very great. If proof were forthcoming, the police would not hesitate to institute proceedings.

INTIMIDATION OF AN EMERGENCY MAN.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that, on the 6th of June, a man named Connors was sentenced by Colonel Evanson, R.M., to three months' imprisonment on a charge of intimidating an emergency man named Holmes; whether the only witness against Connors was Holmes, who swore to some offensive language as having been used by Connors; and whether, under the circumstances that Connors is well known to be a harmless simpleton, he will be compelled to fulfil the sentence of three months?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am informed that the facts are not accurately represented in the question. Connors was proved to have used most violent language towards Mr. Robert Holmes, a land steward. In addition to the evidence of Mr. Holmes, a police sergeant gave evidence as to the defendant's violence and bad behaviour. The defendant was not sentenced to imprisonment, but was ordered to enter into recognisances to be of good behaviour, or in default three months' imprisonment. He refused to give bail, electing to go to prison in default. The defendant is not known as a harmless simpleton, but is represented to be a man capable of doing much mischief. He can obtain his immediate release by entering into the required recognisances.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: Has the right hon. Gentleman made full inquiries as to the state of this man's mind? Is he not a lunatic?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have given the hon. Gentleman all the information I possess.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): Has the right hon. Gentleman received his information from the Doctor of Clonmel Gaol, who was himself a lunatic?

BOYCOTTING IN TIPPERARY.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that Patrick Burke, of Tipperary, has for 13 years pursued his calling as repairer of boots and shoes in a street in Tipperary, and that policemen in Tipperary have passed his stall repeatedly, saying to Burke, "hurry on with our jobs;" and have they offered him money in the presence of other persons, for the performance of work supposed to be done for the police by Burke; and, if true, what is the object of the police in thus interfering with this man?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Constabulary Authorities report that they are not aware how long Burke has worked at his calling of boot repairer in the streets of Tipperary, but that it is the case he has done so for some time. They cannot find that there is any truth in the particular allegation with regard to the police; but they state that it is the case that his movements have been watched, owing to complaints made by boycotted shopkeepers that he, while ostensibly carrying out his trade in the street, took up a position near their shops, and promoted their boycotting by warning persons not to enter.

THE CASE OF PATRICK STAUNTON.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether Mr. Patrick Staunton, having appealed from the decision of a Court held at Castlemartyr, County Cork, on the 24th February last, had his sentence increased by one month by Mr. J. Hamilton, the Cork Recorder; and whether the extra month imposed by Mr. Hamilton was given subsequent to the confirmation of the original sentence, for alleged contempt of Court; and, if so, whether Mr. Staunton will be treated during the additional period of imprisonment as a bail prisoner?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am informed that it is the case that after the Recorder confirmed the sentence he increased the original term of three months' hard labour by an additional month, owing to the violent conduct of the man in Court. He will not, therefore, be in the position of a bail prisoner during that additional month's imprisonment.

DR. TANNER: Is it usual for a County Court Judge to give hard labour for contempt of Court?

*MR. MADDEN: I have not the facts of this before me, and, therefore, I cannot answer any question relating to it.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): Is it within the jurisdiction of the Judge to increase the sentence, not in respect of the original offence, but for something that happened in Court?

*MR. MADDEN: I must ask for notice. I have not the facts before me.

MR. SEXTON: This is a question of general principle, and not dependent on the facts of a particular case.

*MR. MADDEN: I can only repeat that I am not acquainted with the facts of the case; but it is absolutely in the power of the Judge, on the hearing of an appeal, to increase the original sentence. I presume that the demesnour of the accused was an element in the consideration of the case.

MR. SEXTON: I want to know whether the decrease or increase of the original sentence must not have relation to the original offence?

MR. J. O'CONNOR: Is not the County Court Judge a landlord at variance with his tenants, and is he, therefore, competent to try cases in which disputes between landlord and tenant are concerned?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I know nothing about that.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: Is it in the power of any County Court Judge to sentence a man to hard labour for contempt?

*MR. MADDEN: I must respectfully repeat, it would be much more satisfactory if the facts of the case were before me before answering this question. No general expression of opinion in such a matter can be of much value unless applied to the facts of a particular case.

*MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): The right hon. Gentleman has stated that it is perfectly clear that a Court of Appeal has power to increase sentences on appeal. May I ask whether the attention of the right hon. and learned Gentleman has been called to the statement of the Master of the Rolls in a Debate in the other House, to the effect that—

"Equally contrary to English law was it that a sentence passed by a Judge should be increased, but a sentence that was too severe might be diminished."

and whether that statement of English law by Lord Esher is also the law in Ireland?

*MR. MADDEN: I have not any knowledge of the particular facts of the case to which that general statement referred to by the right hon. Gentleman applies. I think it is inconvenient to ask for a commentary on such a statement without giving notice. If the right hon. Gentleman will kindly put a question on the Paper, I will examine into the subject, and see whether there is any inconsistency between that statement of the law and the position in Ireland with reference to the power of County Court Judges to increase sentences on appeal.

MR. T. M. HEALY: With regard to increasing sentences on appeal, I wish to ask whether the Chief Secretary has seen a letter addressed by the right hon. Member for West Birmingham to a correspondent, stating that the increase of sentences was un-English, more honoured in the breach than in the observance, and practically promising that it would not occur again. I know the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham has no power to pledge the Government to any action; but will the right hon. and learned Gentleman, in these circumstances, examine into the facts of this case, and be good enough to advise the Lord Lieutenant to remit the sentence?

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): The hon. Member has referred to a letter of mine. I do not recognise its contents in the account which he has given of it.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I am glad to hear the right hon. Gentleman repudiate even so gracious a letter.

MR. AMBROSE (Middlesex, Harrow): As to the observation of the Master of the Rolls, I wish to ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman whether it is not within his knowledge that the Lord Chancellor, in the course of the same Debate, mentioned the practice as within his experience, and referred to a very old case in which sentence was increased on appeal.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: I rise to order, Sir. Is it in order to refer to a Debate in the other House?

*MR. SPEAKER: Reference has already been made to the other House; but I think the whole discussion is becoming one of general law, and is out of place in answer to a question.

THE LOCAL TAXATION BILL.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.): I beg to give notice that I shall at the proper time move as an Amendment to the proposed dealing with the £50,000 unappropriated out of the new Whisky Tax in Scotland, that the money be devoted directly to the completion of a scheme of free primary education.

MORTALITY AMONG CORNISH MINERS.

MR. CONYBEARE: I wish to ask the Home Secretary a question of which I have given him private notice. It is whether his attention has been called to the report of a speech made a few days ago by Mr. Pinching, Government Inspector of Mines in Cornwall, with reference to the excessive mortality among Cornish miners? He said—

"Their friend Mr. Conybeare asked two questions in the House of Commons on the previous night with regard to the unsanitary condition of Cornish mines. He thought Mr. Conybeare was mistaken in his question, and mistaken in his premises. He did not mean the unsanitary condition of the mines in the ordinary acceptance of the term, but the unsanitary condition of the air in the mines. He did not think it would be a breach of confidence to say that he had the pleasure of replying to the questions. Since the Report of Dr. Ogle was written, the conditions had much altered. The excessive mortality of Cornish miners was attributed to excessive ladder climbing and bad air. Since the Report was written, he was able to say the causes had been almost entirely eliminated by the improvements in machinery adopted for raising and lowering men, and boring machinery which produced a current of air in foul ends; and except the men themselves were guilty of an omission, there was no danger whatever to be expected from phthisis, which was the miners' complaint. He hoped the question would be answered that afternoon, and the answer would probably relieve their friend's mind."

I wish to know whether the inquiry promised last Monday has taken place, and whether the Inspector has presented any Report thereon; whether it is part of the duty of a Government Inspector who has been instructed to hold such an inquiry to prejudice beforehand the case by making such ex parte statements in after-dinner speeches, and whether, having regard to the fact that by his speech Mr. Pinching has destroyed all confidence in the value of any Report he might hereafter present on this subject, he will cause the promised inquiry to be held by some independent and impartial authority?

MR. STUART WORTLEY: The Inspector replied provisionally by telegram to the inquiries which the Secretary of State addressed to him when the hon. Member first placed his question on the Paper. Such reply did not arrive in time to enable its substance to be given in the House. It was to the same effect as the words used in the speech referred to. The full written Report from the Inspector has not been yet received, but is daily expected. The Inspector when he made the speech was no doubt under the belief that the substance of his telegram had by that time been communicated to Parliament, and he was probably anxious to allay as soon as possible any further anxiety that might be felt on the subject. The Secretary of State is not aware of any circumstances calling for any inquiry other than what it is the duty of the Inspector to conduct, and which he can be perfectly trusted to conduct with impartiality.

MR. CONYBEARE: The question was asked this day week in the House, and yet full particulars are not yet forthcoming. Will the right hon. Gentleman, with a view to satisfying the population of Cornwall in this matter, order a public and impartial inquiry at which the men can be represented? My constituents demand it, and nothing less than that will satisfy them.

MR. STUART WORTLEY: If the question is of such gravity, it seems to me that the hon. Member should have given notice.

MR. CONYBEARE: Then I beg to give notice that I shall give notice.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. SEXTON: When will the Amendments to the Local Taxation Bill be put down, and what is the business for to-morrow?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The Government hope that the Amendments to the Local Taxation Bill will be in the hands of Members on Wednesday; they will be put on the Paper to-morrow. To-morrow further progress will be made with the Census Bill, the London County Council Bill, and afterwards the Army Votes. On Wednesday, the Post Office Votes will be taken first.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary whether he will place on the Paper his proposal with respect to the suspensory clauses relating to Ireland?

SIR W. LAWSON (Cumberland, Cocker-mouth): When is it really intended to take the Local Taxation Bill?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: It is really impossible to do more than one thing at a time; but if the hon. Baronet gives me an assurance as to the progress of business for the next four or five days, I shall be able to state when the Local Taxation Bill will come on. I hope we shall be able to take it this week.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think that the number of Amendments renders it doubtful whether the Government will be able to pass that part of the Bill which relates to new licences.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Will any notice be given to Irish Members as to the proposal with regard to Ireland.

SIR W. LAWSON: Is it to be understood that it is doubtful whether the Government will go on with the suspensory clauses?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I stated to the House that the clauses would not be proceeded with if they were opposed, and there are two or three pages of Amendments on the Paper.

SIR W. LAWSON: Does the right hon. Gentleman mean by opposition, amendment?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Certainly; if amending takes the form of obstructing.

MR. F. STEVENSON: When will the Bill for the cession of Heligoland be taken?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I will state positively to-morrow whether the Heligoland Bill will be taken on Thursday, as I hope may be the case.

MR. ESSLEMONT: Can the right hon. Gentleman name a day for the Scotch Estimates?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I cannot say when the Scotch Estimates will be taken.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Will the right hon. Gentleman answer my question?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes. Nothing will be done with regard to Ireland, except by a preparatory measure, as in the case of England and Scotland. I believe there are a number of Amendments now down on the Paper which renders it very doubtful whether we shall be able to pass that part of the Bill preventing the new licences.

MR. DILLON: I want to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant whether he could not see his way to postponing Report of Supply until to-morrow evening, as there are some Members exceedingly anxious for a discussion on the Land Commission? Will the right hon. Gentleman adjourn Supply to-morrow night at about half-past 10, and take this discussion, which will occupy an hour and a half?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: If the hon. Member and his friends express a desire that we should adjourn Report until to-morrow night, we shall do so; but we could not undertake to interrupt proceedings on the Army Estimates at half-past 10 o'clock.

MR. DILLON: It is of no use adjourning it until to-morrow unless you give a reasonable opportunity for discussion. Really, the Chief Secretary will not deny that we gave great facilities for getting through the Irish Votes last week. I could have talked this Vote out last Wednesday quite easily.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Gentleman is perfectly accurate in what he says with regard to his behaviour on Wednesday. He could easily have talked this out. If business can be got through by half-past 10, every opportunity will be afforded for the discussion which the hon. Gentleman desires.

MR. BAIRD'S LOBSTER FACTORY.

MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee): Can the Government confirm the statement in this morning's papers from Newfoundland that the litigation as to Mr. Baird's lobster factory has terminated by the commanding officer paying the damages claimed by Mr. Baird; and is the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs prepared to state what was the legal authority under which the commanding officer acted?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I must ask for notice of that question.

JUSTICE HARRISON AND LYNCH LAW IN IRELAND.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I wish to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland whether his attention has been directed to a statement made by Justice Harrison at Galway on Friday last. Speaking of the condition of the county he used the following words:—

"In the eastern district I am sorry to tell you the evidence is the other way. The cases here are very serious, arising out of causes with which you are all familiar. The state of things here is such that why the people—I do not speak now of any section of the people or the officers of the law, but the whole people—who are the real sufferers by having to live under such conditions do not rise up and use lynch law is a mystery to me. I am astonished they do not do so. If they did, I think it would be a happy day for the administration of the law. It now seems completely paralysed throughout that district of your county."

I will further ask, Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that lynch law is to take the lives of individuals without any sanction from the law, and is he aware that that language must be interpreted by the people of the country as an invitation from the Judge to murder certain individuals in that county; and what course does the Government intend to adopt?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have seen the report of the Judgment referred to. Whether that report is accurate or not I cannot say. I should guess, however, that it is not accurate; but, in any case, I am certain that no such invitation as that suggested was ever made by the learned Judge, or that his language can be interpreted by the people of the district in the sense supposed by the hon. Member.

MR. DILLON: I am able to state on the authority of one of the Grand Jurors that the report is accurate. I wish to know whether the Executive will call on the Judge for an explanation. I propose to place a Motion on the Paper condemning this language; and I ask the leader of the House whether he can see his way, supposing after inquiry the language is found to be accurate, to consent to give me an opportunity of bringing that Motion forward?

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): From what is the hon. Member quoting?

MR. DILLON: From the report in the Freeman's Journal of Saturday last. I have also here with me the Dublin Daily Express, which quotes the language of the Judge with approval, and intimates that, in its opinion, it would be a very proper course to follow the advice of the Judge and use lynch law. Before bringing the matter before the House I was at pains to ascertain from a member of the Grand Jury of Galway, who listened to the speech, that the report was perfectly accurate.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: Seeing that the hon. Member has been the victim of misreporting this week, did he ascertain from Mr. Justice Harrison if the Freeman Report was accurate?

MR. DILLON: I did not ask; I put that question to the leader of the House whether, on the supposition that the Government ascertain that the language has been correctly reported, he will give me facilities for bringing this Motion before the House?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I think in a matter which affects a learned Judge it would be wrong for me to assume that language of this kind had been held, and I therefore cannot consent to the hon. Member's request.

MR. DILLON: I will put the question down for Friday, in order to give the Irish Executive a full opportunity to satisfy themselves. I repeat that this is a question on which the Irish Government ought to satisfy themselves whether the language was used. I ask the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government to give me an opportunity of bringing my Motion to an issue on this point.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Irish Government have no right to address questions to the Judges. No doubt Mr. Justice Harrison will see what has passed in the House, and if he chooses to give me an account of his charge I shall be grateful for it. We have no title whatever to interfere, directly or indirectly, with the action of the Irish Judges.

MR. DILLON: I shall certainly give notice to the First Lord of the Treasury on Thursday next that I shall ask him for an opportunity to bring forward this Motion.

SCOTCH SALMON FISHERIES.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I beg to ask the hon. Member for Wigtonshire, in the absence of the Lord Advocate, why the terms of Reference to the Commission on the Scotch Salmon Fisheries have been omitted from their Report?

SIR H. MAXWELL: The terms of reference appear to have been omitted by an error of the printers—an error overlooked by me in correcting the proofs. They were as follow:—

“The Committee to inquire into the exercise of the Crown rights in the salmon fisheries of Scotland, on the coasts, and the seas adjacent thereto, and their effect on the preservation and supply of fish.”

SIR G. CAMPBELL: Can we have that in print? And I should like to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Lord Advocate is absent on public duty or through indisposition—

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

SIR H. MAXWELL: My right hon. and learned Friend is sitting on a Committee, in which hon. Members for Scotland are interested.

MR. P. MAGAN, J.P.

MR. HAYDEN (Leitrim, S.): I wish to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether any steps have yet been taken by the Irish Land Commission to recover the money alleged to have been fraudulently obtained by Mr. Percy Magan, J.P., under the Arrears Act; what explanation of his conduct he has given to the Land Commission; and whether Mr. Magan still continues to hold the Commission of the Peace for the Counties of Roscommon, Westmeath, and Wexford?

MR. MADDEN: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will repeat his question again. I have been in communication with the Land Commissioners, but have not yet received an answer.

MR. HAYDEN: Will the right hon. Gentleman give us a Report when the Vote comes on?

MR. MADDEN: I will see when it comes on.

ON-LICENCES.

Order [20th June] for Return relative thereto read, and discharged; and, instead thereof,—

ON-LICENCES.

Address for—

“Return of (1) the number of On-Licences in each licensing district where the tenant and owner on the register are different persons; and (2) the number of persons in each district, and the names of such persons, who are on the register as owners of two, three, four, and any greater number of premises in respect of which On-Licences have been granted, with the number of such licences attached to each name.”—(Mr. Sumners.)

CENSUS (EXPENSES).

Committee to consider of authorising the payment, out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, of all expenses that may be incurred for the purposes of the Census under any Acts of the present Session for taking the Census of England and Wales, Scotland and Ireland (Queen's Recommendation signified), Tomorrow.

NEW MEMBER SWORN.

John Wilson, esquire, for County of Durham (Mid-Division).

PILOTAGE PROVISIONAL ORDERS.

Copy ordered—

“Of Memorandum stating the nature of the proposals contained in the Provisional Orders included in the Pilotage Orders Confirmation Bills (No. 1) and (No. 2).”—(Sir Michael Hicks Beach.)

Copy presented accordingly; to lie upon the Table, and to be printed. [No. 313.]

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS.

That they have agreed to,—Western Australia Constitution Bill, without any Amendment; Intestates' Estates Bill, with an Amendment; Boiler Explosions Act (1882) Amendment Bill, with Amendments.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

ALDERSHOT ROADS (RE-COMMITTED) BILL.—(No. 379.)

Bill considered in Committee.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That Clause 7 be added to the Bill.”

(5.14.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): I desire to point out to the House that under the clause as it stood it was open to the War Office to shut up the roads over the whole of the Aldershot lands. But the Select Committee inserted very important Amendments, by which two tracks across the centre of these lands shall not be closed to the public, except during the time of rifle practice. The effect of that will be that the War Office will not be able to fence these two tracks, and the enjoyment of roads across the Aldershot lands will be secured to the public, except during the time of rifle practice. That being so, opposition to the Bill has been disarmed.

(5.15.) MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): There are one or two matters I should like to bring before the Committee in reference to this clause, which I think are worthy of attention. I would first of all point out that, notwithstanding the reservations that have been put into the Bill, the public rights have been seriously interfered with at Aldershot. Although it is impossible at this period of the Session to make any effective opposition to the Bill, I do not think this clause ought to pass without some notice being taken of the fact that we protest against the encroachments made by the Secretary for War on the public rights. The clause also provides for compensation for the abandonment of certain rights of way, but that compensation is not to the public whose pathways have been abolished, but to the owners and occupiers of the adjoining lands. I venture to say that, in the opinion of the general public and of the majority of this House, the individuals who will really suffer from the removal of the existing rights of way are not the owners and lessees of the adjoining lands who have hitherto had the right of user, which is now being so seriously restricted. I should like to ask the Secretary for War in what form it is proposed that grants of money for compensation purposes are to come before this House. Are they to be inserted in the Army Estimates or in what other form? In future, when it is proposed to grant public money for such a purpose, I think the Government will find that their proposal, if not hotly opposed, will be seriously criticised by hon. Members, and we certainly ought to be informed as to how the money is to be voted, and all the conditions of the proposed compensation. Another point is this: In Sub-section 2, Clause 7, the tribunal to which those who deem they are suffering under any grievance will have to appeal will be the Chairman of the County Council of Surrey and the Secretary for War. It is satisfactory to those who, like myself, have striven to put the control of the public rights of way into the hands of the County Councils of England and Scotland to hear that in this Government Bill the County Council is to be made a joint arbiter with regard to questions of right of way. In conclusion, I have to say that I accept, under protest and with very great reserve, the clause that has been here inserted.

*(5.20.) THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): I am glad the hon. Member approves the tribunal that we have formed. Any compensation under the Bill will be provided in the Army Estimates, and I trust the Committee will find that the operation of the clause will prove by no means so dangerous to the neighbourhood as the hon. Member supposes.

Clause agreed to.

*(5.22.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: The object of the clause I have to move is to prevent the War Office from selling or alienating any of the land of Aldershot without the sanction of Parliament. A few years ago these lands at Aldershot extended over 11 square miles of common, and was subject to the ordinary common rights, being practically inalienable; that is to say, it could not be sold by the lord of the manor and could not be enclosed without the sanction of Parliament. When the War Office were authorised to purchase the rights of the lord of the manor, they asked power to buy up all the rights over the land. There were a number of old footpaths, and as long as they existed it was difficult for the War Office to deal with the ground. Since the War Office became owners of the fee of the land, and have been enabled to extinguish the commoners' rights, they have sold a number of outlying pieces of the common. There are a great many bits of outlying land which form features of great beauty to the surrounding country, and are therefore much appreciated by the public; but a considerable number of these have been sold by the War Office during the past two years. The neighbouring landowners are exceedingly anxious to get these outlying pieces, some wanting them to add to their game preserves, others in order to get nearer to the high roads, while others may desire them with a view to speculative building. I do not think the War Office should be allowed to part with these lands without regard to the public interest; and therefore I propose this clause, under which they shall not be allowed in future to sell these outlying pieces except with the sanction of Parliament. This would practically give the public the same security which they have had in the past. The practical effect of my Amendment would be that the War Office might exchange portions of the Aldershot land for adjoining pieces where desirable for military purposes; but where they wish to sell the land outright, they will have to come to Parliament for leave to do so, just as if they had been in the position of the lord of the manor. I do not think this is asking too much of the Government, who are undoubtedly obtaining a valuable addition to their property in obtaining the right to use the land for rifle practice, which hitherto they have been prevented from doing by the existing rights of way.

New Clause (Secretary of State may exchange but not sell land without sanction of Parliament.)—(Mr. Shaw Lefevre.)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed: "That the Clause be read a second time."

*(5.28.) MR. BRODRICK: I have no doubt the right hon. Gentleman has an admirable object in view in promoting this clause, but I think he will see it is one to which the Government cannot assent. I should be sorry, therefore, if he were to press the clause, as I can assure him there is no desire or intention on the part of the Government to sell any of those lands, and there is no proposal for that purpose before the War Office; but it is possible that the necessity of acquiring new land in place of some of the outlying portions of the present land may arise. The hon. Member has anticipated that possibility by providing that the Secretary of State should have power to exchange. That power does not, however, meet the case of the Government's desiring to acquire land from one owner and sell to another. To insist upon the clause would be to unduly fetter the hands of the Government, who, it must be remembered, are pressing this Bill solely in the interest of military efficiency, and not with any commercial object. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will not press the clause.

(5.30.) MR. STUART RENDEL (Montgomeryshire): As one of the Members of the Committee who voted in favour of the clause now proposed, I desire to say I think it would be a most unfortunate thing if the War Office were put under the necessity of carrying on a large land-jobbing business. We had it in evidence before the Committee that probably the value of the land when it first became the property of the Government was not more than £4 an acre. There is evidence that the effect of this Bill in extinguishing common rights will be to raise the value of the land to £50 an acre. It must be borne in mind that, whilst the use of the land for the specific purpose contemplated is not meant to be a use of a temporary character, future changes in the Service may render some new arrangement necessary, and the land may then have to be dealt with in some other manner. Undoubtedly, if they find they have any superfluity of land the War Office will be bound to sell, and they will, perhaps, be able to sell at £200 or £300 an acre. The local public are making great sacrifices in regard to this Bill, and I think it is only fair that Parliament should be consulted before the land is dealt with in any way that has not obtained the special sanction of Parliament.

*(5.35.) MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I hope the Government will accept the Amendment. My hon. Friend the Member for Montgomeryshire (Mr. Stuart Rendel) has shown that this is a matter which circumstances are very likely to change. Not only may the War Office find that there is no occasion for this land, but new arrangements may be made under new conditions of rifle practice which may make it necessary for the Government to buy back land which they have already sold. If the Government do not intend to sell, as the Financial Secretary to the War Office (Mr. Brodrick) says, there surely can be no great hardship in their accepting this Amendment. The Committee must remember that the land was originally subject to common rights, and that it could only be divested of those rights with the consent of this House. The natural thing would have been that it should revert to its prior condition in which it could not have been sold except with the authority of the House, and I do not see that any reason has been given to prevent the House from exercising that authority, considering how improvident some of the bargains made by public departments have been—

MR. W. H. SMITH: I think the right hon. Gentleman is hardly justified in making statements of that kind without giving instances.

MR. BRYCE: I thought that it was a matter of common notoriety.

MR. W. H. SMITH: It is just the reverse.

MR. BRYCE: We have frequently had cases in which sales by the Woods and Forests Department were questioned in this House as being improvident. I shall take the first opportunity open to me of substantiating the remarks I have made. I make no imputations on the War Office in this matter, but, in view of the fact that imputations have been made, I think the War Office should not have the opportunity of making these sales without the consent of Parliament.

(5.40.) MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I think most of us on this side of the House will be able to give illustrations of the improvidence of bargains made by public departments. I myself can promise to give one with regard to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners when the time serves. I venture to support this clause, and I would point out that it was rejected in Committee simply by the casting vote of the Chairman. We all know that when a Committee is equally divided on a question it is the rule for the Chairman to give his casting vote against a new proposal. There is one important circumstance which should not be lost sight of in connection with this matter. It was stated in evidence that, in consequence of the ranges of the National Rifle Association being established at Bisley, Purbright would probably become a large centre of population. If that be so, as the rights of the neighbouring population have been so materially curtailed in respect of the great tract of land over which shooting will now take place, I think it highly important that something should be done with the view of benefiting the people in the locality. The question of using these outlying bits of land for shooting purposes does not arise in the minds of those who have inspected the plans. There is one considerable plot of land on the south-east of the main tract, and in my judgment it would be very likely to become an important site for a public park or recreation ground in view of the increased population of the district. It was in view of preserving the rights of the public, and of giving them the chance of acquiring such pieces of land for the public benefit that I voted for this clause in the Committee, and I shall vote for it again if it is pressed. Cannot the hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill undertake that in the event of any considerable plots of land being sold a right of pre-emption shall be given to the County Council? I do not think the objection of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Brodrick) to the clause that it would tie the hands of the War Office too much would apply to this suggestion.

Mr. Bryce

*(5.47.) MR. W. H. SMITH: I wish to point out one effect of the proposed clause. The hon. Gentleman who has just sat down said the Local Authorities might desire to acquire some of this land. But if this clause is inserted and the Local Authorities wish to purchase half an acre of land for a school or a recreation ground or anything else they will be unable to do it. It is quite certain this clause is far too stringent in its effect, and it would be impossible for any Government to assent to it.

(5.48.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: The answer to the right hon. Gentleman is that the public enjoy this land for recreation now, and there is not the least chance of the Local Authorities desiring to buy them for these purposes. No answer has been given to my statement that the War Office may sell these bits of land. A considerable number of them have been sold in the past and no doubt will be sold in the future, although, perhaps, not by my hon. Friend (Mr. Brodrick), because he is a Surrey man, who knows the value of these lands to the public. I hope the House will assent to the Motion.

*(5.49.) MR. BRODRICK: I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that during the four years I have been in office no pressure whatever has been brought to bear on us to sell. We have no desire to sell. We want to keep our property. But if this clause be adopted we shall be fettered as no public department is fettered.

(5.50.) MR. CONYBEARE: The suggestion I make is that the Local Authorities should have a voice in the disposal of this land, so that they might prevent the War Office from disposing of little bits of land which might be available for public purposes. Is it not possible to defer further consideration in order to provide a means of meeting these scruples?

*MR. BRODRICK: I fear the proposal of the hon. Member does not meet cases such as I have referred to, where we should possibly buy from one owner and sell to another.

(5.51.) COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I think the contention advanced by the right hon. Gentleman is most reasonable, and his proposal a necessary one. We are giving the Department great power to close roads, but that I think is quite right in view of the new range. But such an Amendment as this is necessary for this reason: A number of rich people have built houses in the neighbourhood where land could be had cheap, and these are people who will be quite ready to buy up pieces of land, and, being on friendly relations with the general and other officers, to make advantageous arrangements for themselves in this way. I think the hands of the Secretary for War should be tied in this way, because it may be that some Secretary for War in the future, after this land has been sold at a cheap rate, may want to buy back the land for another range, or an artillery range, or some other purpose, and then we should have to pay 10 times the price at which the land was sold. I think an Amendment such as that proposed, or in the modified shape suggested by the hon. Member for Camborne, is extremely necessary. If any hon. Member has been to Aldershot and seen the houses there, he will find they are owned by exactly that class of people who would be willing to buy up public land at a cheap rate for adding to their gardens and pleasure grounds.

(5.52.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I understand that the Government are willing that the Local Authorities should be consulted.

*MR. BRODRICK: We are willing to give all consideration to the Local Authorities.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: If there is a provision requiring that notice shall be given before selling, I shall be content with that as an alternative clause.

*(5.52.) MR. BRODRICK: It would be extremely difficult to provide by a clause for any considerable interval before selling, but there is every disposition to consider the Local Authorities in every possible way.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: These lands are open to the public.

(5.53.) MR. CONYBEARE: The proposal is simply that notice of the desire on the part of the War Office to sell should be communicated to the Local Authorities, leaving to the latter the option of coming forward with an offer to acquire the land. We do not seek to have them called into council on the subject; but it is fair in such cases that such sales of land should not be conducted by private contracts behind the backs of the people. I do not, as I did in Committee, suggest that the sale should be by public auction; that might be detrimental to the public. What we want to secure is that these sales should not be simply conducted in an office by the War Department, but that the County Council or Highway Board should have the opportunity of putting itself in competition with private buyers to acquire the land for local purposes on behalf of the population generally.

*(5.24.) MR. W. H. SMITH: We will consider the suggestion, and, if it is possible to meet it, we will introduce an Amendment for the purpose in another place. Hon. Members are aware that we have to send the Bill there, in order that it may be considered by a Select Committee. The suggestion is not an unreasonable one.

(5.34.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: Under these circumstances I will not press the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Bill reported without Amendment; read a third time, and passed.

HOUSING OF THE WORKING CLASSES BILL.—(No. 375.)

Motion made, and Question proposed,
*That the Bill be now considered."—
(Mr. Ritchie.)

*(5.39.) EARL COMPTON (York, W.R., Barnsley): I believe it will be more for the convenience of the House if I make those remarks I have to make now rather than later on. I have no wish to impede the progress into law of a measure that will, I believe, be useful both in London and the country. At the same time, before we proceed further I should like to have an assurance from Her Majesty's Government that they do not consider this a final measure as regards the reforms so urgently necessary for the better housing of the working classes. We have had a Consolidation Bill and an Amendment Bill now amalgamated, but the Amendment Bill only touches the fringe of the question, and it is impossible to convince anybody who is interested in the question that this is a great legislative achievement. It is only now that we have this Bill before us that it is possible to amend it so that we can approach the solution of a question that has long been exercising our minds. Thanks, however, are due to the right hon. Gentleman for the manner in which he has met various Amendments, and to the Government for bringing the matter forward at all. I mention some of the points upon which the Bill is wanting, in order that the right hon. Gentleman may give us an assurance that these matters will be dealt with before the end of next Session, which is likely to be a long one. This is not much to ask, for into the question with which the Bill deals no Party feeling enters, and if the Government will undertake a further Amendment Bill they will find the Opposition ready to co-operate with them in doing what is necessary for the subject. As the right hon. Gentleman knows, Part I of the Bill, or "Cross's Act," has been but slightly amended, and the process under it is still complex, tedious, and expensive. At the present moment the London County Council have under consideration an application made 13 years ago under Cross's Act, and the area concerned is pretty much in the same condition now as when the application was made. We wish to have a simpler machinery, and until we have that it is not possible that much good can be effected under the Act. First comes the representation, then inquiry, the preparation of maps and plans, the public notification during the months of September, October, and November, and then the notices served upon owners. At present a visit to a locality by the officers of the London County Council immediately becomes known, and local owners, fancying that something is going to happen, at once begin to patch and repair, so that when the question of compensation arises they may make a larger claim. I may also mention that the Bill does nothing as regards amendment of the re-housing difficulty. We have the right, under Lord Shaftesbury's Act, to erect buildings within a certain area, but we have not the right to erect buildings outside the metropolitan area. This is a matter that requires to be taken in hand. Then as regards unhealthy dwellings we have actually less power under this Bill than we had before the Acts were consolidated and amended, owing to the repeal of some of the clauses in "Torrens's Act." I think the right hon. Gentleman said he is going to introduce some Amendment in regard to sanitary measures next Session, but I hope we shall not again commence to have other Bills incorporated with this, and that we shall have to refer to the Nuisances Removable Act and other sanitary measures to complete operations under this Bill, but that the Bill itself will be amended. Then as regards the acquisition of land under the Land Clauses Act the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board has said that he does not consider the clauses of the Land Clauses Consolidation Act satisfactory. I hope, therefore, some steps will be taken to amend those clauses, so as to make them more workable. There are also two different systems of compensation, one under Part I. and another under Part II. of the Bill. I think it would be infinitely better that the same system should hold in both. Then we have to consider whether the Home Office or the Local Government Board is the authority. I do not know whether there is any jealousy between the Departments as to which should have the more work, but I do think it would be better that we should know which Government Department is the authority in all these matters. The Government have given us a small Amendment Bill, and we are not ungrateful, though, for my part, I say it is but a crumb where I should have preferred a whole loaf. I do not desire to offer any opposition to the Bill, which is a useful Bill so far as it goes. I only want now to get some assurance from the right hon. Gentleman that the Government do not look upon this measure as final, and that they will do their best to introduce a further amending Bill next Session which may be incorporated in the present Bill. That, I believe, would satisfy thousands of people in the country. Since this question has been before the House I have received letters from all parts of England, and from various people who have been working hard in this matter. These people ask me one question, namely, whether they will be able in the future to deal with small unsanitary areas which are not actually unfit for habitation. My answer has been that this Bill will have no effect whatever in that direction, but that I am in hopes that before next Session is passed Her Majesty's Government will have earned our gratitude by putting it in our power to deal with such areas. I have not put down any Amendments, I have not started any great principle, because I know that at the end of the Session it is impossible to go into the whole question. I shall be glad, however, to have some assurance that this is not, in the eyes of the Her Majesty's Government, a final measure.

*(6.12.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): My hon. Friend was good enough to give me notice that he would make some remarks upon this Bill, but I was under the impression he would make them on the Motion for the Third Reading. However, I do not complain of any observations he makes at any time with regard to the Bill, because I recognise freely the desire he and those who act with him have shown to push forward as well as they can this Bill which they regard as useful legislation. My hon. Friend wants an assurance from me that Her Majesty's Government do not regard this Bill as a final Bill. I do not know whether any Government is ever prepared to use the word "final" with regard to any proposal made, but I certainly will not use the word in regard to this Bill. I agree that the Cross Acts were not largely dealt with in this Bill. The Government thought that the pressing needs were best met by an improvement in the machinery of the Torrens Acts, because, if properly worked, they will do away with a great many of the evils complained of. With regard to the Torrens Acts, I agree that a very large amount of time is necessary before the Acts can be put into operation. That, no doubt, is to a considerable extent owing to the notices that have to be given with regard to the taking of land under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Acts. The hon. Gentleman asks me whether we will be prepared to deal soon with the Cross Acts, and also with any imperfections which are acknowledged to exist under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Acts. Having taken this matter in hand I shall feel it a great privilege to be able to deal with the whole question, so that there may be one measure dealing with the subject generally. But so far from this, as the noble Lord seems to think, being only a small measure, I think that anyone who looks carefully into it will consider it an important step in the direction in which the noble Lord looks. Even if the Bill had done nothing but consolidate existing Acts in relation to the dwellings of the working classes, it would be a most valuable measure. But the Bill also deals with a matter which has been found to be one of the greatest difficulties in the way of Local Authorities—namely, the undue amount of compensation which, under the law, has hitherto been payable to persons whose property is taken. The Committee to whom this Bill was referred will acknowledge that, so far as the question of compensation is concerned, we have gone as far as it was possible with justice to go in order to grapple with this difficulty. We have reduced by every means in our power the amount of claim to compensation, and we have provided that no compensation whatever shall be payable in respect of profits derived owing to the premises being used for a greater number of people than they can legitimately accommodate, or in respect of profits derived through the premises being used for any illegal purpose whatsoever. It will also be acknowledged that the amendments we have made in the Torrens Acts will be of enormous value to Local Authorities. The procedure has been very greatly simplified, the principle on which the Committee proceeded being that where an owner does not, after notice, place an insanitary dwelling in a proper state, the building shall be demolished. The noble Lord referred to the provisions of the Torrens Act, which made it necessary in the case of an unhealthy dwelling for the Local Authorities to consult a surveyor, and after this is done, there might be an appeal with regard to the works suggested by the surveyor. It seems to me there has been an endless hedge of appeals and counter appeals in regard to the work done, which has not only added to the cost of carrying out the law, but has prevented the law from being carried out in many cases. I think it will be found that the provisions of this Bill are much more workable. The Local Authority will be able to say to the owner of an insanitary dwelling. "We intend to apply for a closing order, it is for you to do whatever works are necessary in order to put the house in a proper sanitary condition." The noble Lord complained that certain provisions of the Public Health Acts with regard to nuisances have not been incorporated into this Bill, but this measure deals with dwellings which are unfit for human habitation, and the provisions of the Public Health Acts, to which the noble Lord refers, are inapplicable. The noble Lord alluded to a statement I have made that we hope next Session to do for the Public Health Acts that which we have done this Session with regard to these Acts. I repeat, that I hope that next Session we may consolidate and amend the Public Health Acts, and that the Amendments which we will propose will meet with the same cordial acceptance at the hands of the noble Lord and his friends as the proposals of the Government with regard to the housing of the working classes. The noble Lord seems to take exception to different principles of compensation being applied to different parts of this Bill. But it would not be fair to apply the same principle of compensation to all cases in which premises are compulsorily acquired. My noble Friend omitted to say that we have in this Bill provided for the adoption of a scheme which we regard as one which is likely to be fruitful of the greatest good—we have provided for what we may call an intermediate scheme. Under the scheme a Local Authority will be able to deal with crowded alleys and courts. The houses individually may not be unfit for human habitation, but, owing to the want of air and light, these alleys and courts may be rendered insanitary areas. The Local Authorities may, if they choose, pull down the houses and make open spaces, and in that way contribute largely to the health of the community. We have provided against the owners of property taking part in any decision which may be arrived at by a District Board or Vestry with regard to the property in which they are interested, and we impose heavy fines upon the owners of insanitary dwellings. The power of the London County Council is much enlarged by this Bill, and I feel sure that when the Bill comes to be put into operation it will be found to be enormously beneficial in securing what we all desire—namely, an improvement in the housing of the people. I have to thank the noble Lord and his friends for the way in which they have met this Bill, and for the assistance which they have afforded, without any Party bias, to the consideration of the Bill in the Committee.

(6.26.) MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I rise for the purpose of asking the right hon. Gentleman if he will during the recess be good enough to turn his attention to two particular points. The first is the machinery for assessing compensation. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will consider whether it may not be possible to set up a Special Commission, or some other authority, by which the question of compensation may be cheaply and readily settled. The second point to which I desire to call the right hon. Gentleman's attention is the incidence of cost. This consolidated Bill makes no attempt to adjust the incidence of cost, although the cost is the crux of the whole case. We have gone on year after year piling burden upon burden upon the shoulders of one particular class, namely, the unfortunate occupier. It is high time that something were done to shift part of that burden, at all events, to the backs of the ground landlords.

(6.29.) CAPTAIN BETHELL (York E.R., Holderness): I trust it will be possible next Session for the right hon. Gentleman to take the Public Health Acts in hand for the purpose of consolidation. And while congratulating the President of the Local Government Board upon this general Bill, the value of which I recognise, I feel obliged to express regret that the principle of including the County Council as the authority to take part in matters connected with the public health is not more jealously guarded than in the Bill before us. One principle which is not very satisfactory is, allowing the County Council, when District Authorities cannot properly do the work they are expected to do, to take the burden on their own shoulders. I have some Amendments on the Paper to meet these points, but it has been represented to me that at this period of the Session it would be inconvenient to move them. I, therefore, do not intend to persevere with the Amendments save on one or two small points.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill, as amended, considered.

(6.32.) MR. JESSE COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley): The right hon. Gentleman appealed to the Committee not to interfere to a great extent with Cross's Acts, because, he said, if they were thoroughly dealt with it would be impossible to pass this Bill this Session. As the Bill contains so many valuable provisions, to say nothing of its feature of consolidation, which is very important, we all thought it would be a great public loss if the measure did not go through this Session, and, therefore, we avoided amending these particular Acts—the General Housing Acts. But the right hon. Gentleman amended them himself by the insertion of the words which I now move to leave out. My Amendment will simply restore the Acts to the position they occupy at present.

*MR. RITCHIE: Agreed.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: I understand the right hon. Gentleman agrees to accept the Amendment. I am much obliged to him, and will not detain the House by any further argument.

Amendment moved, Clause 24, line 12, leave out from "shall," to end of Sub-section, and insert "be supplied out of the Local Rates or out of moneys borrowed in pursuance of this Act."—(Mr. Jesse Collings.)

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause," put, and negatived.

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

*(6.34.) MR. RITCHIE: I move to leave out Clause 29, for the reason that Clause 93 provides for the same thing.

Amendment moved, page 16, "To leave out Clause 29."—(Mr. Ritchie.)

Question, "That Clause 29 stand part of the Bill," put, and negatived.

Another Amendment agreed to, Clause 32, page 18, lines 4 and 5, leave out "shall thereupon direct an inquiry, and," and insert "after causing an inquiry to be held."

(6.36.) MR. PICKERSGILL: I beg to move, in Clause 3, page 18, Sub-section 3, at end, to add—

"Provided that the Local Authority may make to every such tenant a reasonable allowance on account of his expenses in removing, and the amount of the said allowance shall be a civil debt due from the owner of the dwelling house to the Local Authority, and shall be recoverable summarily."

*(6.36.) MR. RITCHIE (interrupting): I propose in principle to accept the Amendment of the hon. Member, but I think the matter is one which should be dealt with by the Court when the closing order is applied for. Therefore, after communication with the hon. Member, I propose to add—

"Provided that the Local Authority may make to every such tenant such reasonable allowance on account of his expenses in removing as may have been authorised by the Court making the closing order, which authority the Court is hereby authorised to give, and the amount of such allowance shall be a civil debt due from the owner of the dwelling house to the Local Authority and shall be recoverable summarily."

Question, "That those words be there added," put, and agreed to.

(6.38.) CAPTAIN BETHELL: I desire to move, in Clause 36, to strike out "a Court of Quarter Sessions," in order to insert "the County Council." Why has the right hon. Gentleman put in the Court of Quarter Sessions here? The appeal, so far as I can understand the matter, is a purely administrative question to begin with, all that has to be decided being whether a particular house is inhabitable or an obstruction. The question is not a judicial one, but one of administration, and, that being so, it is a mistake to bring in the Court of Quarter Sessions at all. Under certain circumstances the County Council will themselves be the authority for carrying out the particular arrangement, and it would be unsatisfactory to have an appeal from the County Council itself to the Quarter Sessions. Why there should be an appeal from an administrative body to the Quarter Sessions I cannot for the life of me conceive.

Amendment proposed, in page 19, line 39, to leave out the words "a Court of Quarter Sessions," and insert the words "the County Council."—(Commander Bethell.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'a Court of Quarter Sessions' stand part of the Bill."

(6.39.) MR. RITCHIE: If my hon. and gallant Friend had been a member of the Grand Committee, he would have known that this question was twice thoroughly discussed there, and the suggestion made by the hon. Member decisively negatived, and that by a majority that was by no means a Party one. It was decided to maintain the law as it stands, and the decision was supported by some of the most advanced politicians in the House. My hon. and gallant Friend supposes that this has been put in as an alteration of the existing law, but the Court of Quarter Sessions is in the original Act, and there is a great deal of good ground for it. The question is not one of administration, and sanitary matters do not enter into it. When a house has been closed, the question arises as to whether or not it shall be taken away from the owner and demolished, and the existing law provides that the owner shall have the opportunity of going before the Court of Quarter Sessions, which is a Court of law, and before which witnesses can be examined.

*(6.41.) MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.): This Amendment was carefully considered in the Committee, and, after consideration, rejected by a majority of something like five to one.

*(6.41.) EARL COMPTON: I do not think the version we have had of what took place on the Grand Committee is quite correct. I proposed two Amendments. The first was negatived by a large majority. I then endeavoured to meet the views of the advanced politicians, and succeeded, more or less; at any rate, they all voted for me on the second occasion. There was a Division of 16 to 9, which is not quite 5 to 1, as the Chairman of the Committee has stated. I am glad the question has been again raised, but I must assure the hon. and gallant Member that it is raised in vain, for even I have given up the point. It is a good thing to see an hon. Member on the opposite side of the House stand up and contend that the County Councils should be allowed to deal with these matters without appeal to the Quarter Sessions. It is this appeal to Quarter Sessions which is the great hindrance to the proper carrying out of Torrens's Act.

*(6.44.) MR. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.): This point is one of principle, and should be decided by the House. The County Council is already made a Court of Appeal in certain matters in case of dispute with the Local Authority, or where a ratepayer thinks himself aggrieved by its order, and I see no reason why those powers should not be extended, if by doing so we can facilitate the working of the Act. Appeal to Quarter Sessions seriously interferes with the provision of better houses for the working classes.

(6.45.) MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): I do not wish to carry on the controversy as to what occurred in Committee; I only wish to say that if it were proposed in Scotland to give an appeal to the Quarter Sessions—supposing we had such a body—I, for one, should give the proposal the most strenuous opposition.

(6.46.) MR. ROWNTREE (Scarborough): I hope the House will not accept the Amendment. It is said that this is a question of principle, but there is another question of principle which may be involved, and which would create strong opposition on the part of non-county boroughs.

*MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.): I think the House will admit that I am an advanced politician; nevertheless I opposed the Amendment in the Committee, and shall oppose it now. It may happen that the property is not in an unsanitary condition at all; and I am altogether opposed to the taking away of a man's property without giving him power to go to a Court of Law. There may come a time, as the machinery of the County Councils is perfected, when you may be able to entrust all matters of this kind to such bodies. We have not yet arrived at that period. We have not that absolute wisdom and purity in our Local Government which we could desire—as was evidenced not so long ago in the case of the Metropolitan Board of Works, which is now dead and gone. In some of our municipal boroughs also we have had evidences that it would not be safe to allow them to take away a man's property without giving him a right of appeal to a Court of Law. I stood opposed to the Amendment in the Grand Committee, and I stand opposed to it now; and if we divide on the question I shall vote with the Government.

(6.49.) CAPTAIN BETHELL: I withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Other Amendments agreed to.

(6.53.) CAPTAIN BETHELL: I would suggest the insertion of the words "of the Local or County Authority" after the words "officers of health." If the local medical officer has a right to point out insanitary conditions he should report to the Local Authority. I am aware that substantially it is the intention they should act, but I think he should report directly to the Local Board.

Amendment proposed, in page 30, line 13, after the word "health," to insert the words "of the Local or County Authority."—(Commander Bethell.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*(6.53.) MR. RITCHIE: I do not quite understand the object of my hon. and gallant Friend in moving the Amendment. This object is amply provided for under Clause 53. He wishes that instead of the Medical Officer of Health of the County Council reporting to the Council he shall report to the Local Authority; but surely the officer should report to the Authority under whom he acts, and it is for that Authority to take action.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed, in Clause 46, line 14, after the word "representation," to insert the words "or complaint."—(Mr. Ritchie.)

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment proposed, in Clause 46, line 18, after the word "Authority," to insert the words "or to the medical officer of such Authority."—(Mr. Ritchie.)

*(6.54.) EARL COMPTON: I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether that makes sense of the clause, or if it is good English? Should not the word "as" be introduced to make it read?

*(6.54.) MR. RITCHIE: I think for the present it had better go as it is. It is not, I believe, an uncommon thing for an Act of Parliament to be ungrammatical.

Amendment agreed to.

Other Amendments made.

*(6.56.) MR. RITCHIE: With the object of preparing for the Amendment I shall propose to Clause 56, dealing with areas situated in more than one county, I move the omission of the words from "certificate" to "and" in lines 17.

Amendment proposed, in Clause 55, line 17, to leave out from the word "certificate" to the word "and."—(Mr. Ritchie.)

(6.56.) MR. HOBHOUSE (Somerset, E.): I understand the right hon. Gentleman has the same object in his Amendment as I have in the Amendment of which I have given notice, but we differ in that he would have the application made to the authority having the larger jurisdiction in the area, and I would have application made to both authorities over the area. I do not see quite why the jurisdiction of one of the County Authorities should be excluded.

*(6.57.) MR. RITCHIE: It is undesirable that two applications should be made to two County Councils before anything can be done in a particular area, and it is desirable that the action taken should be under one authority. Therefore, I propose in Clause 56 to provide that the authority shall be with the body having the more extended jurisdiction in the area in question.

Amendment agreed to.

Other Amendments made.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."—(Mr. Brodrick.)

*(7.11.) SIR WALTER FOSTER (Derby, Ilkeston): I have to congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on having so much improved the Bill in Committee. He has made it more effective, by accepting my Amendments to make one part of the Bill imperative, and I am glad he has shown throughout such a conciliatory spirit. The Local Authorities now have a measure under which they will be able to work with great efficiency for the improvement of the public health.

(7.12.) SIR L. PLAYFAIR (Leeds, S.): I am glad to join in the congratulations of my hon. Friend in regard to the improvements which have been introduced into the Bill, and I likewise congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on having passed a consolidatory measure. The consolidation in itself is an enormous gain to the community, but important improvements of the law have been introduced.

*MR. RITCHIE: I am much obliged to the hon. Gentleman and the right hon. Gentleman for the kind words they have used in regard to my action and the Bill generally. I should like to say this final word. Now that the law on this subject has been consolidated and amended in such a way as to remove a great many difficulties, I hope that Local Authorities will feel the responsibility now cast upon them, and take care that the law is put into operation. That will result in an enormous advantage to the public health of the community and the general good of the country.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

CENSUS (ENGLAND AND WALES)

BILL.—(No. 385.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

*MR. RITCHIE: I shall have to trouble the House for but a short time in reference to this Bill. The House will readily understand that when the year approaches when the census has to be taken the Government receive a large number of suggestions for its improvement. I have had no experience of the suggestions made to the Chancellor of the Exchequer before he introduces his Budget, but if they are anything like as numerous as the suggestions which have been made to me with regard to the census, the right hon. Gentleman must have a great deal of work cast on him. The suggestions which have been made to the Government, from time to time, are easily divisible under two heads—one a desire for increased information, and the other a desire that the census shall be taken at more frequent intervals than hitherto. I can assure the gentlemen who have made suggestions as to the first point that the Government sympathise with those who desire to take advantage of an opportunity like this to obtain accurate and valuable information upon a large number of subjects. It will be admitted, however, that such information would be dearly bought if obtained at the expense of accuracy. The more numerous the questions to be put to the householders the greater the chance not only, perhaps, of meeting with opposition on the part of the householder, but of receiving answers which are not entirely satisfactory from the point of view of accuracy. In illustration of the minute information which is desired by some persons, representations have been made, not only that the householder should be asked as to whether or not he comes under the great head of employed or employer, but also, if employed, that he should give particulars, for instance, as to what particular seam of coal he works in. Another class of suggestions made is that some provision should be made by which the information obtained through the Census Returns may be made available for purposes other than statistical. One hon. Member has urged very strongly that the number of children and their ages would be most valuable to the School Board Authorities, and ought to be supplied to them. No doubt this information would be of some value if so applied, but I deprecate in the strongest possible manner the making use of information obtained for purely statistical purposes for such purposes as have been indicated. If we departed from the quasi-confidential character of the information sought for, a spirit of hostility would undoubtedly be raised on the part of those who are asked to give the answers, thereby adding enormously to the difficulties of obtaining accurate information. The greatest mistake would be made if people were led to suppose that the information asked for would be used for the purpose of setting the law against them, either with regard to the attendance of children at school or any other subject. Another representation has been made as to the period which elapses between the taking of the census, and the establishment of something like a permanent census office has been advocated. A more frequent census would undoubtedly be attended with many advantages. There are many strong arguments to be used in favour of taking a quinquennial census, but the question is one largely of cost. If Parliament at some future time should consider that the cost may properly be incurred, I have no doubt that information of considerable importance and great value may be so obtained. The Government thought that the best course to pursue in regard to these various suggestions was to refer the matter to a Select Committee. That was accordingly done, and a Committee was appointed, which sat under the chairmanship of the Chairman of Ways and Means. They have gone carefully into the whole subject, and, for my part, I beg to thank the right hon. Gentleman for the pains and trouble he and the Committee have taken in their inquiry. The conclusions arrived at by the Committee are—(1) As to the information to be obtained, they suggest that on the front of the Return should appear columns in which the householder can enter whether he is an employer or employed, or neither. (2) That persons living on their means shall be invited to state the fact in the Return; and (3) That the number of rooms occupied by a family, if less than five rooms, shall be stated on the face of the Return. I can imagine many difficulties arising in connection with the first point. I can imagine that some persons may feel great doubts as to which of these columns they should enter their names in, and many persons will enter themselves as employers of labour when they are for all practical purposes employed. In deference, however, to the recommendation of the Committee, the Government propose to adopt the suggestion which they have made. In the ensuing census, therefore, it is proposed to ask the householder to state whether he is employed or employer, or neither, and whether he is living on his means. No change in the Bill is necessary to carry out these recommendations. It is merely a question as to the form of the Paper and the Instructions, and this can be done under the old form of the Bill. But a slight modification of the Bill is necessary in order to enable the householder to be asked what number of rooms the family occupies, if less than five; and this change is provided for in the Bill. As to a more frequent census, and a permanent census office, the Committee reported that midway between the decennial periods the number of the population, ages, and sexes should be ascertained, and that a small branch of the Census Department ought to be established. But it should be noticed that the Committee were not unanimous. Sir Reginald Welby has made an alternative suggestion, and the question of cost is one which remains largely in doubt. In these circumstances the Government do not think it desirable to provide in the present Bill for the taking of the census five years after next year. But the form of the Bill does not in any way prejudice or prejudge the consideration of a quinquennial census. The Government will undertake to carefully consider the Report of the Committee, and to go into the estimates of the cost; and before the period arrives they will be prepared to state the conclusions come to. Some evidence has been received by the Committee on the subject of a Religious Census, but no recommendations have been made. There are indications in the Report, however, which seem to show that at least some members of the Committee were not adverse to a Religious Census. Personally, I think there is a good deal to be said in its favour. But the Government have not thought it advisable to go beyond the recommendations of the Committee, and, therefore, there will be no provision in the Bill for taking a Religious Census. I assure the House that the Government will carefully consider all the suggestions which have been made by the Committee, other than those to which I have referred and which do not entail legislation, and we will endeavour to see that their recommendations are carried out. I beg to move that the Bill be read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Ritchie.)

* (7.30.) MR. W. A. MACDONALD (Queen's Co., Ossory): I would point out that while as between England and Ireland the Bills are utterly distinct, the difference as between England and Scotland is very slight, and in the latter case mainly consists in this, that while in England the authority for taking the census is the Local Government Board in Scotland it ciently detailed; it is not exact; and I despair of your getting anything like a real description of the industrial organisation of our country unless you get more permanent machinery, and the service of men whose attention is constantly directed to the compilation of these details. So with reference to the other points brought before us by medical officers. We were constantly impressed by the necessity of getting a permanent official staff to do the work. I hope my right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board will see that something is done towards this end, in concurrence with the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I understood the hon. Member for Wigan to recommend something in the nature of a religious census. The Committee approached that subject with a perfectly dispassionate mind. It put on record the fact that a religious census is taken in all our colonies, where, I suppose, religious separation is as marked as it is in the United Kingdom. It also put on record the fact that the religious census is taken in Ireland. Although, on the last occasion, the Return was made optional, still I think, out of the whole population of Ireland, there were only some 3,000 persons who did not give information as to their religious belief. But we felt that there were political difficulties which prevailed, and we were unable to advise the present Government to occupy a position which had not been taken up by its predecessors. I am not quite sure whether, in the discussion in 1880, I did not then take an opinion in favour of making the Return. If the political condition of the country would allow it, I should be delighted if the Return were made; and I have no doubt, just as in Ireland you have got a Return after Disestablishment, so in Scotland you would get a Return without objection if you got Disestablishment in Scotland. Objections would disappear if once you had Disestablishment. It was so in Ireland, and it would be so in England. But whatever the country is going to do in regard to the manner of taking the census, it is extremely necessary that you should have good workers at the bottom. Now, the choice of enumerators is a very important matter. In Ireland the police are used, and they do the work extremely well. But we cannot do that in Great Britain, where the police are not an Imperial body. Nor could the postmen or retired soldiers be used. We were obliged to leave the question very much as we found it, namely, to leave it to the District Registrars, subject to the approbation of the Superintendent Registrars, subject, again, to the Registrar General. But we suggested that a rather stringent Circular should be issued to the District Registrars with respect to the choice of enumerators. There is another matter on which we have a better prospect than on the last occasion. In 1881 the Registrar, in working out the Schedule, employed a staff of clerks, and there was an unsatisfactory Report as to the clerks employed. They were recommended without reference to their education or intellectual and moral qualifications, and one of the gentlemen engaged in the census informed me that he had afterwards met two or three of the clerks, who turned out to be not unknown to the Criminal Law! We have made a recommendation for bringing into operation the principle of competitive examination in respect of these clerks. It is probably not necessary to have a complete revision in respect of the Lower Division clerks; but I think we shall have an adequate supply of fairly well-trained clerks to do this work, and in this respect we may get better census machinery. If we are going to make a census, that which statisticians desire; if we are going to gratify that passion for statistics with which I remember the Chancellor of the Exchequer once confessed he was animated; if the census is to be made a picture of the nation in its distribution, its pursuits, and its intellectual advancement, there must be at the top a permanent organisation continually looking after the work, and perfecting it, and making it their business in life. Unless we do this, none of the results we desire to obtain are likely to be arrived at.

(8.2.) THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): In reply to my right hon. Friend, I beg to assure him that if we have not introduced into this Bill any arrangement for holding a quinquennial census, it must by no means be considered that we pronounce against such a scheme as that which has been described by the right

(7.42.) MR. COURTNEY : The President of the Local Government Board has made a kind reference to the labours of the Committee of which I have had the honour to be Chairman. While appreciating the kind words of the President of the Local Government Board, I regret to find that the Committee's labours have produced so small a result. Their chief recommendations were a quinquennial census, and the establishment of a permanent Census Office. Everything else would have followed, as a matter of course, from these. If there was to be no quinquennial census, a Census Office might represent a waste of organising labour; but if there was to be such a census, a permanent Census Office was almost a necessity. The Committee went into the inquiry with no definite opinions one way or another; but the evidence given before them was overwhelming in favour of a quinquennial census, if the census was to be useful for legislative purposes. The fluctuations of the population all over the country, especially in the mining and manufacturing districts, are so considerable and remarkable that at the end of five years the results of the last census became of little value. The Committee had before them many medical officers, who were all strongly in favour of a quinquennial census. This is, moreover, the practice of almost every civilised community, not only on the Continent, but also in the colonies of Great Britain. We were unanimous in that conclusion. With respect to the question raised by Sir Reginald Welby, we were unable to state what cost would be involved in it. We knew it would be a limited cost. Taking it at its maximum of 10 years, that would be exactly double the cost of the quinquennial census, and the result would be comparatively the insignificant sum of £170,000 additional cost. Considering the sums we pay in respect of matters to which this is ancillary, and which this additional expenditure might tend to economise, I must confess that I look to the question of expense as savouring rather of delusion. Sir Reginald Welby did his duty, and made an addition to the Report of the Committee over which I presided. But I think the Chancellor of the Exchequer, if it had come before him, would have done his duty; and if it should come before him, will do his duty by putting that addition aside. I speak now as one who has been both inside and outside the Treasury. I know what it is to do duty in the capacity of raising my watch-dog bark, and then being patted on the back and told I was a "good dog." But the thing has been done in spite of my warning; and if I had been in a superior position in the Treasury, I should have done the same thing. Sir Reginald Welby has simply done right in calling attention to the question; but the Chancellor of the Exchequer I do hope will, sooner or later—as soon as possible—act upon the broader view and proceed with the expenditure which has been recommended. It is of a very moderate character indeed, and such as ought to be freely and generously indulged in respect to the work which I have suggested. If a quinquennial census is to be taken, the Registrar and his assistants must be continuously at work in the preceding years. There ought to be two or three officers always at work on the census. In other countries, and in our colonies, they are, in fact, always hard at work on the census, and they are able to do really good work. There were many suggestions of importance which we were not able to entertain in any degree, but the advantage of which we felt if they could be carried out. If we had the plan of a quinquennial census, then the other things to which statistical inquiry was directed would be carried out almost as a matter of course. For instance, there is the important matter of an industrial census. The industrial census of England is very inferior in apparent results to, at all events, the census of the United States and of Switzerland. I say apparent results, because their accuracy is impugned. Therefore, though an industrial census is less full, it may be more trustworthy, and more valuable in the end. While we were unable to examine into the charges of inaccuracy brought against the censuses of other countries, we were fully convinced of the inaccuracy of our own in this respect. We had very much pressed upon us the extreme deficiency of the industrial census of England, and there is no doubt that, as a picture of our working population, the industrial census that we have taken is very unsatisfactory. It is not suffi-going to do their best to make the local enumerators better in character if they can; they are going to make the local registrars feel that the census-taking is not a matter of local jobbery for their friends, but an occasion for them to do the best they can to get efficient men as enumerators. The Treasury, too, are bent on securing the services of a creditable body of men to carry out the work which will be inaugurated next year. These things give us some hope that the Government is looking at the matter in a serious spirit, and that they are anxious in every way to secure that the Census of 1891 shall in many ways be in advance of the census of 10 years ago. I have one practical suggestion to make. It was certainly urged in the evidence before the Committee that many of the working men who fill up the Return do not really care much about the matter. I suggest that the right hon. Gentleman or his Department, or the Census Department, should address a polite letter to the three great organised bodies of working men urging them to take the matter up as one of interest from their own point of view. I believe such an appeal would be of great value. A letter might be written to the Parliamentary Committee of the Trades Unions, to the Central Body of the Co-operative Societies, and to the leading Friendly Societies. I feel convinced that those bodies will urge all their more intelligent members to look at the census not as a mere mechanical matter, but as a matter which, if intelligently dealt with, will increase the amount of accurate information.

*(8.48.) Mr. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I think the census should furnish the people with an accurate Return of the foreign population in the United Kingdom. According to the Census of 1881 the number of foreigners in the United Kingdom was 136,000, and in England and Wales 118,000. Taking the total population of England and Wales, this shows a percentage of foreigners of '42. The accuracy of the Return has been much questioned. I notice that by Section 5 of the Bill the census is to show the birthplace of every living person abiding in a house on the night of the census day; but if that provision is not amended, the children of foreign parents, born in the United Kingdom, will be returned, not as foreigners, but as English, or Scotch, or Irish, as the case may be. It is very important that the Government should see their way to obtain correct information concerning the number of foreigners in the country; not only of persons born abroad, but of the children of foreign parents born in this country, together with information as to the occupation of such foreigners.

*(8.50.) Mr. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): When the Chancellor of the Exchequer referred to the favourable views of the Government in industrial statistics, I could not help thinking of the difficulty already experienced in that branch of the industrial statistics to which I have specially directed my attention. In 1886 the House viewed favourably a proposal which I then made to it, and a Department of Labour Statistics was established in connection with the Board of Trade. We know that in America the labour statistics are far more complete than here. I am afraid the Treasury has greatly crippled the Industrial Statistical Department of the Board of Trade, and I would suggest that in connection with any permanent collection of statistics the Government might well consider that there is a means now at their disposal of obtaining reliable information. I hardly take the view entertained by my hon. Friend (Mr. A. Acland) as to the facility with which statistics may be got from the workmen themselves. The experience up to the present has been rather in the other direction. It is perfectly true that if Mr. Burnett, or whoever is the person responsible, had more clerical assistance more might be done. As far back as 1887 we were promised the presentation of three different parts of statistics relating to wage. We have only received two at present. The delay in presenting these and other Labour Statistical Returns renders them almost worthless. These matters are of far more importance than some may think. Labour questions are forced on the House, and it is only in consequence of possessing accurate knowledge that replies can be made to those who raise cases of hardship in the House. I am one of those who think that the general condition of the working classes is far better than it was. I think it is an improving condition, and that even the cases of poverty and misery in large centres of population are in proportion to population more rare than they were. But unless one is able to show by statistics that this is so, he is placed at a great disadvantage. It would be a vast improvement if the Census Department were made permanent, and I think even thousands of pounds would be economically spent in making the Department permanent. In connection with the textile industries, we have accurate information as to the hours of working and the wages paid to something like 893,000 workers. There is no reason that what has been done in the textile industries should not be done in other industrial departments of the country. It would, I think, prevent some of the difficulties that arise when contrast is made between the industries of this country and of other countries. I do not think that we can quite hope that the great Trade Societies can be relied upon to do as much as we would wish. Only something like one-third of the Societies—I admit they include some of the very largest Societies—have made Returns of statistics to the Department now existing, and there are no means at present of urging the Societies on. I trust the Government will give us the assurance that they will take such steps that we shall not be in the dark when a question affecting industry is under discussion, but be able to refer to the precise figures of each industry.

*(8.56.) MR. S. T. EVANS (Glamorgan, Mid): I am anxious to point out that the Bill does not provide that particulars shall be given as to whether the persons in Wales speak Welsh only, or Welsh and English. The Scotch Bill contains the provision that particulars shall be given as to whether the people speak Gaelic only, or Gaelic and English. I believe it is conceded by everybody that the Welsh people take a greater interest in their language than the English do, and certainly more than the Scotch or Irish do. This Session a Report of a Royal Commission has been presented to the House in the Welsh language, while the Scotch have never had a Report presented in Gaelic, or the Irish in Irish. That in itself shows that the Welsh people do take very great interest in their language, and that the House is prepared to admit the fact. I believe there is not a single periodical published in the Irish language, nor a single periodical published in Gaelic, although Gaelic paragraphs are sometimes published in English newspapers; but in Wales we have nearly 40 periodicals and newspapers published in the Welsh language. Even the burden of the Welsh national song is the expression of a wish that "the old language may endure;" and it is, in fact, becoming more spoken. The right hon. Gentleman is disposed, I know, to give favourable consideration to our suggestion, and I hope he will say that he will give effect to it when the Bill is in Committee. I do not think there will be any objection from any quarter of the House. Whatever may be the differences in creed or politics, Welsh opinion is certainly united upon this, and I do not think the increase of cost will be very much to provide these additional particulars in the Return. I would venture also to make one more appeal, though if I cannot have both granted, I would more particularly urge the first. But, I would ask, would it not be possible to issue the Census Papers in the Welsh language? Notices for increase of taxation are thus made known to the Welsh people, and I think concession might be carried as far as I have indicated.

*(9.3.) SIR WALTER FOSTER (Derby, Ilkeston): I quite agree with the right hon. Gentleman as to the desirability of not encumbering the Census Returns with too many details, but still there are directions in which they might be improved, especially in regard to industrial statistics, and possibly in the direction to which the hon. Member has just referred. It is essential that the Returns should be efficient and yet simple, so that they may be "understood of the people." I heard with considerable satisfaction the sympathetic words of the Chancellor of the Exchequer as to a quinquennial census, and I hope that sympathy may yet find a practical form of expression before the Bill passes through the House, in the acceptance of an Amendment providing for a quinquennial census. I urge this on the ground of public health. Health statistics based on population have done much to urge Sanitary Authorities to the due discharge of their duties, but based, as these statistics have to be, on Decennial Returns, they are apt to be misleading; and I would remind the House of the very strong recommendation of the Majority Report of the Committee in favour of Quinquennial Returns. Sir Reginald Welby, I think, was the only member who did not advise it. I am surprised to find such a large estimate made of the cost of this simpler Census; but even if the cost should be as much as some witnesses have stated, I think the money will be well spent, for it will give increased accuracy to the weekly statistics of the birth- and death-rates. In growing towns the sanitary conditions are often the worst, and unhealthy conditions are not sufficiently recognised; but with a quinquennial numbering of the population vital facts would be brought out in a way that must exercise far more influence on Local Authorities than now obtains. Then, also, in rural districts, where often there is a decline in population, although you have the death-rate and birth-rate calculated you do not get the actual and accurate state of affairs, because the result is based on the previous 10 years' fluctuation of population. There is, consequently, not the strong incentive to activity upon Local Authorities, because the statistics are somewhat conjectural. We have just been occupied with a Bill to improve the housing of the people, a Bill which has been made a very useful measure by the work of the Committee upstairs and the conciliatory attitude of the President of the Local Government Board; but one of the strongest arguments to enforce the action of Local Authorities under that Bill would be to provide frequent and accurate vital health statistics, such as a quinquennial census would supply. The expense entailed, even though it be considerable, would come back to us, and that not after many days, in the improved sanitary conditions in which our population would live. It would entail a permanent staff and a Census Department, but this would be a public advantage. There would be an accumulation of experience from one census to another in the same hands and under the same officials, who would get a greater amount of skill in taking the census and presenting the results. I hope, before the

Sir Walter Foster

Bill passes, we shall have a definite statement from the Government that they will accept an Amendment for a quinquennial census.

*(9.10.) MR. TOMLINSON (Preston): There is a question as to the date for taking the census, which, though it has not been raised in this Debate has been alluded to outside, and this, I presume, is an open one, as the date is left in italics in the Bill. Sunday is selected as the day when people are more likely to be in their homes, and is probably the most suitable day in the week. But the particular Sunday is very near Easter.

*MR. RITCHIE: The Sunday after.

*MR. TOMLINSON: That is a day on which there will be many persons who take their holidays at that season of the year who will not have returned to their homes, and I suggest that it might be desirable to make the date a week later. I regret that it has not been found possible to include the religious professions of people in England and Scotland amongst the subjects of inquiry, and I do not see good ground for excluding this information. Whatever might be the result, I am sure there would be no objection on the part of the Church of England to a religious census.

*(9.14.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): I am glad to find that the Government have not altogether decided against the principle of a quinquennial census, and I venture to suggest that now is the proper time to arrive at a decision; for if it should be decided upon, it would be introduced into the present Bill, and there would not be a necessity to introduce a Census Bill every five years. This would influence the appointments to be made for carrying out the work; it would be a permanent staff, and somewhat different to the staff appointed for the decennial census. As ex-chairman of the Statistical Society, I can emphatically say that all persons interested in the study of statistics have the strongest feeling in favour of a quinquennial census. For purposes of comparison 10 years is too long an interval; and in almost every country and in our colonies, the five years' census is adopted. My hon. Friend (Sir W. Foster) has alluded to the great importance of the subject of vital statistics, and I may mention that the Census of 1881 brought out the fact, as compared with the previous Census of 1871, that the average duration of life had increased in men by two and a half, and in women by three and a half years, the increase being mainly between the ages of 10 and 50; above 50, the duration having rather declined. What may be the cause of this very interesting fact is still matter of dispute; but it would be extremely interesting to know whether the causes operate through five years, or whether they have stopped. With regard to a religious census, I think the Government have done wisely in not entering upon that thorny subject. I am sure, if they had entered upon it, we should have found the Session prolonged a month. There is a strong feeling that the religious census taken in England does not give a fair indication of the relative position of religious sects. It is not necessary to go into the subject now, but undoubtedly there are grounds for believing that a large number of people are unwilling to declare themselves Nonconformists so long as the Established Church exists. When the Established Church ceases to exist, probably there will be no greater difficulty in taking a religious census here than in Ireland or in our colonies. I recollect hearing of a census in one of our colonies in which many persons described their religious profession as "£ s. d." It is a somewhat novel form to give to religious opinion, but I am not sure that there are not many worshippers of Mammon among us who would not inappropriately come under the definition with a truthful Return, but who now classify themselves under the Established Church. I hope that whatever changes may be made in the new census, the same classification will be followed as in former years, else it will be difficult to make comparisons. Whatever additions may be made, and there is much information desirable, I hope the same main classification will be followed. Before the Bill passes through Committee I trust that the Government will have decided as to whether a quinquennial census shall be adopted in the future. If I may gather from the opinions expressed by Members the view of the country, I think that change would be acceptable.

(9.22.) MR. D. THOMAS (Merthyr Tydvil): I would endorse what has been urged by my hon. Friend (Mr. S. T. Evans) with emphasis. I do not think the people of England realise the extent to which Welsh is spoken in the Principality. It is the language of pulpit, press, and people. When I go underground among the pitmen in the collieries I have to speak in Welsh, and as you walk through the streets of the towns you hear the people converse in Welsh. Young children of English parents coming to Wales soon learn the language, and seem to prefer to use it. One of the few young Irishmen who are employed underground, whom I met with the other day, I found using Welsh in preference to English. It is preposterous to have in Scotland a Return of the Gaelic-speaking population—they are but a small proportion of the people—while in Wales Welsh is the language of at least two-thirds of the population. Official recognition has been given to the Welsh language, as my hon. Friend has pointed out, by the Report of the Sunday Closing Commission being published in Welsh, and I may also mention the Local Government Act. The sale of that Act in Welsh must not be taken as any indication of the number of people who read the language, because it was published late, and a very good translation had already been circulated by private individuals.

*(9.25.) SIR E. J. REED (Cardiff): I support the appeal for the inclusion of Welsh-speaking statistics in the Returns, and I do so from a somewhat different point of view to my hon. Friends. They wish to bring out the extent to which the language is spoken, as I do also; but I also wish to bring out clearly the limitations of its use. Many questions are continually arising, sometimes of a political, often of a social character, and they are dealt with on the assumption by many persons, not that the Welsh language prevails in the interior of Wales, but as if Welsh were the only language used. Now, when we come to discuss such questions, for example, as Welsh Home Rule, I have a strong opinion that we shall find that a large proportion of the people have no use whatever for the Welsh language, and that Home Rule for Wales might be materially influenced in favour of the solution I should prefer to seek by the knowledge this census would give. But I entirely endorse the appeal made by my hon. Friends, and I hope it will be acceded to. I would also support the view that the census should be taken more frequently. In the case of the town I have the privilege to represent in this House, it suffers in political position because of the decennial census. At the time of the last Redistribution Bill the Government were not justified by the latest Census Returns in giving Cardiff two Members; but now Cardiff has a population of quite 130,000, and still is represented by only one Member. There are other towns in England with 50,000 population represented by two Members. But for the fact that in the Redistribution Bill the Government had only the last decennial census to go upon, Cardiff would now, as it should, have two Members. The anomaly will become more serious as time goes on, unless something is done to correct it. It must be admitted that those towns in which industries have developed and population increased ought not to be subjected to political disability on account of delay in the official recognition of statistical facts.

(9.29.) Mr. WALLACE (Edinburgh, E.): I do not object to the request that a Return should be made of the people in Wales who speak the Welsh language; but I wish to say that when that request is grounded on the fact that a similar claim has been conceded to Scotland and the Gaelic language, hon. Members have not accurately observed the provisions of the Scotch Bill. Though I may not be strictly in order, I may be allowed to anticipate the discussion of that Bill by a few minutes. I may remind hon. Members that the Schedule requires that it should be stated whether any person is blind, or deaf and dumb, or imbecile, or lunatic, or speaks Gaelic, as if all these things were ejusdem generis. Everyone is to say in his Return whether he is employer or employed; and in the absence of instruction or definition, a Government clerk might suppose that he is an employer because he has a domestic servant. I think a great many people will experience considerable difficulty in deciding how they are to fill in these columns, because a great mass of the people of the country find it necessary in some way or other to employ the labour of other people, although they may themselves be in employment. The consequence may be that we shall get an entirely fallacious view of the social condition of the country, and be completely misled. I contend that the Bill does not adequately provide for obtaining information as to whether people belong to the class of the employer or the employed, or as to whether they live on their means. Clauses should be inserted dealing more definitely with these points. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will give attention to these points.

*(9.38.) Mr. RITCHIE: I have no right to speak again, but I hope the House will allow me to say one or two words on the points raised in the course of the discussion. The hon. Member says there is no sufficient provision in the Bill for defining who is an employer or who is employed. I think that that difficulty cannot arise, because the words employer and employed are used with reference to occupation in any trade. A clerk who simply employs a servant would not come under the head of employer. The discussion has turned mainly upon a quinquennial census and a permanent staff. The House will gather that the Government regard both favourably, and what has been said will strengthen them in the view they hold. Clearly, the tendency of opinion is strongly in favour of a quinquennial census, and there can be no doubt that if it is undertaken at all it ought to be undertaken by a permanent staff. There is a great deal of force in what has been said as to the improvement of the census by the constant attention of a permanent staff, so as to make it a thoroughly reliable Return of the people and their occupations. It must not be supposed that the Government desire to express an adverse view by the introduction of the present Bill; but they feel there are many things that ought to be considered before they ask Parliament to deal with the larger question. Interested as I am in vital and health statistics I can readily recognise what assistance those who have charge of the public health will derive from obtaining a knowledge of the condition of the people every five years. I have shown that I have no prejudice against adopting the Welsh language where it can be usefully employed, because I had the Local Government Act translated. I will see that instructions as to the making of Returns are printed in Welsh; and I will consider the suggestion that there shall be a return of those speaking Welsh, to which I do not see any objection if it is the wish of Welsh Members. An hon. Member has asked for a Return of children attending school, but I think this is objectionable, as people will think it is a Return to be used against themselves. It would destroy the accuracy of the Returns if people come to think there is some ulterior motive behind them. The hon. Member for Sheffield suggests not only a Return of foreigners, but a Return as to their fathers and mothers, a request to which they might not be able to respond. The hon. Member for Preston asks why a particular Sunday is chosen. But the date fixed must be adhered to, unless we have strong grounds for thinking that the day is inappropriate. References have been made to the enumerators, but the House may be assured that the greatest care will be taken that those who are selected will be chosen without any regard to their political views, and solely with a view to their efficiency in the duties they will be called upon to perform.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for to-morrow.

CENSUS (SCOTLAND) BILL.—(No. 387.)

Bill read a second time, and committed for to-morrow.

CENSUS (IRELAND) BILL.—(No. 386.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this Bill be now read a second time."

*(9.50.) MR. WEBB (Waterford, W.): The only objection I have to this Bill is the machinery by which it is proposed to work it. I should not object to the police being employed if stringent precautions are taken to ensure that the information obtained is not utilised for other than census purposes. We must all be aware that in many respects the relations of the police with the people in Ireland are not the same as those which exist here. I agree it is quite necessary that a correct census should be taken. I was particularly struck with the remarks of the Home Secretary regarding the inconvenience of having an enumeration of school children, because I am sure that, if such an enumeration were insisted on, parents would feel that the information would be used for other purposes. We know that the police have used the information contained in the last census papers for purposes to which it was not intended originally to apply it, and I think the Government should now assure us that the census papers at the next census will not be used for police purposes. Why, indeed, should the Government object to put in the Bill a clause giving that assurance? Why, also, should they not impose a penalty upon the improper disclosure and use of such information? It is my intention to propose clauses making some such provisions. There should be a minimum penalty of £2 for falsification of the Return. I hope, also, that the opportunity will be taken to ascertain the number of Irish-speaking people in Ireland.

(9.54.) MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I would strongly urge on the Government that the census should include a Return of the people speaking the Irish language. In every other country in the world the taking of the census is an occasion for rejoicing and self-congratulation on the advances which have been made; but the last four censuses in Ireland have told a terrible tale of how the people have wasted away. I am afraid that the forthcoming census will tell a similar story. I hope the Return will be made in such a form as to show to the House what is one of the most sad features in connection with the Irish census, namely, that the decrease has taken place in the richest districts, whereas the poorest districts, such as those in the North West, remain over-populated. With regard to the Return of Irish speaking people, I may say there is a strong feeling in Ireland in favour of preserving such a remnant of the past as that language. But I rose chiefly to appeal to the Government on another matter. The Irish Census differs from the English Census in this particular. In Ireland, people are asked what their religion is, but in England they are not. Why, then, in Ireland should we not in the same way ask the opinion of the people on the great political question of the day? I put it in all seriousness to the Government and to the Liberal Party that the time has now come, when, without much trouble and expense, this great controversy can be settled. At present, the expressed opinions as to the strength of the loyal minority show great discrepancies. Hon. Members opposite speak of it as 2,000,000 or 2,500,000. My own conviction is that it does not exceed 1,100,000. Would it not be an important element for the guidance of statesmen if we had a reliable Return? No man, woman, or child, in Ireland would have any objection to answering such a question. Would not the hon. Member for South Tyrone, or any of his friends, be proud to answer the question? We know that they would. Nothing I can say would give greater satisfaction to my friends than such a Return. The result would be to set at rest for ever all controversy as to the numerical proportions on each side. Before sitting down, I invite the hon. Member for South Belfast (Mr. W. Johnston), and the hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell), to stand up and say whether they have any objection to such a proposal. If the National Party desire it, the Unionist Party ought not to be averse to it.

*(10.1.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): I can hardly suppose that the suggestion of the hon. Member for East Mayo as to ascertaining the politics of the people of Ireland by the census is made seriously. It would certainly involve the enumerators in great difficulty. For instance, when an enumerator asks a person whether he is in favour of the policy of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, that person might ask him to explain what was that policy. [An hon. MEMBER: Home Rule.] Another hon. Member suggests that the question put should be for or against Home Rule, but a person might just as fairly ask, "What do you mean by Home Rule?" It is impossible to imagine a census being taken in such a way. I repeat, therefore, that I cannot think the hon. Member made the suggestion seriously.

Mr. Dillon

MR. DILLON: Quite seriously.

*MR. MADDEN: If the hon. Member is serious, I have given reasons why his suggestion should not be adopted. As to the suggestion of the hon. Member for West Waterford, I can assure him that no information obtained by means of the census will be improperly used. The present Bill is practically the same as previous Census Bills, and it is intended to take the census of Ireland in the same way as before.

(10.5) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): The right hon. and learned Gentleman has been ingenious, but I submit that he has not been convincing, and that, unless he offers some better arguments than he has just advanced, the House will be disposed to think that my hon. Friend is entitled to what he asks for. The right hon. and learned Gentleman has suggested that there would be difficulty in replying to a question as to whether or not an Irishman is in favour of Home Rule; but there would be no difficulty in getting him to say whether he is in favour of the establishment of an Irish Parliament. At present a person is asked what religion he professes, and a similar objection to that urged by the right hon. Gentleman against the political question might be made against this, for it might be said that a person, when asked whether he is a Protestant, would require to know the distinction between the Protestant and other Churches, or, when asked whether he was a member of the Episcopal Church, would require the enumerator to expound the Thirty-nine Articles. But no such difficulties do arise, and they will not arise if the suggestion of my hon. Friend is carried out. The suggestion that the number of people now speaking the Irish language should be ascertained through the census is an important one, and I hope the Government will give it consideration. As to the undue use of information obtained by the census, it is not difficult to imagine cases in which such information might be used to annoy or to prosecute. I would suggest that the Government should make provision against this in the Bill, otherwise I should be disposed to move an Instruction after the Second Reading, or a clause in Committee, imposing a penalty on persons who improperly disclose information obtained through the census. It is the duty of Parliament to fix not only the maximum but the minimum penalty.

(10.10.) MR. W. A. MACDONALD (Queen's Co., Ossory): This Bill differs in many respects from the English and Scotch Census Bills. In England the enumerators are the overseers and relieving officers, and in Scotland the Inspectors and Assistant Inspectors of the poor, but in Ireland the Dublin Police and the Royal Irish Constabulary do the duty. By the English and Scotch Bills a table of allowances is to be laid before Parliament before the 1st of March of next year, but no such table is to be presented in respect to the allowances to the Irish police. In the case of England and Scotland an abstract of Returns has to be laid before Parliament within five months after the taking of the census, but in the case of Ireland 12 months are allowed. I cannot see why five months should not suffice. Another difference is that, while in England and Scotland the census papers are to be left by the enumerators at the houses of the people, who are to fill them up themselves, in Ireland the police are to go round, question the people, and report the answers. I can understand this being done when Ireland was an illiterate country, and there was a large number of people who could neither read nor write: but now you will scarcely find a family where the young people, at all events, cannot read and write, and are consequently able to fill up the census papers. I say it is a positive insult to the Irish people to have policemen going round and asking who slept in their houses on a certain night, instead of giving the papers to the occupants themselves to fill up. I am sure that the Unionist Government ought to try to see that we are treated justly. We have been always hearing of equal laws between great Britain and Ireland, but this is not equal law. To get a number of policemen to ask questions is a very different thing from employing them to leave forms to be filled up by the people themselves. That is a difference which ought to be got rid of. The Bill has been most shamefully drafted. A number of particulars required for England and Scotland do not stand in the Bill at all for Ireland. In England and Scotland you are to ascertain the marriages of the people and the relations of the families. There is no such thing in the Irish Census Bill. In England and Scotland you are to ascertain who is labouring under physical or mental infirmity in a household, who is blind, deaf, or dumb, imbecile or insane: there is no such provision with regard to Ireland. Again, it is provided for England and Scotland that persons who are travelling shall on that night have their existence recorded. It is not so with regard to Ireland. The Bill, as it stands, is so imperfect that it will not give the facts in Ireland which you get in the case of Great Britain. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will see that it is amended, so that we may have an uniform census for the United Kingdom. Now, as to the argument of my hon. Friend the Member for West Belfast, that it would be easy to put on the Census Paper the question, "Are you in favour of the establishment of an Irish Parliament," I think it is perfectly valid as far as it goes. You may not like it, but it could be easily done—nothing easier in the world, and you would then have the question of Irish opinion on Home Rule settled. It would not be altogether in the nature of pure statistics, but on the point of whether or not it would be easy to obtain the information the argument is entirely in favour of my hon. Friend.

(10.20.) DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I rise for the purpose of urging the Chancellor of the Exchequer to make some reply, though I can quite understand there are difficulties in the way. The Irish Constabulary are a wholly untrustworthy body as regards the information they forward, yet they are to be called upon to ask questions. We really want some intelligible reply to questions from this side of the House. The question has been raised as to whether the people would have to answer whether they are in favour of the Home Rule of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian. That is utterly absurd, and as the hon. Member for West Belfast put it, you might as well ask a man whether he was a Wesleyan or Independent, or of any section of the Protestant religion.

(10.22.) MR. GOSCHEN: Mr. Speaker, I think most of the questions which have been raised are more questions for Committee, where they can be fairly raised. The hon. Member has complained that this Bill is not drafted on the same lines as the Scotch and English Bills. As a matter of fact, it has been drafted precisely on the lines of the Bill of 1880. There is scarcely any difference between the two drafts, and we thought it best to follow the precedent of 1880. With regard to the observations of the hon. Member for Belfast in respect to my right hon. Friend the Attorney General, I wish to point out that if once you embark on the course of ascertaining the political views of different portions of the community, it would be difficult to know where we are to stop. Certainly Gentlemen for Wales would insist on having some statements with regard to Welsh Home Rule, and Scotch Gentlemen would want statistics with regard to Scotch Home Rule. I think we do well to remain on the old lines, and to confine the census principally to the non-contentious subjects introduced in the Bill.

(10.25.) MR. P. J. POWER (Waterford, E.): There is one part of my speech to which the Chancellor of the Exchequer made no reply, and which is a matter of importance to us, namely, that in reference to which my hon. Friend has an Instruction on the Paper. On going into Committee, my hon. and learned Friend intends to move the same words in Committee, and I would suggest to the Chancellor of the Exchequer that there should be some reply to the remarks of my hon. Friend.

(10.26.) MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, S.): Sir, a phrase peculiarly offensive to many people in Ireland is "Roman Catholics." That question is to be asked—"Are you a Roman Catholic." Though a Catholic, I am no more a Roman Catholic than the Pope is an Irishman. I trust that in the forms that are to be used the word "Roman" will be omitted, and that the word "Catholic" may be used. To use the expression "Roman Catholic" is to do violence and offer offence to the minds of a great many of those of whom you are asking the information.

Mr. Goschen

(10.28.) MR. ILLINGWORTH (Bradford, W.): Sir, I think the discussion that has taken place shows that it will be wise on the part of the Government to confine themselves to matters of fact instead of entering upon the region of opinion. I do not believe that if the hon. Members for West Belfast and East Mayo were to receive, through means of the census, indisputable evidence that the majority of the Irish people were in favour of Home Rule, it would have the slightest effect in altering the convictions of hon. Gentlemen opposite. I object to the plébiscite in any form whatever.

(10.30.) COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): As to what has fallen from the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Illingworth), I wish to say that the Irish have always been willing to accept the proportion in Irish representation of 85 Home Rulers to 16 on the other side, exclusive of the two University Members—who are, no doubt, extremely valuable Members, but they do not represent the Irish people. We have always been ready to admit that proportion, but it has been universally denied by the Unionist Members and other hon. Gentlemen opposite. Therefore, we are anxious to have this plébiscite of the religious opinions of the Irish people. We believe that if such a plébiscite is taken it will show a greater proportion on our side than 85 to 16; and if the Government allow such a plébiscite to be made they will receive the support of all the Irish Members. Of course, if it is refused, the Irish Members cannot help it. As to the option being given to the Irish people to return themselves as "Roman Catholics," or "Catholics," I think they should have their choice. Some fancy one name and some fancy the other, and I think it should be left open to the people to describe themselves in any way they choose in this respect. I am of opinion that the two should be added together in the Census Returns, and that there should be no distinction made, because there really is no distinction.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for to-morrow.

(10.32.) MR. SEXTON: As a question of order, I wish to ask, in reference to the proposal I made a short time since with regard to a penalty for disclosing information obtained in the carrying out of this census, whether I can move an Instruction to the Committee now, or shall I have to bring the matter on in Committee?

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member must give notice of such a proposal.

SAVINGS BANKS BILL.—(No. 240.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

(10.33.) MR. GOSCHEN: I see two Amendments on the Paper to this Order suggesting that it would be more convenient that the names should be filled in in the first Schedule before the Second Reading is taken. I would suggest to hon. Members who are of that opinion that it is best that we should first see how the Bill turns out before hon. Members and others are invited to form part of the proposed Committee. In discussion with some hon. Members whom I should like to enlist on behalf of the Committee which is to be appointed, the opinion was expressed that unless the duties were sufficiently defined there would be serious responsibility resting upon any one who accepted appointment on the Committee. My view was that in the first instance a Committee should be appointed who should frame a scheme, and that that scheme, when framed, should be worked by another Committee. As I find that the Gentlemen I have asked to be parties to the framing of the scheme shrink from the liabilities attaching to the working of it, I should be prepared to accept Amendments in Committee limiting the functions of the first Committee to framing the scheme and regulations under which the working Committee will be appointed. From this point of view the first Committee, I think, should be something in the nature of an Executive Commission. The Bill is the outcome of a Select Committee, which has conducted a very careful inquiry into the subject, and the thanks of the House are due to that Committee for the manner in which they have carried out the details. I have received deputations from Savings Banks, and representations have been made to me from other quarters, which have resulted in my consenting to make alterations in the Bill, and the course I would propose is that the Bill, if the House will consent to read it a second time, should be committed pro forma, and then, when the prominent Amendments are proposed, we can see the Bill as a whole, and the House will be in a better position to judge of it. I would mention some of the Amendments we propose. In Clause 1, to meet an objection which has been made that the section was too strong in its original form, we propose to insert words to the effect that the Government are only responsible or liable for funds invested by Trustees, when under the National Debt Commissioners. We should have it made clear that these Trustee Savings Banks are not Government institutions, and that they have only Government security in so far as they invest in Government securities. It is most desirable that the public—and the ignorant public—who invest in these Trustee Savings Banks, should be as correctly informed as possible of the precise position of these banks with regard to the Government guarantee. Then, in Clause 2, we propose to modify the duties of the first Committee. Besides laying down regulations, we propose that they should fix the mode of appointing the permanent Committee. It would be difficult now to enter upon the controversial subject of how the banks should be represented in future on a Committee of this kind, and I would ask the House to delegate this important function to a certain number of persons to be named in the Schedule, but it will be obvious that I am unable to secure the assent of gentlemen to serve before they know how the Bill will turn out. It is a reasonable view to take to assume that hon. Gentlemen or gentlemen who are not in this House will not like to accept the position until they know the precise liability they will incur by accepting such a position. My view is that there should be three gentlemen connected with the Trustee Savings Banks on the first Committee, three other gentlemen, Members of this House, or others, to represent the views of the general public, and one gentleman to represent the depositor's and investor's position. That would form a Committee of seven to frame a scheme to be submitted to Parliament. I will not enlarge on the basis on which this Committee should be formed, because that will work out more or less identical with the suggestion of the Committee, and the Report of the Committee will show the general view that has been taken as to these duties. I trust that the House will do its best to enable us to pass this Bill, because, however well most of the Trustee Savings Banks have been managed, I think recent events have shown that there is a balance of these banks which require inspection, and I think that the public who invest in them should have the satisfaction of knowing that this inspection exists, and that a more thorough audit exists than has hitherto been possible. Then, as regards the question whether Trustees should retain their office if they do not attend the meetings for a year, I think the House will be of opinion that Trustees who do not attend to the business of the bank should cease to be Trustees. It is most desirable that conspicuous names should not be retained upon the Reports, unless the persons take some part in the management, and by that action give to the public that guarantee which the public believe them to give. Therefore, I am prepared to move a clause which will carry this into effect, and provide that a Trustee shall vacate his office unless he has attended once in 12 months. I am informed that sometimes there are very few meetings of Trustees, but there are Committees of Management, and I will introduce words which will provide that if a Trustee is absent from the meetings of the Trustees and of the Committee of Management during a period of 12 months, then he shall vacate his office, but that if he attends the meetings of the Committee of Management that shall be taken as attending full general meetings—because, no doubt, the meetings of the Committee may be more important than the meetings of the body of Trustees. There is one clause as to which I wish to say a word—the clause which gives power to make special investments. There is great liability to abuse in the matters of these investments—though the system has its conveniences—for when you have these two Departments, you have a business, one portion of which is liable to audit and another portion not so liable. I have no wish to disturb the business of the existing banks, and I shall, therefore, propose a clause which will limit in the future the power of these special investments which lie outside the business of the Trustee Savings Banks. Clause 11 refers to the limit of the amount which may be deposited by any single depositor. Hitherto the law has been that £150 has been the limit, but that may be increased by accumulated interest to any sum not exceeding £200. It has been found difficult in practice to distinguish between deposits and accumulated interest, and for that reason it is proposed in the Bill to fix an absolute limit of £200. Some persons, who do not appear to understand the object of the alterations, have taken alarm at the proposed increase of the limit. I do not attach any particular importance to that clause, and rather than expose the Bill to serious opposition, shall be prepared not to press it. Those are the principal Amendments the Government are prepared to introduce into the Bill, and I shall be extremely glad if, in the course of the present Session, we can establish a better system for the control of these banks. I beg to move the Second Reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this Bill be now read a second time."—(The Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

*(10.47.) MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.): I am sorry to have to intervene at this moment. I should have been glad if we could have gone into Committee on the Bill and have passed it very rapidly, but I must say I am not satisfied with the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer with regard to the constitution of the Committee. It seems to me that such a Committee as the right hon. Gentleman proposes would be more or less a political Committee to deal with a more or less administrative business—a business largely under the control of the State. I think the House will admit that I was justified in the course I took on this subject in February 1887, when I first brought it under the notice of the House, and pointed out how dangerous it was to leave it in the position in which it then was. The Government, I admit, have behaved well in the matter, having enabled us to deal with such fraudulent banks as those of Cardiff and Macclesfield. But the very severity of the Act that was passed has prevented its being put into operation in a great number of instances where it ought to have been put into operation. The Government consented to the appointment of a Committee, which investigated the condition of things, but I am obliged to say that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whilst he has done some things for which I never asked, has omitted to do some others which I believe to be essentially necessary. With regard to the question of investments under the 16th clause, I was never very strong on the matter. I regard the system as an outlet for the capital of some of the banks, and one which should not be lightly interfered with by the Government. One fact remains with regard to it, and that is that the banks which have taken advantage of the 16th clause are among the best and wealthiest in all parts of the country, and why they should have been singled out for attack I cannot understand. With regard to the names, perhaps, the modifications suggested by the right hon. Gentleman will meet the circumstances of the case. I never desired that anything should be done with regard to the savings banks to bring them into disrepute, or lead to their being closed. What I wanted was that the law as it stood should be carried out, believing that if that were done all these fraudulent transactions would be prevented. The right hon. Gentleman proposes that Trustees should cease to act on their neglecting their duty for 12 months. Once a year is not often to attend to such duties as that of Trustees. I am not quite sure that is quite sufficient for the purpose, and I am exceedingly sorry that with all the facts the right hon. Gentleman has laid before him by the National Debt Commissioners and from other sources, so little has been done to deal with many of these banks, which are in a rotten condition. I submit that every one of these banks, which has to close its doors without payment in full to the depositors, is a blow struck at thrift. It is known that the bank that came to grief recently at Chelsea has not yet paid its depositors in full. As far as I can ascertain, many of the small depositors have received the full amount, but the depositors of above £5 have obtained only 15s. or 16s. It has been urged that 15s. or 17s. 6d. in the £1 is a very fair dividend. It might be a very fair commercial dividend in the case of bankruptcy, but it is not a fair dividend in this case. The poor people made their deposits in the Cardiff Bank on the supposition that they were doing so on the security of the Government, and I hold that we are bound to see these poor depositors paid in full. I know that in this matter the Government deserved the thanks of the House and the country for the way in which they pursued the case in Court. Three years, however, have passed away since I brought the subject before the House of Commons, and the Cardiff depositors are not paid to-day. The Trustees have been fighting the case until, so far as I can ascertain, the actual cost of the litigation has amounted to as much as would have paid the whole of the depositors in full. Now, I say that this Bill, if it is to meet the requirements of the case, ought to so amend the law as to make the Trustees and managers of these banks attend to their duties and prevent the depositors being defrauded. Let me refer to the Macclesfield case for a moment. In that case the man who should have been held primarily responsible for the safe custody of the moneys committed to his care, namely, the actuary of the bank, has escaped all kind of condemnation, and remains to-day a J.P., whilst the poor clerk who was under him is suffering six years' imprisonment for embezzlements in connection with the bank. The doings in connection with that bank were of so gross a nature that the squandering of the money must have been known to the Trustees and managers of the bank, and could not but have been known to the actuary. It was a matter of common notoriety in Macclesfield that the clerk was squandering money in an hotel or public house near the bank itself to such an extent that it was impossible for him to meet out of his salary the expenses he incurred. If this was notorious to people generally in Macclesfield, surely it ought to have been known to the Trustees and managers of the bank, and, above all, to the actuary, who was responsible to the Trustees and managers, and who ought to have been held responsible at law instead of the clerk. I am afraid we have not yet heard the whole story with regard to the Macclesfield Bank; and unless I am mistaken, a memorial will be addressed to this House, or to the Home Secretary, which will make further disclosures, and may show that the things going on in connection with this Macclesfield Bank were actually known to others beyond the person who is now suffering imprisonment. I have referred to this case because it is very important, and I want to know how far the Chancellor of the Exchequer has attempted to meet it and similar cases in the Bill now before the House. The attendance of Trustees is a very important matter. If they only attend once in the year, a great deal may be done during the 11 months in which the Trustee does not put his foot in the bank. I want to know what is to be done to save the money of the depositors? With regard to Committees, I do not want to see semi-political Committees constituted. Already the banks in various parts of the country have far too much of a political complexion. I want them to be national in the best sense of the term, and to be national they ought to be safe. I have no great objection to the constitution of a Committee in the first instance to devise a scheme; but the permanent Committee appointed to carry out the scheme that is to be framed and to manage the audit ought to be under the management of the National Debt Commissioners, to whom the money will be sent, and who will have the documents necessary for the detection of any wrongdoing. Recently I was able from the very adequate Returns given annually to the House to indicate that a certain number of banks were going wrong. For instance, I mentioned the case of Bishop's Stortford before it was discovered that the bank had gone wrong. In that case nearly the whole capital of the bank had been silently drawn out by the actuary in the course of a very few months, and nobody seemed to have discovered it, although it was clear as noon-day in the Returns. I bring no charge of wrong-doing against the Trustees and managers of these banks, and I believe that they have given their names with the intention of being useful and doing good work. But, being Trustees, they ought to discharge all the duties appertaining to the Trust. Were that done there would be very little ground for complaint. Some have supposed that I want to make a general attack on the Trustee Banks. Nothing of the kind. I think there is plenty of room for them as well as for the Post Office Savings Banks. There is not the same need for them to-day as there was 15, or 20, or 30 years ago; but as some prefer the Trustee Banks, I say let them have them by all means. We, however, have a right to see that they are made perfectly safe for the depositors. That is especially so when we remember that year after year sums of money have been appropriated in this House for making up deficiencies in the Trustee Banks. [Mr. STOREY: No.] My hon. Friend does not seem to be aware that in one year it cost £25,000 to make good the deficiencies. The nation has had to find the money, and, that being so, it ought certainly to see that there is some security on the part of the Trustees and managers that the actuaries and servants in their employ will carry out the Act of Parliament. Some of these banks are now tottering. If the Act of 1863 were adequately conformed to, if the checks which it provides were applied week after week, there would be no possible chance of defalcations. In my opinion no sufficient reason has been adduced for not naming the Members who are to serve on the Committee, and I beg to move the Amendment of which I have given notice.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That," to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, it is inconvenient to assent to the Second Reading of this Bill before the terms of the First Schedule of the Bill have been filled in."—(Mr. Howell.)

*(11.10.) MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I rise in no spirit of hostility to the Bill to second the Amendment. I accept with gratitude the Amendments which have been referred to by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer as being an improvement of the Bill. The Select Committee which considered the question was appointed on the Motion of my hon. Friend (Mr.

Howell), and although I thought that my hon. Friend, in moving for the Committee, played the part of an alarmist, I feel bound to say that as witness after witness came before the Committee my opinion more nearly approached his, and I have now to endorse what he has said respecting the somewhat dangerous position of some of these banks at the present time. I agree entirely with my hon. Friend that Parliament has very considerable responsibility in this matter. Undoubtedly there has been thrown on the taxpayers of the country some financial burden in connection with Trustee Savings Banks, and in proportion as these Banks are likely to be useful so it is bound to remedy any evils marring that usefulness. There is much greater latitude given by them with regard to the withdrawal of deposits than is given by the Government Savings Banks. There are, however, undoubtedly very erroneous ideas among the working population as to the responsibility of the State with regard to these banks. I think that the investment of large sums under the Act of 1863 is not without danger. Undoubtedly, use is made by some of these banks of the names of persons who have long ceased to be of any service, or to feel themselves responsible for the conduct of the bank. I hope the Bill will prove successful in grappling with these difficulties. Coming to its provisions, I think there should be some distinct notice, as suggested in Clause 1, that the State was only responsible to a limited extent for the sums deposited. I agree entirely with my hon. Friend as to the desirability of having the names of the Committee, and also full particulars under Schedule 1, and I do not think that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has disposed of that objection. With respect to the Committee of Inspection, the proposal is based upon the recommendations of the Select Committee. That recommendation was only carried by six votes against five, and I think the Chancellor of the Exchequer will agree that that did not amount to a very strong expression of opinion on the part of the Committee. I am not prepared to take the responsibility of taking steps to throw over the Committee under the Bill, although I am not at all sanguine as to the advantage of setting it up. The issue of the matter rests entirely on the names of the persons selected to serve upon the Committee. I am very glad to hear that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has determined to stand by Clause 6. The Select Committee reported unanimously—

"It is evident that the character of the names appearing on the list of Trustees must have great influence on the depositors, and there is some reason to think that names are often retained on the list after the persons have become unable, through ill-health, removal from the locality, or other causes, to make themselves responsible for the conduct of the bank."

As to Clause 7, no one who has looked into the matter will deny that the clause is most essential. I hope we shall see no weakening of it in Committee. I agree with the hon. Member for Bethnal Green that it is most extraordinary how the Lord Chancellor can have seen it compatible with his duty to retain in the commission of the peace Messrs. Stringer and Eaton, whose conduct was so animadverted upon in regard to the case of the Macclesfield Bank. Clause 10 deals with special investments. I am glad there is to be some alteration as to investment. When I look at Return 51, which was laid before the House this Session, and saw the character of the investments that have been made by banks in certain districts, I am obliged to say, speaking from some years' experience of banking, that those banks have carried out rather risky operations. In conclusion, I have only to say I do not object to the scheme of an independent Committee; it may fail, and I am quite sure it must fail, unless the Framing Committee are extremely careful as to how the Committee of Inspection is constituted, and as to the nature of the duties it has to perform. I believe that, if Trustee Savings Banks are prudently conducted, as a number of them are, they have a very useful and successful career before them. In districts where gentlemen of position are found ready to give up much of their time without any hope of reward, and just as a labour of love to the work of these banks, these banks succeed. It is only those banks which fall into the hands of mere officials which fail. I therefore hope that the Amendments which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has enumerated will be adopted, so that the Bill will bring about a much-needed reform.

*(11.25.) MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): It seems to me obvious that it is almost impossible for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to give the names until it is known what the Committee has to do. I am sure hon. Members have no idea of the responsibility of this Committee, and I cannot conceive anybody accepting the appointment as the Bill now stands. There are about 350 of these banks; they hold something like £45,000,000, and they have 1,500,000 depositors. Until the Committee is appointed, the gentlemen who are named in the Schedule will have themselves to carry on the inspection and audit of all these banks. Clause 4 provides that the Committee shall not be a paid body, but shall do its duties simply as a labour of love. It seems obvious that no one can undertake these duties until this clause is somewhat altered in the direction of the duties being made somewhat less onerous. With reference to the views of the Select Committee, it seems to me a great pity that the recommendation of that Committee upstairs was not adopted more completely. Unless the audit is done most thoroughly, the result must be disastrous. I am one of those who believe that Trustee Savings Banks have been very wonderfully conducted. When we look at the history of these institutions and find the enormous sums of money that have passed through them—something like £250,000,000 in 25 years—and we find that, with the exception of the Cardiff Bank, there has been hardly any loss at all. I think they reflect great credit on those who conduct them. But, at the same time, there is no question that machinery is wanted to secure that the accounts shall be properly audited. The Committee upstairs went into the matter very carefully; and although I candidly confess I do not like this Bill as much as I hoped I should, I trust we shall read it a second time. I think it may eventually be knocked into a shape that will do a great deal of good.

Mr. J. E. Ellis

*(11.30.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I would make an appeal to the House to allow the Second Reading of the Bill to be taken now, as there is other important business to be taken. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has undertaken to re-commit the Bill for the Amendments he proposes to introduce, and the House will then have the measure in its more perfect form, together with the names which my right hon. Friend has promised. I hope the hon. Member will, for the sake of the convenience of the House generally, allow us to take the Second Reading of the Bill now, and he will have a better opportunity for his observations in Committee.

*(11.32.) MR. HOWELL: After the intimation given, I beg leave to withdraw my Amendment.

(11.33.) MR. STOREY (Sunderland) And I, Sir, beg leave to move the adjournment of the Debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—
(Mr. Storey.)

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I hope the hon. Member will not insist upon that. To adjourn the Debate now may possibly endanger the Bill and prevent its passing this Session. We cannot re-commit the Bill until it has been read a second time.

(11.34.) MR. STOREY: With the indulgence of the House I may be allowed to explain my action. I think the Trustee Savings Banks have been very badly treated, both by the Government and by the attacks made upon them in other quarters. It is extremely important that some persons who know these banks and their work should speak upon the matter, and the proper time for that is on the Second Reading of the Bill. The Chancellor of the Exchequer asks the House to give a Second Reading to a Bill in which the most important clauses are to be entirely re-cast. That is the most extraordinary proposal I have ever heard.

(11.35.) MR. GOSCHEN: It is just because I am anxious that the House should have the Bill in the form we propose it should assume that I wish to re-commit the Bill. I have received a deputation from nearly all the Savings Banks in the country, and they are fully satisfied with the proposed Amendments.

MR. STOREY: But the House does not know what the Amendments are.

MR. GOSCHEN: The House cannot know until the Bill is re-committed. But if the Bill is committed pro forma and re-printed, an opportunity will be given for the consideration of the Amendments. I will undertake that time shall be given for the circulation of a copy of the Amendments among the banks, and then hon. Members will have an opportunity of preparing any Amendments in the interest of the banks. It is the most business-like course, and I trust the hon. Member will accept it.

*(11.36.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): I think we all recognise the importance of reading the Bill a second time, and I think my hon. Friend will find a full opportunity for discussion when he has the Bill before him in the amended form the right hon. Gentleman proposes.

(11.36.) MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): The right hon. Gentleman thinks we are more innocent than we look, but a number of old birds are not to be caught with salt. We thoroughly understand the tactics. For my part, I am fully prepared to support my hon. Friend. I have been bombarded with numerous letters from constituents and others expressing the greatest disapprobation of the proposals of Her Majesty's Government, and I certainly think it is our duty to insist upon a Second Reading discussion. The Amendments may modify materially the whole scope and character of the Bill, and we ought to know what we are doing before we commit ourselves to a Second Reading.

MR. STOREY: I do not know, Sir, whether I have exhausted my right of speech—

MR. SYDNEY GEDGE rose in his place, and claimed to move "That the Question be now put," but MR. SPEAKER withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question.

*MR. SPEAKER: Do I understand the hon. Member for Bethnal Green desires to withdraw his Amendment?

*MR. HOWELL assented.

*MR. SPEAKER: Is it your pleasure the Amendment be withdrawn? [Cries of "No."]

*(11.52.) MR. W. H. SMITH: I very much regret the opposition shown to the passing of this Bill. ["No, no."] However, it is not my desire to enter on a contest with hon. Gentlemen in the interests of those who are concerned with the safety and security of Savings Banks, and with those hon. Gentlemen the sole responsibility must rest if a measure which is designed to improve the security of those who place their hard-earned savings in those institutions cannot, in consequence, be passed during the present Session. The Bill has received support from all parts of the House, and my right hon. Friend has shown his desire to meet the wishes of those who want Amendments to be made in a reasonable way. In those circumstances I will not detain the House longer, but allow the House to proceed to the other business which has been fixed for this evening. I agree to an adjournment.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. W. H. Smith.)

(11.54.) MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): I feel obliged to say two things upon this subject. In the first place, I sincerely hope that the right hon. Gentleman will not infer from the Division which has just taken place [Laughter, and cries of "Order!"] either that there is any cause for the unseemly manifestation which has just taken place, or that there is any hostile disposition to the principles of this Bill on this side of the House. [Laughter.] Notwithstanding these manifestations of the manner in which hon. Gentlemen prefer to pursue the Debate—notwithstanding this and the waste of time these interruptions cause—I venture to express my belief that this Bill has excellent objects in view, and I sincerely hope that it will pass into law this Session. But I think that the right hon. Gentleman did not see the point which has arisen, which seems to give strength to the appeal of the hon. Member, which I, for my own part, cannot resist. My hon. Friend has a right to a Second Reading discussion. Under the old practice in this House a commitment pro forma has been of frequent occurrence, and is a most useful proceeding; but after that, when re-commitment was used, it would have been in the power of my hon. Friend to resume his Second Reading discussion. Now, by the Rule which has been passed, my hon. Friend is obliged to have his Second Reading discussion now or never, and, therefore, it has been impossible for me to resist the appeal of my hon. Friend. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will be led by the occurrence of to-night to consider a matter which is of great importance in the procedure of this House, namely, whether when you have made a Rule abolishing the power of debating a Bill on the Speaker leaving the Chair, it would not be wise to make an exception to that Rule when a Bill is committed pro forma, when it might undergo any amount of changes, and when there is no power whatever of questioning any of those changes. With regard to this Bill, I, for one, should be glad to see it advanced with all possible expedition.

Question put, and agreed to.

Debate adjourned till to-morrow.

SUPPLY [8TH JULY]—REPORT.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [10th July].

"That this House doth agree with the Committee in the Resolution 'That a sum, not exceeding £889,490, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1891, for the Expenses of the Royal Irish Constabulary."

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

(11.55.) MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I do not propose to go at length into the facts in relation to the shooting at Charleville, for the purpose of discussing which this Debate has been several times adjourned; but before making a Motion which will enable the Chief Secretary to make his statement with regard to the case, I must first protest against the action of the Government with reference to this Vote. The Debate has several times been postponed on the express understanding that it would ultimately be taken at a reasonable hour; that is to say, half-past 10 or 11. But Members came down to the House, having been given to understand that the Debate would be taken not later than 11, and we waited, astonished at the action of the Government, until half-past 11, when the leader of the House rose, as we supposed, to move the adjournment of the business then under discussion. To our astonishment he persisted in the Debate, and thus we find this Vote is only reached on the stroke of midnight. In these circumstances, I consider I am justified in saying that faith has not been kept with us. Without occupying more time, and in order to allow the Chief Secretary to speak again, I beg to move the reduction of the Vote by £10,000.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member cannot do that. The House must say "aye" or "no" to the Question whether the House agrees with the Committee in the Resolution.

*(11.57.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): I think that it will probably be convenient to the House if I made a short statement now, having regard to the fact that the Chief Secretary can only address the House once. I will shortly indicate the position with regard to this matter, with especial reference to certain statements which were made on the last occasion when it was last before the House. With regard to what has fallen from the hon. Member for East Mayo, I have to say the Government had every intention of bringing this question on at an earlier hour. Events will sometimes occur, however, in the course of the discussion of an Order of the Day, which render necessary the postponement of the hour at which a subsequent Order of the Day can be taken. It was stated on the last occasion that the action of "Nolan v. Concannon" might be treated as an action no longer pending. I find, after inquiries, that no step has been taken by Nolan to bring the action to a close, and that it is still pending. Therefore, while the case is still before the Courts, any discussion of the questions in dispute in the action seems to me to be inexpedient and improper. What is the position of the case? It has been alleged that four shots were fired by the police; that a man named Nolan, sitting on a wall adjoining the station, fell down after the shots were fired, alleging that he had received injury from a bullet. It has been alleged, also, that the firing on the part of the police was not justified by any action on the part of the crowd. On the other hand, it has been alleged that there was action on the part of the crowd, the character of which I will not now discuss, which justified, in point of law, the firing of the police. What course did the plaintiff, and those who were desirous of trying the conduct of the police, take? This cannot be represented as a case which the plaintiff brought before a Court of Law for the purpose of obtaining damages for a substantial injury, because the injury done to the plaintiff was so infinitesimal that one question submitted to the jury was whether Nolan was struck by a bullet at all or whether the abrasion on his leg was not caused by a projection from the wall. It was a case brought into Court for the purpose of trying whether, on this occasion, the firing by the police was justified or not. There were two principal ways, in addition to an investigation before two Magistrates, of trying that question. The police might have been prosecuted criminally for the offence of firing at with intent to kill. That procedure would have involved no question as to the nature of the wound sustained by Nolan, and it would have directly raised the question as to the justifiability of the firing by the police. Then, a civil action for the recovery of damages might have been brought; and, with the view of testing the question whether the police were justified in firing, the plaintiff, and those acting with him, elected to proceed by civil action. What occurred? The civil action was tried before Mr. Justice Murphy and a jury. The jury disagreed. There was no shorthand writer employed to take a report of the Judgment, but it appears that the nature and cause of the injury to the plaintiff and the question of the justifiability of the police were left as a jury question. The case was again tried before the Lord Chief Baron and a jury. I have the best means of information as to the charge of the Lord Chief Baron, because a shorthand writer was present. The Lord Chief Baron, without any expression of opinion, summed up the evidence on both sides, pointing out the conflict of testimony on material points as to the demeanour of the crowd, as to whether there was anything which amounted to an attempt to rescue, and as to whether shots had proceeded from the crowd. He left them the question whether the wound was caused by a bullet or not, and the question whether the firing by the police was justified or not. The jury were unable to agree upon the first of these issues, and the action has not since been discontinued and is still pending. There will, therefore, be a third trial involving the question of the justifiability of the action of the police. That question the Government are now asked to withdraw from the cognisance of the High Court of Justice in order that it may be considered by some other tribunal which it is proposed to constitute. That is a suggestion which the Government certainly cannot entertain as long as the civil action in the High Court is pending.

(12.12.) MR. W. O'BRIEN (Cork, N.E.): It seems to me that from beginning to end of this shameful matter the Government have acted in a most shuffling and uncandid manner. The Government were told in the House three weeks ago that there was an end of this action.

The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary pretended to doubt the assurance that was then given, and two nights afterwards the Member for Leeds produced and read a telegram from the plaintiff's solicitor stating that no further proceedings will be taken in the matter. The Chief Secretary then appeared to accept the assurance, yet to-night the Attorney General pretends that he is not sufficiently assured on the matter, although I, who was said by the police to be the real plaintiff in the case, now assure the House that the proceedings are at an end. I assure the Government there will not be a third trial of this action, because in the trial which has already taken place the guilt of the policeman has been satisfactorily proved. There were two trials, and only on one question put before the jury, a comparatively insignificant point—whether or not the slight injury received by this man was caused by the grazing of a bullet, or by a spike on the wall—was there a disagreement. The jury, which consisted largely of the political friends of the right hon. Gentleman, were prepared to find that the police were not justified in firing, and it cannot be said of Mr. Justice Murphy, who presided over the first trial, that he was favourably disposed towards the plaintiff or his friends. From Mr. Justice Murphy's charge it is clear he considered that the contention of the police that there had been an attempt at rescue was a ridiculous invention. The Chief Baron in his charge also took the same view. If the conduct of the police at Charleville is to be justified and brazened out in this House, our lives in Ireland will not be worth a moment's purchase. To-night the Government fall back upon the miserable excuse that the question is still to be tried by another jury, though it has been tried out already. The question is, whether those 17 armed men were justified in firing four shots into a chance crowd, which they themselves estimated at 100 people, but which I estimate at 40 or 50. In the next compartment but one to that in which I was, there were 11 armed riflemen, and so little did the cheering outside disturb them that not one of them moved out of the carriage, although it is admitted they could have swept the crowd. The whole story of attempted rescue is ridiculous and impossible. The Government offer the same explanations to the House which the policeman offered to Judges and juries, and which the Judges and juries disbelieved. I venture to say it is a shame and a scandal that public money should be employed, as it has been employed, to enable these men to go to trial, and the money of the taxpayers lavished in enabling them to evade the consequences of as gross a piece of savagery as was ever charged against any body of men. If the Government offer the least justification for their action in this case, the least the Irish Members have a right to demand is that copies of the evidence and charges shall be laid on the Table. No man can read those depositions and charges without believing that it is a shame on public justice in Ireland that these men were not drummed out of the Service, if not put upon their trial.

(12.23.) Mr. FLYNN (Cork, N.): The right hon. Gentleman has tried to imply that the knowledge that my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Cork was in police custody was possessed by the crowd at Charleville Station on the day in question. He omitted to state that Charleville was 35 miles from the city, and that on that day there were no possible means of communication except by the train, as the telegraph office is only open for one hour on Sunday mornings. What occurred on that particular day? A small crowd assembled on the platform to welcome four or five delegates, and when they heard that my hon. Friend was in the train, they gave cheers "for Mr. O'Brien," while two or three ran to the carriage window in order to shake hands with him, whereupon these cowardly ruffians fired, as they confessed, with intent to kill. Now, I say that this House has a right to demand an explanation from the Government instead of the quibbling, prevaricating, and shuffling we have just heard. I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman has taken the trouble to read the report of the trials. I have, and I never heard anything so absurd as the suggestion that there was an attempt to rescue the hon. Member on that occasion. Imagine 30 or 40 boys without a weapon in their hands attempting to rescue my hon. Friend out of the custody of 20 strong men armed to the teeth. When these people went to the station, they had not the remotest idea that my hon. Friend would be in the train. I have made inquiries from 15 or 20 persons who were on the platform at the time, and I have seen affidavits which were sworn two or three days after the occurrence, and there is nothing at all to bear out the suggestion of an attempted rescue. The truth is, Inspector Concannon lost his head on that occasion; and long before the train reached Charleville, he was seen boiling over with excitement. It is admitted that he never gave the police orders to fire, and that in firing they disobeyed one of their most stringent regulations. It was sworn by the ticket collector and the head porter in charge of the station that the shots were not fired by the Inspector and the policemen with him until the train was moving from the platform on its way to the next station. This is absolutely proved beyond the possibility of doubt. The guard had given the signal, the whistle had sounded, the train was moving from the platform, when the police fired into this crowd of 30 or 40 people with, as they admit, intent to kill. The young man who brought the action was sitting on a wall engaged in the terribly reprehensible and violent conduct of shouting "Three cheers for William O'Brien," which, if it be an offence, is one committed daily throughout Ireland. It will be a scandal and reproach to this House if an explanation is not given by the Government. If the right hon. Gentleman persists in defending such conduct he is teaching a dangerous lesson to the Irish police and the Irish people, because, if in going to meetings the people are not protected from the unlawful assaults of the police, I should advise the young men to arm themselves with cudgels for self-defence; and as to the more dangerous use of firearms, the right hon. Gentleman is instilling a still more dangerous lesson into the minds of Irishmen, because, in defending the use of such weapons, he cannot expect that the people will not find some way of protecting themselves.

(12.35.) SIR HORACE DAVEY (Stockton): I think the Government are in this matter behaving very shabbily. I am not about to enter into controversial topics relating to any action pending or not pending before the Irish Courts. I am only about to refer to the charge made against the police, both last year and now. It is that they wantonly, and without sufficient provocation, fired upon the people on the platform of a railway station from a railway carriage while the train was in motion and leaving the station. On the 4th of July the Chief Secretary, speaking from information he had received, said, in answer to a question, that it appeared from the official Reports that the door of the railway carriage was surrounded by a mob of about 100 persons; that it was twice forced open, apparently with the object of rescuing Mr. O'Brien; that two shots were fired into the carriage, and that it was only then that the Sub-Inspector and his two men fired. The right hon. Gentleman afterwards said he gathered distinctly that shots were fired by the crowd. I think I am right in stating that at the trial there was no evidence of two shots having been fired, and that there was conflicting evidence as to one shot having been fired by the people. There have been two trials, and on both occasions the jury disagreed as to whether the plaintiff Nolan was injured by a bullet fired by the police or not. Now, I should like to ask the Government whether they are paying Concannon's expenses out of the public funds? Is Concannon's defence to these actions being conducted by the Government out of public money? Because, if that is so, it is idle for the right hon. Gentleman or the Attorney General for Ireland to say they believe, as if the information came to them by the way, that Concannon intends to have another trial. I ask the Government to state whether they intend to have a new trial or not, because although the defence is in the name of Concannon, it is really the defence of the Government. There is another matter the House would like to have cleared up. If the Government intend to have a new trial, at the public expense, what justification is there for it? Are they prepared to say they have better and stronger evidence to lay before a jury in a new trial? If they are not in that position I venture to say they will be incurring a wanton expenditure of the public money in insisting on a new trial in Concannon's behalf. If my information is correct, the case put forward by the right hon. Gentleman was at least exaggerated, and this being so, and the second trial having proved abortive, the Government are not justified in incurring further expense by prolonging this litigation.

(12.40.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): I regret that the hon. and learned Gentleman should have charged the Government with acting shabbily for no better reasons than those he has brought forward. He has charged the Chief Secretary—reading from Hansard—with having made an exaggerated statement in connection with this matter, and the alleged exaggeration comes simply to this—that, whereas the Chief Secretary stated that, from the information he had received, two shots were fired, it turned out afterwards that only one shot was fired. That was scarcely sufficient ground for such a charge, and the condemnation of the conduct of the police would hardly depend on whether one shot or two shots were fired, if attempts were made to bring about a rescue. The hon. and learned Gentleman has admitted that there was evidence with regard to a possible rescue, and that he has not the means of forming a judgment, yet he has referred to the two issues of the trial, and expressed an opinion with regard to them. Two issues have been raised in the trials, and they have been separately stated; and it is not in accordance with my experience of the trials of issue to suggest that because two juries have been unable to come to a conclusion, therefore the evidence was all on one side. I should have hoped that anyone having my hon. Friend's experience at the Bar would have refrained from expressing opinions which certainly ought not to be expressed so long as there is a prospect or probability of the case coming again to trial. The hon. Member for Leeds made a statement from a telegram to the effect that it was arranged that there was to be no new trial.

statement which I made that no further action would be taken by the plaintiff.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I accepted the statement that the plaintiff did not wish to go on.

SIR R. WEBSTER: The statement was accepted at the moment, because it was impossible to ascertain the accuracy of the information given by telegram. But after that distinct statement to my right hon. Friend we find the plaintiff taking no steps to discontinue the action. What is the reply of the hon. Member for East Cork? He gets up again in the House and says that there will be no further trial as far as the plaintiff is concerned. Has Concannon no rights in this case? I deny that a person who is charged, and is brought by civil action into Court, has no interest in the matter; and if the right to trial by proviso exists—

MR. MOLLOY (King's Co., Birr): When was the last case?

SIR R. WEBSTER: I do not know, but in England, and I dare say Ireland as well, the defendant can take an action to trial, and it would be most unfair if we were to come to a decision on this matter on the assumption that the defendant cannot have the case determined. The hon. and learned Gentleman desires to know whether or not the Government are paying the expenses of District-Inspector Concannon. If the case had occurred in England I have very little doubt that not only would the expenses of the trial be paid by Government, but that the defence would be undertaken by them, where a policeman, acting bona fide in the discharge of his duty has made himself liable, and there is no reason to suppose that he has acted maliciously. I understand, however, that the practice in Ireland is, that when a constable is charged under such circumstances he instructs his private solicitor, who conducts his case. The Government do not undertake the defence, but at the end of the trial, when the matter is considered, if the constable is found not to have acted improperly his expenses are paid by the Government. And in the present case, which is an action brought, as is now admitted, not for any great injury done to Nolan or for damages, but to try the question whether a constable has exceeded his duty, and in which two juries have disagreed, it would be very extraordinary not to pay District Inspector Concannon his expenses. My answer to the hon. and learned Gentleman is, therefore, distinct—namely, that Inspector Concannon consulted his private solicitor, that his solicitor conducted the case, and that the case, therefore, has not been carried on at the dictation or under the control of the Government; but when the case comes to an end, the matter will be considered by the Executive, and if it stand as at present, District Inspector Concannon's expenses will be paid. I deprecate any attempt on the part of the House to discuss the issues of the case if it is going to be tried again, and I contend that it will be alike unwise and unjust to express any judgment upon it until the evidence is fully before us.

(12.50.) Mr. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): There are two important questions demanding reply, and which have been asked in the course of this Debate. My hon. Friend the Member for North-East Cork did not obtain a candid answer to his inquiry whether the notes would be laid upon the Table. My hon. Friend also inquired whether the costs of District Inspector Concannon would be paid, but the hon. and learned Gentleman evaded the question. The Attorney General gave a hypothetical answer, though he has often expressed his objection to hypothetical answers in this House. What we want to know is whether the public purse is to be placed in this matter at the disposal of a man who, on the night in question, incurred the moral guilt of murder; for, by evidence of the police themselves, they fired with the intent to kill, and the jury agreed that there had been unjustifiable firing by the police.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: No.

Mr. W. O'BRIEN: Distinctly.

Mr. SEXTON: While the Government are sheltering themselves under the plea that the action has not ceased, do they intend to procure the continuance of the action by the funds of the State? The hon. Member for Leeds stated the other night that he had read an intimation from the solicitor of the plaintiff that the plaintiff had no intention to proceed. Does anyone imagine that District Inspector Concannon, of himself, would proceed? I suspect that gentleman has had enough of the case, and that he will be glad to be let alone. But now the Government pretend that Concannon intends to proceed, and on that pretence refuse an answer. The good faith of the Government in the matter may be judged by the speech of the Attorney General for Ireland, who never filled a more pitiable rôle than he has done to-night. His speech was a contemptible evasion. One of the right hon. Gentleman's observations was that the Government had no shorthand notes of the Judge's charge. Why, they had a most excellent report. If the humblest politician in Ireland makes a speech on some remote hillside a Government reporter is there, but in the case of a man morally guilty of murder the Government have no means of furnishing a shorthand report of the charge of Her Majesty's Judge. It appears that a police reporter was present on the occasion of the second trial; yet the Government cannot produce the transcript.

*Mr. MADDEN: I stated distinctly that I had in my hand the transcript taken by the shorthand writer of the charge of Chief Baron Palles, and that the Government are prepared to lay it on the Table.

Mr. SEXTON: The Government have so many reporters to spare all over Ireland that I should have thought they would have seen the importance of this case, and have taken the precaution of procuring a competent report of the charges of both the learned Judges. The Attorney General said that the plaintiff need not have brought his action before a jury, but might have brought the case before two official confederates of the police. I ask the House from that one observation to judge of the good faith of the Government. What is their sheet anchor and main defence? That the action has not been discontinued. We have the most authoritative information that it has been discontinued. I protest against the Attorney General trying to mislead the House into the opinion that there was very little cause of complaint. He suggested that the man was not struck by the bullet.

*Mr. MADDEN: I did not suggest that Nolan was not struck by the bullet. What I did say, and it was admitted by the hon. Member for Cork, was that the trifling nature of the injury led to the conclusion that the action had been brought not for damages but to try the question of the conduct of the police.

MR. SEXTON: I should like to know how the Attorney General would feel were he fired at when on the top of a wall, and he fell from the top to the bottom? I should like to know whether the Attorney General would have taken action. The plaintiff suffered severe shock and serious injury, and was for a considerable time prevented from pursuing his avocation. It is notorious that Inspector Concannon showed a lamentable lack of judgment and self-denial. Can anyone read the evidence given in the case, and the charges of the learned Judges, and have any doubt that the statements made by the Chief Secretary last year that a rescue was contemplated, and that the police had orders to fire, have been proved to be absolutely unfounded? There is no doubt in the world that the police fired without orders, and as to the charge of attempted rescue, there is no doubt whatever that nobody in the crowd knew my hon. Friend (Mr. W. O'Brien) was in the train. The armed policemen in the crowd were as numerous as the whole assembly, and they could have swept the crowd away in five minutes. It is noteworthy that no constable left one of the carriages, although they were all in a position to observe what went on on the platform, and that is a conclusive proof that the people came there with an innocent intention, and that any excitement that existed was caused by the desire to shake hands with my hon. Friend. I am curious to know whether the Chief Secretary will still insist that a shot was fired into the carriage. The evidence proves clearly that the shots fired were fired by the police alone. Who would have taken firearms to the station but the police, and for what purpose? The glass and the woodwork of the carriage have been examined, and there is no trace of a bullet in them. I declare that the Government have, in this case, been guilty of the most miserable evasion, that their conduct amounts to an official incitement to crime, addressed to the armed servants of the Crown, and, if they refuse to give us an assurance that the officer will be removed from the post in which he so narrowly escaped the taking of life, it will be impossible for the Chief Secretary in the future to contend that the Government desire the detection of crime or the maintenance of order.

(1.5.) MR. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.): It is a remarkable thing that the Chief Secretary has not risen. The inference we draw from his silence is that he is afraid to fall out with Inspector Concannon. The Attorney General has said that the jury did not agree. Does he pretend that the Judges have not pronounced that the firing on this occasion was entirely unjustifiable? The hon. and learned Gentleman says the Government have no verbatim report of the observations of Mr. Justice Murphy, though they have a report of the charge of Chief Baron Palles. Let them produce that, and we will take our stand upon it. I read the charge of Mr. Justice Murphy myself. One of the points on which he dwelt was this: He said, the chief defence, in point of fact, the substance of it, was that there was an attempt at rescue by the crowd, and he went on for a quarter of an hour in the most distinct terms to ridicule that allegation. He pointed out that the police were armed men, that they were trained to the use of arms, that men trained to the use of arms and possessing arms were bound to be men of action and prudence, and should not be subject to sudden bursts of passion, or liable to lose their heads. He pointed out that a rescue from armed police was unknown in the country, and, in fact, he ridiculed the bare idea that any rescue had been attempted. I say that if there were nothing more in the case than this consideration—that the contention of the Chief Secretary last year was based on the alleged attempt to rescue—the contention of the Government has entirely broken down. The Government have a verbatim report of the charge of Chief Baron Palles. Let them lay it on the Table of the House.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Hear, hear.

MR. CLANCY: As the right hon. Gentleman intimates his intention of laying it on the Table of the House, and refuses to answer us to-night, I do not think we can pass the Vote to-night. The time has come for the adjournment of the Debate. I should have thought that the Attorney General for England would have taken a long time before he spoke of the affairs of Ireland again in this House. I thought he had heard enough of Pigott and his doings in Ireland. I cannot help alluding to the right hon. Gentleman's observation that Inspector Concannon had rights, and that he might go on with the action, as if he had not been blessing his stars every day for the last two months that he had escaped by the skin of his teeth, and as if he could afford to go on with the action. Inspector Concannon got off on a miserable technicality. Two questions were left for the jury: first, whether Nolan was hurt by a bullet, or a spike in the wall? and, secondly, whether the police were justified in firing? The jury could not come to a decision on the second question until they had agreed on the first, and because they could not agree that Nolan was hit by a bullet, they were precluded from coming to a decision on the second point. The idea that Concannon is panting and thirsting for a trial, and that he would have one if his own wish were consulted, is about as audacious a pretence as was ever put forward in this House. He will never move in the matter. He could have served notice to have the case dismissed for want of a prosecution, but he has not taken that course. He dare not take it. The theory that a shot was fired into the carriage was blown to the winds in five minutes. If it was correct, one of two things must have happened. Either some one must have been hit, or the bullet would have been found in the carriage, but neither of these things occurred. Immediately after the shot was said to have been fired, the police were challenged by the Member for North-East Cork to search the carriage. They refused to do so at the time, but waited until the hon. Member had left the train, when they sent two men to search the carriage. That search did not result in the finding of a bullet. In fact, Concannon gave up the theory about the shot being fired into the carriage, and he gave the case away in evidence. The fact was that the flash of the alleged firing was nothing more than the flash of the guard's lantern, which was used to start the train. The Chief Secretary is acting now as he acted in the case of Mitchelstown. When that massacre occurred, the right hon. Gentleman started a theory, and he has stuck to it ever since. Even before he received the full Reports of the police, he started a theory, and that theory he has stuck to in spite of most overwhelming evidence against it. He is doing the same thing now. He delivered a theory to the House, and to that theory he adheres, and now he refuses to give any explanation of his conduct. Under the circumstances, the only thing is to move the adjournment of the Debate, which I now do.

MR. E. HARRINGTON: I beg to second the Motion.

(Mr. Clancy.)

(1.16.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think the request of the hon. Member who has just sat down is somewhat unreasonable. Complaint is made that I have not spoken; but there are two reasons why I have not taken part in the discussion. One is that my two right hon. and learned Friends have told the House what course the Government intend to take in relation to laying the report of the charge of Chief Baron Palles on the Table and the payment of the expenses.

MR. T. M. HEALY: They said nothing about the expenses.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: My hon. and learned Friend has given a complete answer on the two points.

MR. T. M. HEALY: What was said about expenses?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: What was said was that certainly, so far as the two abortive trials were concerned, the Government would pay the expenses.

MR. T. M. HEALY: That is the first time that has been stated.

(1.18.) SIR HORACE DAVEY: What the Attorney General for England said was that when the proceedings were over the Government would consider the matter, and he thought if there was no further trial they would pay the expenses of the abortive trials.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: I said that the Government would certainly pay the expenses of the two abortive trials if matters remained as they were and no further trial was taken.

(1.19.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I understood my hon. and learned Friend to say that, and if hon. Members did not understand it I now state it. These matters having been stated, it does not appear to me that there is anything further to add. I anticipated that the Member for Mid Lothian, at whose request the Vote has been postponed—

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): No, no.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Well, I was under that erroneous impression, and I was anxious to hear the right hon. Gentleman's observations, or those of some of his Colleagues, before I myself spoke. I was anxious to hear the right hon. Gentleman or some of his Colleagues on the Front Opposition Bench show why the answers given by my hon. and learned Friends, in answer to specific inquiries, were not satisfactory. I now hope the House will not defer coming to a conclusion on this Vote. The hon. Member who has just sat down says he desires to see the charge of Chief Baron Palles. That is a reasonable request, but some delay will be necessary. The charge will have to be printed, the learned Judge will have to correct the proof sheets, and some considerable time must necessarily elapse before the charge can be sent back to the House. I hope the House will not defer coming to a decision on the Vote until we have seen the charge.

(1.22.) MR. T. M. HEALY: The right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down stated, as is his manner, bluntly, on being questioned closely on the point, what the two learned Gentlemen before him endeavoured to conceal. Concannon has now the declaration of the Government that his costs will be paid in both trials, and then we are to take the suggestion of the Attorney General for Ireland that this man, who has nothing to gain and everything to lose by a third trial, is burning and anxious to have a third trial. The Attorney General said we cannot come to a decision, because the matter may be tried a third time.

SIR R. WEBSTER: I said the Government were unable to come to a decision as to the costs, because the case must be tried a third time, but I submitted that it would be undesirable to come to a decision on the merits of the action, because there must be a third trial.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Then what was the point of the hon. Gentleman's observations as to the merits of the action? The question we have to consider is whether you are going to pay Concannon's costs.

*MR. SPEAKER: The question is the adjournment of the Debate.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I recognise the inexorable logic of that decision, Sir. We ask for the adjournment of the Debate in order that we may have the Judge's charge before us. When the Government think the charge of a Judge is in their favour they produce it without it being asked for, but when it is the other way they cannot be got to do it.

(1.25.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I never saw the shorthand notes of the Chief Baron's judgment until the day before yesterday, and it was only yesterday that I recognised that it differed essentially from the report in the Freeman's Journal.

(1.26.) MR. T. M. HEALY: This is my point, that the Government, when a charge is in their favour, have both eyes open, but when it is a charge on which we rely, they only see it the day before yesterday.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I asked for the charges of the two Judges, but they could not be obtained together at once.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I accept the statement that the right hon. Gentleman could not with due diligence obtain the charges sooner. But I submit that our demand for the adjournment of the Debate in the absence of the Judges' charges is not unreasonable. We desire to know, also, whether the learned Judges think that the expenses of Concannon should be paid by the Government. Could not this question be submitted to them? What would be done in England in a case of this kind? If Mr. Justice Murphy should say that he thinks it right that the expenses of this constable should be paid by the Treasury, I will vote for it myself. I cannot say anything fairer than that, and I submit that I am entitled to a reply.

(1.30.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR : I must point out that it would be impossible to ask any Judge in England or Ireland to answer any question of that kind. Although the Judges in question distinctly stated they left all the matters of fact to the jury, they expressed no opinion on the matters of fact. I am informed that if two similar cases had occurred in England, and the jury had disagreed, the expenses of the police would be paid by the Government.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) : I think it is well the Debate should be adjourned, and the merits of the question gone into. If Nolan in the meantime would take the steps that are necessary in order to discontinue the action, the merits might be fairly gone into.

MR. DILLON : I hope that after what we have heard the Government will consent to the adjournment of the Debate. If they do not I trust my hon. Friend will go to a Division. An overwhelming case has been made out in favour of the adjournment of the Debate. Everyone feels in his heart that it is desirable that the merits of the case should be fairly placed before the House. The conduct of the police is highly debatable, and it is plain that the two Judges who listened to the evidence were of opinion that the police did not act as they ought to have acted ; that they ought not to have fired. [Cries of "No."] Well, at all events, it is clear that the facts of the case ought to be brought before the House of Commons before the Session ends. We have had experience on more than one occasion of allowing the consideration of cases to be postponed from one Session to another. If the police did fire on this occasion without justification they committed a great outrage, and not a single one of the men who fired ought to be entrusted with deadly weapons. If we allow this Session to go by without bringing this matter before the notice of Parliament what will happen next Session? We shall be told then by the Chief Secretary that this is ancient history, and is a matter in which no one takes any interest at all. We have been treated in such a way before, and we do not mean to be treated like it again. Therefore, I trust my hon. Friend will go to a Division, if the Government will not give way.

(1.35.) MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) : I noticed that when an hon. Member on this side of the House drew attention to the weak point at issue, namely, what was contained in the Judge's charge, hon. Members opposite made indications of dissent. That proves conclusively that Gentlemen opposite differ from us altogether upon the important question, what is contained in the charge of the Judge. I put it to hon. Members, as fair-minded Englishmen, whether it is fair to ask us to decide the question without knowing what the Judge said? The Chief Secretary said he had not seen a report of the case until Saturday last. How many of his supporters have taken the trouble to read what the Judge said? I certainly think the Government would do well to consent to the adjournment of the Debate for a few days longer.

(1.37.) MR. W. O'BRIEN : I venture to believe that the speeches of hon. Members opposite have made out a good case for the adjournment of the Debate. The Attorney General for Ireland distinctly evaded the important question of costs, but the Chief Secretary blurted out that the Government will pay Mr. Con-cannon's expenses. If there is an adjournment we shall get considerably further into the confidence of the Government. I agree with my hon. Friends that we ought to have before us the Judge's charge and the evidence given at the trial. I understand the charge was given by the Chief Baron himself ; and as to the evidence, I venture to say a Government reporter was present throughout the whole course of the trial, taking notes of the evidence and of the Judge's charge. The Government ought to-night to tell us whether or not they are in a position to give us a full and complete report of the evidence. I think we are entitled to know whether or not the police reporter was present, and did take down the whole of the evidence, and, if so, whether the Government will lay the notes fully before the House, in addition to the charge of the Chief Baron. The charge of Mr. Justice Murphy does not appear to have been supplied by him. If the police reporter is not in a position to supply it I would suggest that the verbatim report of the charge which appeared in the Freeman's Journal—generally a very accurate journal in the matter of short-hand reporting—should be submitted to the learned Judge, and that he should be asked to say whether it is a correct report of what he said, and to supply any deficiency he may find in it. If a police reporter was present the House should, I think, be placed in possession of his notes. I think the House is coming to the conclusion that there is something very much astray in this case, and that the consciences even of the supporters of the Government are being touched in reference to it. The Government would, in my opinion, be wise to adjourn the discussion now, and before it is resumed full materials should be forthcoming for taking the judgment of the House with reference to it.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: There was no Police report.

(1.42.) MR. E. HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.); The Government are to-night without the necessary evidence.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: We have no means of getting the evidence. There is no Government report of the evidence. The only report I know of is the Freeman's Journal report, and that of course we cannot use.

MR. W. O'BRIEN: Do I understand the right hon. Gentleman to say that the police reporter whom I saw taking notes of the evidence throughout has no notes?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no knowledge of a police reporter having been present. I can only say that no Police report was ordered by the Government, and that no police reporter, as far as the Government is aware, was ordered to be present, or was present, on the occasion.

(1.43.) MR. E. HARRINGTON: I place more reliance on the right hon. Gentleman's statement than he does himself. He told us to-night he was still awaiting the Report from Chief
Mr. W. O'Brien

Baron Palles. ["No, no!"] He talked of the time it took for the learned Judge to correct his proofs. Well, surely it will be some time before hon. Members have that Report in their hands. We claim that the Report of the Judge should be in the hands of Members before they give a final vote. As to the point raised by the hon. Member for North-East Cork (Mr. W. O'Brien) about the presence of a police reporter, I believe, from my own knowledge of Ireland, that it was impossible for a police reporter not to be present on the occasion. A few persons in the town of Tralee, suspected of being of Nationalist proclivities, met together in a peasant's house, and by direction of the authorities a police reporter was present to watch the case. It is impossible to think that in a case of this kind the Government did not direct an official reporter to be present. I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, as the representative head of the Government, he did not direct that an official report of the case should be supplied to him from day to day.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No.

MR. E. HARRINGTON: Then I must accuse the right hon. Gentleman of the grossest negligence in this matter. By laying the Report on the Table the Government might dispose of this matter in five minutes on a subsequent occasion, and possibly without debate. What good can the Government expect to come from the attitude they have adopted on this question?

(1.48.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 82; Noes 147.—(Div. List, No. 193.)

Original Question again proposed, "That this House doth agree in the Committee in the said Resolution."

(1.59.) DR. TANNER: I think the House has not had a fair opportunity of discussing this Report. If the Government had not broken their pledge the Vote would have been taken at an hour when it might have been adequately discussed. I have only recently had an opportunity of seeing the man Con-cannon. I know him, and, in my opinion, he is just as guilty as if the four shots had taken four lives. I agree that the House ought to be supplied with a transcript of the shorthand notes taken at the trial. Are we to understand that a shorthand writer was not present on the instructions of the Government?

(2.0.) Sir JOHN COLOMB rose in his place, and claimed to move "That the Question be now put;" but Mr. SPEAKER withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question.

Debate resumed.

(2.0.) Dr. TANNER: In the first place I was trying to address myself to the details of this particular case, and I was seeking to point out the case as an additional reason why we should go on with the discussion. There are many other matters relating to the Constabulary which demand our attention. We want to know why the constable who was taken red-handed in a moon-lighting expedition was permitted to escape by his fellow constables, and allowed to leave the country on board one of the New York steamers at Queenstown. But I must refer back to the case of Inspector Concannon. We believe him to be a murderer in thought, if not in deed. We have it admitted that the police fired their rifles on that occasion at Charleville without orders, and I say that the sooner the House deals with this matter, and deals with it in a proper way by giving an impartial investigation into the circumstances, the better it will be for all concerned. It will certainly tend to promote an improved state of things as regards law and order in Ireland. Under the present system every petty constable at every small station in and about the country is a despot. The police are looked upon with suspicion, contempt, and horror. All this is the outcome of the dastardly policy of a cowardly faction. [A laugh.] It is all very fine for hon. Members to laugh while they remain perfectly safe in this country, and do not have to encounter humiliation at the hands of these police scoundrels in Ireland, but I do submit that something should be done to put an end to this state of things, which really amounts to a condition of anarchy, thanks to the efforts of the Royal Irish Constabulary.

(2.6.) Mr. P. J. POWER (Waterford, W.): When we complain of conduct of the police such as that of which they were guilty at Charleville, we are told by the Attorney General that we have the Criminal Law at our disposal, and yet he refuses to put this Criminal Law in force, when, as we submit, a case has arisen for its application. But it is evident to me that the Government wish to hush up these charges against Inspector Concannon, and they ought to be ashamed of such a desire. It is notorious, in connection with the trials which have already taken place, that Judges who were not particularly friendly to us, expressed their opinions against the actions of the police. The Attorney General for England has just treated the Committee to a speech couched in tones of high morality. That is what we are used to from him. We know how he has always treated the Irish Members, how he has used his position to pursue them. Our contention is that in England costs would not be paid for the defence of police in such a case as this, and we object to the public money being expended for the defence of Inspector Concannon. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, in his speech the other night, said the verdict of posterity on his administration would be that he had endeavoured to stand between the oppressor and the oppressed. I think it is a somewhat strange commentary on that statement that he should approve, as he has done in this case, the action of a police official in firing upon the defenceless crowd.

(2.10.) Mr. BARTLEY rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

*Mr. SPEAKER: I am bound to say that I think for the last quarter of an hour the Debate has not been of a character to induce the House to prolong it much further. I shall not consent to the Motion for the present; but I am bound to say that if the Debate goes on in its present form I shall be obliged to consent to it.

Debate resumed.

MR. P. J. POWER : We Irishmen are just as anxious to go home as hon. Members opposite, but we complain that the Government are alone responsible for the prolongation of the Debate, because of their refusal to accept the moderate proposals we are making. This matter is one of great importance to the Irish people. The lives of these people depend, to a great extent, on the action of the Government; and the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary has made the Constabulary so indignant against us that they stop at nothing in order to hurt us. I maintain that, as the Minister responsible to this House, it is his duty to repudiate the action of the Constabulary in such cases as this. But, unfortunately, he declines to throw the police overboard when they are guilty of the most outrageous conduct. There was a case almost as bad at Mitchelstown the other day, and on that occasion the action of the police was confirmed by the Government. I think we should be wanting in our duty to our constituents if we did not exhaust every form of this House to extract from the Government some statement repudiating the action of these men, and unless we do get such a repudiation I am afraid that during the next winter more people will be shot down by the police for merely asserting their rights as citizens.

*(2.15.) MR. E. HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.) : I do not intend inflicting a long speech on the House, but I wish to say a few words as to the case of Devlin. Here was a man caught red-handed in the act of moonlighting, as gross a case as any of those which have eventuated in sending men into penal servitude for 10 years. He was actually forcing a door when, fortunately, in the interests of justice, the tenant, a man of strength and determination, caught him and took him to the police barracks, although Palmer threatened to kill him. The peasant having handed over the moonlighter to the police, went away without formally charging him, and advantage was taken of this fact to let the man out of custody, pending the issue of a summons against him. The man, consequently, escaped from the country just as proceedings were being taken against him, and the Inspector, when questioned on the subject, merely remarked, "You will have to go a long way to find him." I say that the Government directly connived at this man's escape from justice. We intend to let the country know these facts, and thus expose the insincerity of the Government policy.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, 22nd July, 1890.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT PROVISIONAL ORDERS BILL.

*THE PAYMASTER GENERAL (The Earl of JERSEY): My Lords, I beg to move the Motion which stands in my name, that the Sessional Order of the 10th March last be dispensed with for the purpose of reading certain Bills confirming Local Government Provisional Orders. These Bills have been delayed in coming up to your Lordships' House, though they were introduced into the House of Commons in time, partly owing to some difficulties of printing, and partly, also, owing to the opposition which was offered to some of them.

Moved, That the Sessional Order of the 10th of March last—

"That no Bill brought from the House of Commons confirming any Provisional Order or Provisional Certificate shall be read a second time after Friday the 27th day of June next" be dispensed with in regard to certain Bills, and that the Bills be read 2^a.

THE EARL OF MORLEY: It is quite true, as the noble Earl says, that the Bills were introduced just in time in the House of Commons to comply with the Sessional Orders of this House; but they were only read the first time on the 3rd June. I think the House will admit that this did not allow a sufficient margin to enable the Sessional Order which is passed in this House each year to be complied with. I have seen the subordinates of the noble Lord on the Local Government Board, and they have explained to me various matters of difficulty connected with these Bills. Therefore, I shall not oppose this Motion; but I am sorry to say there are other Bills coming up from the same office at a later stage on which I shall have to say a few words, and with regard to which I cannot pledge myself at the present time as to what action I shall take.

On Question, agreed to.

FISHERY BOARD (SCOTLAND) BILL. (No. 121.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR SCOTLAND (The Marquess of LOTHIAN): I do not propose now to ask your Lordships to consider this Bill. It is one affecting the interests of a very large body of people in Scotland; but as I understand that not only is there no prospect of the Bill passing in the other House of Parliament, but that it is not possible even for the Bill to receive consideration in that House, I think the most respectful course to this House is not to ask your Lordships to consider the Bill now. I propose to take an early opportunity of re-introducing it on another occasion. I therefore beg to move that the Order for Second Reading be discharged.

Order for Second Reading discharged; and Bill (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

MARRIAGES IN BRITISH EMBASSIES, &c. BILL.—(No. 167.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

EARL GRANVILLE: I do not think I need trouble your Lordships at length in recommending the Second Reading of this Bill. The object of it is to apply the principle of the Marriage (Consulate) Act to Embassies, and to men-of-war, and to make some other Amendments. The difference which now exists is, that at an Embassy British subjects can only be married according to the rites of the Church of England, while at the Consulates they can avail themselves of the services of any other minister, and they may even have a civil marriage performed by the Consul himself. Of course, one point which is a very natural object of jealousy among your Lordships is, that a Bill should not pass which would in any degree increase either the danger of clandestine marriages or of such marriages as are usually repudiated; but I am happy to say that this Bill will strengthen the position instead of weakening it. On behalf of Her Majesty's Government the Attorney General acting for the Foreign Office has been good enough to draw up some clauses which are particularly directed to meet this objection. I need only say, further, that in asking your Lordships to give a Second Reading, I propose to refer it to the Standing Committee on General Bills.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
(The Earl Granville.)

THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Viscount CRANBROOK): I only want to call attention to the 2nd clause, which seems to me to be rather inconsistent in regard to the beginning and the end of it. Some words ought, I think, to be put in in the first line of that clause. It says:—"Every marriage between parties who are capable of contracting marriage in the United Kingdom;" and in the latter part of the clause it speaks of the marriage as if the same "had been solemnised within Her Majesty's dominions," which would of course cover the various Marriage Laws of the Colonies. I think something should be added to show that it is only to facilitate marriages which could have been performed in the United Kingdom.

*LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY: I think the Circular warning Englishwomen against rashly marrying foreigners, especially Frenchmen, except under all the conditions which are required by Foreign Laws to be observed, in order to make marriages valid, was issued to Her Majesty's Consuls by the Foreign Office during its tenure by the noble Earl. He may, therefore, think it superfluous to take further precautions against British subjects marrying under this Act. I think this would be a trap which might lead to Englishwomen getting married in an invalid manner, for the clause applies to marriages "between parties, one of whom is a British subject." If the British subject were always a male, that would be all right; but supposing an Englishwoman gets married in France without all the previous consents of the parents required having been obtained, the marriage would of course be still invalid under French law. Then this Bill also provides for the commanders of ships abroad being able to solemnise. Does the noble Earl who is in charge of this Bill consider that it is certain that no commander of a gunboat may carry out marriages without forgetting to require that the provisions which are usual under Foreign Law are observed?

EARL GRANVILLE: In answer to the noble Lord, I can only say that I have very great confidence that commanders of Her Majesty's vessels will strictly observe the provisions of the Act.

On Question, agreed to; Bill read, 2^d (according to order), and committed to the Standing Committee for General Bills.

SHERIFFS (ASSIZES EXPENSES) BILL.

(No. 202.) COMMITTEE.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: In moving that the House resolve itself into Committee on this Bill, I wish to say a few words. Your Lordships will observe that since the Bill was read a second time all reference to Ireland has been omitted from it and the measure is now limited to England and Wales. I regret that very much, because I think the provisions of the Bill are even more necessary for Ireland than they are for England and Wales. It was found, however, when the Bill was under the consideration of the Standing Committee that there were many reasons connected with drafting and the necessity of referring to several clauses in other Acts of Parliament, and matters of that kind, which rendered it almost impossible in the present period of the Session to deal with the case of Ireland or to make the Bill applicable to Ireland. I hope that noble Lords who are connected with Ireland will bear the case of that country in mind, and, for my own part, I shall be very glad to support a similar measure for Ireland in the next Session of Parliament.

*EARL SPENCER: I should only like to add a word or two to what my noble Friend has said with regard to Ireland, because I believe if there is a necessity for a Bill of this sort in England there is a still stronger necessity for it in Ireland. I had a long experience in regard to Sheriffs there, and I know there was always the greatest possible difficulty in obtaining proper men to serve the office. The expenses of the shrievalty fall with extreme weight in Ireland upon proprietors, and, therefore, I should be very glad if the subject could be dealt with on a future occasion.

House in Committee (on re-commitment) (according to order).

Clause 3.

*THE EARL OF SELBORNE: My Lords, I take the liberty of submitting to your Lordships that the Lord Chancellor ought to have associated with him, for the purpose of assenting to the rules which may be made under this Act, the Lord Chief Justice of England. I have been informed that that matter was considered before the Select Committee, and that they did not adopt that view; but I have so strong an opinion about it that I feel it to be my duty to submit it to your Lordships. It, of course, will be treated by your Lordships without the smallest reference to any personal consideration whatever, excepting this: that experience in past times has shown that the office of Lord Chancellor may sometimes be filled by those who have no experience of the circuits, and no special knowledge which would make them so well able as some other Judges might be to determine what are the rules required for this purpose. Now, the Lord Chief Justice of England is the President of that Division of the High Court which is specially concerned in this matter, and from which all the Judges who go circuit are taken; and the Lord Chief Justice of England, as the head of that body, and in communication with them, would be the person who naturally would collect their opinions upon any matters specially affecting that Division, himself also having had experience, I may say, universally, of circuit business, both originally at the Bar and afterwards by going the Assizes. He, therefore, has the knowledge which would be specially necessary for this purpose. I do think the person, whoever he may be, who fills that great office, is specially pointed out for the performance of that duty. I see no objection to associating him in it with the Lord Chancellor; and the Lord Chancellor, as head of the Supreme Court, may properly, I think, be associated with him. From the experience I have had of cases in which the co-operation of two Judges has been necessary, I have no doubt whatever that they will be able perfectly to agree in the discharge of this duty, and if in any point they should differ, then, as it appears to me, the very fact of this difference would be a good reason why the particular rule of which one of them might disapprove should not be adopted. I cannot but think it would be a serious mistake to expose the working of this Bill to the possibility of dissatisfaction on the part of the Judges by the omission of the person who is naturally pointed out by his position as one who ought to have at least a voice in this matter. What reasons may operate in any minds to the contrary I do not know, but I know from my own experience the great importance of doing everything which can be done to avoid friction among persons filling the high offices of which I have spoken. The best way of avoiding that friction, in my opinion, is to place confidence where it ought to be placed, and not to appear to refuse to one great office a function which the propriety of things seem specially to point out for it. I need not enlarge further upon the matter, but I feel that I should not have been doing my duty if I had not endeavoured to impress these considerations upon your Lordships.

Amendment moved in Clause 3, page 1, line 21, after ("Lord Chancellor") add ("and the Lord Chief Justice of England.")—(The Earl of Selborne.)

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I heartily concur in the Motion which has been made. It may perhaps be in your Lordships' recollection that when the subject was discussed in this House, and some observations were made by the Lord Chief Justice on the subject, I said that I would myself propose not indeed the exact Amendment which the noble and learned Lord has mentioned, but substituting the office of Lord Chief Justice for that of the Lord Chancellor. I was not a Member of the Committee to which the Bill was referred, and, therefore, I could not redeem my promise; but I now desire to state that I heartily recommend it to your Lordships' acceptance. There is only one observation which I should like to make. The noble Earl seemed to suggest that by some possibility there might be some disagreement between those two high officers on such a subject. Now, I cannot imagine that there could be any. It is quite impossible to suppose that on such a subject there could be any real difference of opinion. I am quite sure that either would take the opinion of the other without the least friction arising between them.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: I have very considerable hesitation in offering any opposition to this proposal, backed as it has been by both the noble and learned Lords who have spoken, whose opinions very rightly command the confidence of the House in any matter which relates to law, but, at the same time, I shall be guided in the course which I shall take entirely by the apparent sense of the House. Unfortunately, I am bound to say I do not concur in the opinions which have just been expressed, and I will give my reasons very shortly. In the first place, I can assure the noble and learned Lord who made the Motion, that, like himself, I have no idea of pointing to any personal reference at all in any remarks which I may make. Now, the reason why, in the first instance, I inserted the office of Lord Chancellor was because, in all Bills of this kind, it has been customary to specify the Lord Chancellor in connection with regulations whenever they happen to be made. It has always been understood that when regulations are made with the approval of the Lord Chancellor, he has taken the steps which are necessary to satisfy himself that those regulations are proper, and, presumably, of course, in a case of this kind the Lord Chancellor would have consulted the Judges. This proposal, as has been mentioned, was considered in Committee, and hearing of it when it was first made, for it was made rather suddenly, I was myself rather disposed to accept it; and it was not until I had considered it a little further that I thought it would be better to retain the Bill in the form in which it now stands. Of course, it is quite possible, as it has been stated, that the Lord Chancellor and the Lord Chief Justice might not agree with regard to any particular regulation. In that case, either the Lord Chancellor or the Lord Chief Justice would be able to stop any regulation; and as to whether that would or would not be right, your Lordships will be able, each of you, to form your own opinion. It may be thought that the Lord Chief Justice, who, as has been stated, is familiar with circuits, and who does himself go circuit, should not make the regulations, as it is clear he would be able practically to make the regulations for his own reception and for the reception of the other Judges. I do not wish to make any strong statement upon the matter; but, still, it was stated very clearly to the Committee that the arrangements which had been made had not always been very satisfactory to the High Sheriffs, and, in some cases, had been felt by them to bear rather hardly upon them. Of course, at the present time, the power which the Judges have with regard to their reception is an absolute and a despotic power. If anything is not done which they think ought to be done, they have a very strong argument in their own hands, and can settle the matter in the way which they think best. It is, I submit to your Lordships, scarcely desirable, especially after the evidence that was given to the Committee, that that practice should continue. That is a matter which the House must decide, and I would myself rather see the Bill stand as it is at present. I think the Lord Chancellor's name is quite a sufficient guarantee that all due regulations will be made for the proper reception of the Judges. If your Lordships prefer, as the two noble and learned Lords have suggested, that the office of the Lord Chief Justice of England should be inserted, I must then accept it; but, for myself, if I receive support from the House, I shall feel compelled to take the sense of the House on the question.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: This matter was discussed, as has been mentioned, in the Standing Committee, and I confess, with the greatest possible deference and respect to the two noble and learned Lords, I have a very strong opinion indeed against inserting the name of the Lord Chief Justice. My opinion is, that if that be done, you will almost certainly have that very friction which we all desire to avoid. You must remember what the nature of this clause is. It is not that the Lord Chancellor and the Lord Chief Justice are to make the necessary regulations, but it is the County Council in each county which is to make the regulations, subject to the assent of the Lord Chancellor; and while I think it is quite possible that the matter can be settled satisfactorily with the County Council by the Lord Chancellor after he has ascertained the views of the whole of the Judges, I cannot help feeling that if you put in this clause, however great our respect for those high officers may be, there will occur some friction which we would most particularly desire to avoid between the County Councils and those who have to determine and decide upon the regulations. It seems to me upon principle to be wrong that any persons, however high in position, should themselves make regulations affecting themselves, as in this case, for the reception of the Judges. We know that no person, whoever he may be, is a good Judge in his own cause; and it is much better in a matter of this kind, which, after all, is not a very serious one, but a matter in which we should all desire that every attention and respect should be paid to the Judges, that no friction should occur. It seems to me that if the Lord Chancellor, who has full opportunity of consultation with the Judges, should himself determine whether the regulations as settled by the County Council are satisfactory, that would be much more likely to lead to no further comment than if the name of the Lord Chief Justice were put in.

LORD HERSCHELL: I do not think this matter is one of very great importance, but I cannot altogether agree with my noble and learned Friend who spoke just now, that it is a matter which concerns the Judges only, that is to say, the manner in which they are to be received on circuit. I believe it is of very great importance, as regards the administration of justice, that due and proper respect should be paid to the Judges as they go on their legal duties to the various counties of England. If the spirit in which this measure is to be worked is, that it is intended that the counties shall discharge that obligation as cheaply as possible, or as economically as they can, which seems rather to be the suggestion now made, I think more evil than good will result from it, and the disadvantages will be greater than any advantage that the Bill will bring. This, of course, I may remind your Lordships, is not a matter in which I am, or ever could be, concerned; and I may, therefore, the more be allowed to point out that there is sometimes a disposition to underestimate the effect which is produced upon the public mind by the appearance of the Judges at Assizes, and the respect with which they are received as they make their entrances at the different towns on their circuits. There is, I own, to my mind, a considerable danger and evil which may arise. Under this Bill you are to have regulations made by each County Council separately. Now, I quite agree that there are many County Councils which probably will deal with this matter in the right spirit and thoroughly well; but I do not know that I feel satisfied it is an absolute certainty that every County Council will deal with the matter in the same spirit, and with the same degree of efficiency throughout the counties of England and Wales. Therefore, it seems to me that there is a necessity for this matter being closely watched and scrutinised; but I desire to enter my protest against the notion that it is the desire of the Judges from any personal interest or to gratify any desire for display or vanity on their part that this attention should be paid to them. It is a matter of the respect due to the administration of justice, and not merely to the individuals who administer it.

*THE MARQUESS OF BATH: Surely, my Lords, the Lord Chancellor can be trusted to consult in this matter with the Judges, and only to sanction those arrangements which he thinks right and proper. It is, I think, a most invidious position in which to propose to place the Lord Chief Justice, who himself goes circuit, that he should appear as objecting apparently in his own interest to any regulations or arrangements which the County Councils may think fit to make. It is really in his interest and for his dignity that any objections which are to be made should come from the Lord Chancellor and not from the Lord Chief Justice, who himself goes circuit. But, my Lords, it is no use to attempt in this House to ignore things which are said outside the House, and there is no doubt there have been great complaints with regard to the exactions, if I may use the word, which have been made occasionally by Judges upon the unfortunate gentlemen who have had the honour to fill the office of High Sheriff; and there is no doubt that if the Lord Chief Justice, as representing the Judges, is placed in the position of I will not say disputing with the County Councils, but of objecting to the arrangements made by the County Councils with regard to his own reception, you will not find that the County Councils will bear with as much equanimity and silence what they may consider undue exactions made upon them as the High Sheriffs have felt themselves compelled to display in the past.

EARL GRANVILLE: It is quite certain this matter is not being argued upon Party grounds; but I would point out as rather remarkable that the only Peers who object to the decision of the Committee are the Lord Chancellor and two ex-Lord Chancellors.

LORD HERSCHELL: I beg the noble Lord's pardon. I took no objection with regard to the point upon the Bill as it stands. I only answered some remarks which were made by my noble Friend. I said nothing on the subject of this particular Amendment.

EARL GRANVILLE: I really think there has been too much modesty shown in the matter by my noble Friends with regard to the question of competence on the part of so high an officer to decide these questions, which after all are not of the greatest importance. I am sure all your Lordships will agree that the two things to be combined as much as possible, are, that on the one hand there should be sufficient respect and dignity attending the circuits of the Judges, and, on the other hand, that there should be no unnecessary expenses unfairly bearing upon the High Sheriffs. But one thing I cannot assume with the noble Lords, and that is that there is no danger of a conflict of opinion. I think we have all known lawyers disagree; we have often seen Judges of different opinions; and I think it is a much more serious consideration that there should be no conflict between the Lord Chancellor and the Lord Chief Justice upon such a point than that the Lord Chancellor should go wrong, and perhaps decide that there should only be two horses instead of four to the Judge's carriage. Therefore, I think if the noble Earl presses the question I shall feel myself bound to support Lord Camperdown.

*THE EARL OF SELBORNE: I am bound to say that the arguments I have heard against the Motion would tend fully to confirm my view, because they seem to depend upon a want of confidence in the Judges, as represented by the Lord Chief Justice, for which I am perfectly sure there is no ground whatever, and to which I should be very sorry indeed to see this House appear to give its countenance.

On Question, their Lordships divided :—Contents 18 ; Not-Contents 40.

Resolved in the negative.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: I have another Amendment in Clause 3, after the word "Assizes" to omit all the words down to the end of the first subsection, in order to insert the words "and otherwise as to the duties to be discharged with reference to the Judges and Assizes." The proposal which I am now making is to restore the Bill to the same shape as it was in before it entered Committee. When the Bill was in the Standing Committee, Lord Harrowby proposed to insert the words which now appear in the Bill, and his words differ from mine, inasmuch as they limit the regulations more than my words do. As the Bill now stands, the County Council and the Lord Chancellor will have power to make regulations only as to certain very definite things in connection with the reception and accommodation of the Judges. My words are wider, and would empower them to make any regulations as to matters connected with the reception and accommodation of the Judges, and which are not exactly specified. There is one instance which I think is pertinent and which is alluded to in an Amendment coming later, where Lord Powis proposes to settle whether uniform is or not to be worn by the Sheriff. Under my words a regulation of that sort, if thought necessary, might be made by the County Councils with a reference to the Lord Chancellor. As the clause stands, I think it would be hardly competent for that to be done.

That is the difference between the two cases, and I shall be guided by the sense of the House whether the words should stand as they are now or as I would prefer them. When the matter was proposed in Standing Committee the votes were equal, and though, owing to the particular form in which the question was put according to the forms of your Lordships' House, the Amendment being carried by the casting vote of the Chairman, it appears as at present, I think the intention was that it should be rejected. However, the words originally in the Bill were struck out and new words inserted.

"And as to the provision of the necessary accommodation, and as to keeping order within the precincts of the court of assize") and insert ("and otherwise as to the duties to be discharged with reference to the judges and assizes.")—(The Earl of Camperdown.)

THE EARL OF HARROWBY: As I inserted these words in Committee perhaps I ought to explain why I was anxious to put them in instead of the words of the noble Earl. The first thing to be observed about this Bill is that it had really to do with the expenses of the Sheriffs. Now, all matters connected with expenses it is most right and proper that the County Councils should make rules in regard to, and those matters are amply set out in the clause as it stands now—

"That the County Councils shall, with the concurrence of the Lord Chancellor, make regulations as to the mode in which in their respective counties the Judges are to be received at the Assizes."

That would include the expense of meeting them at the station, providing equipages, the expenses of lodgings, and as to the arrangements at the Courts of Assize, that is to say, keeping order and employing javelin-men or police. But the noble Earl goes further, and wishes to extend it generally as to the duties to be discharged with reference to the Judges of Assize. It seems to me a strong thing to say that the County Councils should lay down rules for the procedure of this very high officer the High Sheriff, as to receiving the Judges of the land. After all, the High Sheriff is one of the first officers in each county. He is supposed to rank even before the Lord Lieutenant, who is the Queen's Representative in the county, and I do not think it is consistent with the proprieties of county life that the County Councils should lay down rules for the High Sheriffs' guidance with regard to the Judges. Indeed, I do not think the County Councils would in the least desire to interfere in that way; in fact, I am sure mine would desire to avoid laying down rules as to the duties of the High Sheriff. I think, by doing this, we should give offence in many quarters in the counties. It is also quite inconsistent, I think, with regard to the Assizes themselves, and if there are any rules to be made for the guidance of the High Sheriff in his relations with the highest authorities in the land, I think that the Lord Chancellor should make them, and that it is quite inconsistent that the County Councils should do so. I am afraid, therefore, I must oppose this Amendment.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I should be glad if the noble Earl would explain what he particularly means by the words "the duties referred to," because, as has been pointed out, there may be duties beyond the mere duties of reception and expenses of lodgings.

*THE MARQUESS OF BATH: You are placing the expenses of receiving the Judges upon the County Councils, and if you place on them the duty of paying their expenses it is fair and right that the County Councils should make the regulations, subject of course to the Lord Chancellor's assent. But supposing there are other duties, as suggested, involved in regard to the High Sheriff, it will be possible as the clause now stands, without the Amendment of the noble Earl, for those duties still to be thrown upon the High Sheriff, involving expenses other than those involved in the duties which are provided for by this Act? No good whatever will have been done, and the Bill will be inoperative if the Judges can impose duties involving expense on the High Sheriff.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: The noble and learned Lord has asked me what duties I refer to. Well, I have left the duties undetermined, and I rather purposely left them so, because I think there are matters such as I referred to, with regard to wearing uniform and little matters of that kind, which I think it may be quite right to make regulations about, and which, if you retain the words in the Bill as they now stand, I think the Lord Chancellor and the County Councils would be precluded from considering. But as I have said, I shall not take the sense of the House upon this proposal, unless I see very evidently that the House is with me, and I may say that at the present moment I am rather inclined to withdraw the Amendment.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I will tell the noble Earl at once that I am very apprehensive of the effect of the words. The duty of the Sheriffs in relation to the Judges at Assizes is to carry out the orders of the Court. Of course the noble Earl did not contemplate such a thing, but I think the words do.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: No, I did not. I withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: The Amendments which I have to move are chiefly what are called drafting Amendments. There is some difficulty in dealing with counties which are divided into Ridings and Divisions. Those matters have been very carefully attended to by the draftsman, and also by my noble Friend Lord Wenlock, whom I do not see in his place, but I may inform the House that he assents to the form in which they are put.

Amendments moved, in Clause 3, page 1, line 28, leave out ("county") and insert ("joint;") in page 2, line 3, leave out ("section two") and insert ("the foregoing provisions of this Act;") in line 4, leave out from ("defrayed,") to the end of line 6, and insert—

("By the several administrative counties in such manner as is provided by the practice heretofore adopted or in such other manner as may be from time to time agreed upon by the councils of the several administrative counties, or in default of agreement may, upon the application of any of such councils, be determined by arbitration in manner provided by the Local Government Act, 1888, and each county council shall pay the sum so apportioned to the treasurer of the joint committee.")

("In the case of the counties divided into ridings and divisions, and mentioned in section forty-six of the Local Government Act, 1888, the several standing joint committees of the ridings or division shall act under this section in such rotation or at such assizes as the joint committee of the county councils formed in pursuance of the said section may determine.")

At end of clause insert ("section nine of the Sheriffs Act, 1887, is hereby repealed.")—(Viscount Cranbrook.)

LORD MONK BRETTON: In regard to the Amendment in line 4, I have a verbal Amendment. That Amendment differs from the one of which my noble Friend has given notice before. He has set out, or intended to set out, I think, the words of Section 46 of the Local Government Act, and, I suppose, per incuriam, some words have been omitted which are in that section of the Act. It should be "in such manner as provided by the practice heretofore adopted or."

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: I have no objection to that.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: I think those words were omitted on purpose. I believe it will be found that was so.

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: The objection was taken that they wished to have greater freedom than the Act allowed. I was not at the further Conference which took place about it; but perhaps, under the circumstances, my noble Friend will allow it to stand over until I can communicate.

THE EARL OF POWIS: I move to add after Clause 3 the following new clause: "A sheriff shall not be required to attend in Court dress or in uniform during the Assizes." The practice has greatly extended itself over England of requiring the Sheriffs to appear in Court dress or in full uniform. Now, that is a very useless and unnecessary burden to inflict on a small squire who may be serving the office of High Sheriff, for he is thereby forced to spend £20 or £25 upon a coat which he will never be required to wear again. Before I became a Peer I regularly attended at the Assizes both in Shropshire and Montgomeryshire upon the Oxford and North Wales Circuits, and I never saw in either of those counties the High Sheriff appearing in full uniform. He simply bore a wand in his hand, as the Mayor of a town does on ceremonial occasions, or like a Lord Chamberlain, and he appeared in his ordinary dress.

In some of the richer counties some of the men who took the office of High Sheriff for the sake of improving their social position thought, apparently, it would add to the display to put on, quite as a voluntary action, a handsome uniform. Then the custom spread, and at last the Judges required it as a right. I have several times seen in the papers accounts of the Judges insisting upon it; and in one case a Judge threatened to fine an unfortunate Sheriff who had not done so £500 if he did not appear in uniform the next day. The subject was touched upon by the Committee upon this Bill, over which the noble Earl opposite, who introduced this Bill, presided, and they reported that it was a custom which there was no lawful power of enforcing. In that state of things, I think it is much better that your Lordships should express an opinion that this custom should cease than that it should be left to be a matter of contention or arrangement in different counties under the approval of the Lord Chancellor. If it were an old custom I should not say that; but as it is a custom which has grown up within my own memory in counties where it did not originally exist, I think we should express an opinion consistent with that expressed by Lord Camperdown's Committee—that it is not a regulation which the Judges have a right to enforce, and that we should simply say that High Sheriffs are not to be required to attend in Court dress or uniform.

Amendment moved, at end of Clause 3, to insert as a new clause—

"A Sheriff shall not be required to attend in Court dress, or in uniform during the Assizes."—(The Earl of Powis.)

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I hope my noble Friend will not insist upon this Amendment. It seems to me we are descending into very small particulars when the House of Lords is discussing what kind of a coat a High Sheriff is to wear. For the sake of the dignity of the House I will only repeat that I hope the noble Lord will not press his Amendment. For myself, I am able to say that, although I was 25 years on circuit, I never heard of such a controversy as my noble Friend refers to. No doubt High Sheriffs have, from time to time, elected to appear in Court dress, but the notion of a Judge threatening to fine a Sheriff £500 because he did not appear in Court dress is one of those amiable fictions which the noble Lord must have read in some newspaper or other; and unless he tells me that he is himself cognisant of it, that it is within his own knowledge, I shall not believe it.

LORD BRAMWELL: I quite concur with my noble and learned Friend. I trust the noble Lord will not persevere in this Amendment, not that I wish High Sheriffs to appear in Court dress or uniform; far from it; but because really there is no necessity for it, because, indeed, there is no law or usage which makes it requisite for them to do so. I claim to speak with some authority in this matter, for I suppose, including Winter Commissions, I must have been some 50 circuits, and have seen, therefore, some 50 different High Sheriffs. When I first went I went with Senior Judges, and I had the advantage of their experience at that time; and I will undertake to say that I never heard of such a thing as that a High Sheriff is bound to present himself in any other dress than the ordinary dress of a gentleman. I concur with my noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor in feeling surprise that it should have been said that any Judge could by any possibility have so far forgotten himself as to threaten to fine a High Sheriff £500 because he had not appeared in costume or got some particular dress on. Really, my Lords, I do ask you to look upon me as an authority in this matter. The Amendment is not required. In addition to that, it is rather beneath the dignity of Imperial legislation, and I do trust, therefore, that the noble Earl will not persist in his Motion, particularly when it is borne in mind that if the question could by any possibility arise I suppose the County Councils could, with the concurrence of the Lord Chancellor and the Lord Chief Justice, regulate the apparel to be worn by the High Sheriff.

LORD MONK BRETTON: As the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack called for an instance I will give him one. The Lord Chancellor asked whether there was a case within the knowledge of my noble Friend of a difference arising between a Judge and a High Sheriff. I have had in my experience a case when I was Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. I received a letter from a gentleman who was to be High Sheriff, stating that the Assizes at Liverpool would not improbably last three weeks, and representing that during that time he would have "to live in Court dress," which he thought a serious inconvenience. He wrote to me, as I have stated, as Chancellor of the Duchy to know whether he could not be relieved from that necessity. In consequence, I made an application to the Lord Chief Justice, who communicated with the Judge on the Circuit, and an arrangement was made by which the High Sheriff was only to appear in Court dress on the first day of the Assizes. I am very glad to hear, what I understand to be the result of this discussion, that there is no obligation on the part of the Sheriffs to appear in Court dress or in uniform, and that the Judges have no power to fine or otherwise to molest them if they appear in their ordinary dress. Certainly I do not think that is the prevailing impression on the part of the public or of the High Sheriffs, and I question if it is that of many of the Judges themselves. I quite agree that it is a very small matter for the House of Lords to legislate about, but if it is now distinctly understood and goes forth to the public on high authority that there is no obligation on High Sheriffs to wear Court dress or uniform, and that if they do so it is entirely optional on their part, I think the whole object which my noble Friend who moved this clause has in view will be answered, and that he will see that it is unnecessary for him to further press his Amendment.

THE EARL OF POWIS: I think that what has fallen from the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack and the noble and learned Lord on the Cross Benches (Lord Bramwell) is as good as a clause, and I will, therefore, withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Clause 4.

Amendments made.

Report of Amendments to be received or Thursday next; and Bill to be printed as amended. (No. 218.)

House adjourned during pleasure; and resumed by the Earl of Morley.

PAUPER LUNATIC ASYLUMS (IRELAND) (OFFICERS' SUPERANNUATION) BILL.—(No. 209.)

House in Committee (according to order); Bill reported without Amendment; and to be read 3^a on Thursday next.

BIRSTALL WESLEYAN CHAPEL TRUST SCHEME CONFIRMATION BILL.
(No. 204.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

LORD BRABOURNE: I have to move the Second Reading of this Bill, which has come up from the other House of Parliament, merely confirming the scheme of the Charity Commissioners, and as it meets with no opposition from any quarter I simply content myself without further remark by moving the Second Reading.

Bill read 2^a (according to order), and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Thursday next.

METROPOLIS MANAGEMENT AND BUILDING ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.
(No. 168.)

Ordered that the Select Committee to whom the Bill stands referred be proposed by the Committee of Selection.

COLONIAL COURTS OF ADMIRALTY BILL.—(No. 44.)

Commons Amendment considered (on Motion), and agreed to.

ALDERSHOT ROADS BILL.

Brought from the Commons; Read 1^a; to be printed; and referred to the Examiners. (No. 219.)

HOUSING OF THE WORKING CLASSES BILL.

Brought from the Commons; read 1^a; to be printed; and to be read 2^a on Friday next. — (The Viscount Cross.) (No. 220.)

METROPOLIS MANAGEMENT AND BUILDING ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

Report from the Committee of Selection, That the Five Lords appointed a Select Committee on the Liverpool Corporation Bill and other Bills, do form a Select Committee for the consideration of the Metropolis Management and Building Acts Amendment Bill; read, and agreed to: All petitions already presented referred to the Committee, with leave to the Committee to hear such of the petitioners as they think fit by their counsel, agents, and witnesses, as also counsel for the Bill.

House adjourned at ten minutes before Seven o'clock, to Thursday next, a quarter before Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 22nd July, 1890.

QUESTIONS.

THE NEW MAGAZINE RIFLE.

THE MARQUESS OF GRANBY (Leicestershire, Melton): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether a sufficient number of cartridges for the new magazine rifle are being manufactured to form an efficient reserve of ammunition, or whether only enough are being turned out to meet the present musketry instruction requirements of those regiments which have had the new rifle supplied to them?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): It would not be to the benefit of the Public Service for me to state what number of cartridges for the new magazine rifle have been manufactured, but I am taking measures to insure the supply being sufficient for all purposes.

LEEWARD ISLANDS.

MR. SEALE-HAYNE (Devon, Ashburton): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies if he has received a copy of the Report of Colonel Sir Arthur Mackworth, of the Royal Engineers, appointed by the Governor of the Leeward Islands to inquire into and to report upon the public works in the Island of Dominica, which Report was laid before the Island Road Board, and officially condemns the public works upon which one-third of the loan has been already expended; if the said public loan of £20,000 was raised upon the security of the revenues of the island, and the Governor of the Colony, in disregard of the protests of the members of the Road Board and the unofficial members of the Local Assembly, continued with the public works now condemned by the Royal Engineer; and if he will state to the House in what way he intends to hold the Governor of the Colony responsible for this expenditure, as stated by the Under Secretary of State in answer to a question upon this subject on 4th November, 1888?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de Worms, Liverpool, East Toxteth): The Secretary of State has received from the Governor of the Leeward Islands a copy of a Report made by Sir Arthur Mackworth, at his request, on certain bridges which had been commenced in Dominica, as part of a scheme for the improvement of the roads in that island, the cost of which is provided by a public loan. The Report was unfavourable as to some of the works. It is not known whether the Report has been laid before the Road Board, or what proportion of the loan has been spent on the works condemned by Sir A. Mackworth. The loan was raised on the security of the revenues of the island. The works were designed by, and their execution was commenced under, the direction of an experienced engineer, specially engaged for the work. Objections were made to them by members of the Road Board and of the Assembly. The Governor did not at first accede to their objections; but, after a time, he put a stop to the works and called in the assistance of Sir A. Mackworth. The Governor is responsible for the application of the loan to the purposes for which it was raised, but the Secretary of State does not hold him responsible for engineering mistakes.

*MR. SEALE-HAYNE: Arising out of that answer, may I ask if the right hon. Gentleman is aware that on the 26th of June last, the Governor of the Colony used his casting vote for the purpose of overruling the opinion of the Legislative Assembly, with respect to the expenditure of a further sum of £10,000 upon these works, and whether, in his opinion, it is proper that the Governor should override the opinion of the elected Members of the Assembly on questions involving taxation?

BARON H. DE WORMS: I have received no information upon that point. The hon. Member had better put down a question.

Mr. Seale-Hayne

MR. SEALE-HAYNE: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies if he has received from the Roman Catholic Bishop of Roseau (Colony of Leeward Islands) a complaint touching the treatment of Roman Catholic patients by the Medical Officer of Institutions in the public poor house in Dominica; if he is aware of the fact that in 1888 the Legislative Assembly in Dominica passed a resolution calling upon the Governor of the Colony—and further, that since 1888 the Members of Assembly have several times asked the Governor to carry said resolution into effect; if he has received a copy of the inquiry by the Poor Law Board into the conduct of the medical officer, and of a resolution passed by the said Board on 21st March, 1890, praying the Secretary of State to put a stop to the practice of making the Medical Officer of Institutions an ex officio member of the Board; and if he will instruct the Governor of the Colony to remove the said medical officer from the Board of Management, and thus give effect to the resolutions of these two important Public Bodies?

"To remove the Medical Officer of Public Institutions from the anomalous position of being Chairman of the Poor Law Board and Medical Officer to Public Institutions;"

BARON H. DE WORMS: The Secretary of State has received through the Governor of the Leeward Islands a complaint from the Roman Catholic Bishop of Roseau against the action of the Medical Officer of the Public Institutions with respect to a Roman Catholic inmate of the poor house; but after being furnished with the Governor's explanation of the circumstances, he saw no reason to blame the officer. In 1889 the Legislative Assembly of Dominica passed a resolution to the effect stated in the question, but the Secretary of State does not know whether the members of the Assembly have subsequently asked the Governor to carry it into effect. The Secretary of State has received a Report of an inquiry by the Poor Law Board, and a resolution recommending the repeal of the Statute under which the medical officer is ex officio a member of the Board. The Secretary of State has considered the question, but does not propose to instruct the Governor to give effect to these resolutions.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): If the Government disputes the accuracy of the Report, is there any objection to lay on the Table the Report of the Roman Catholic Bishop of Roseau?

BARON H. DE WORMS: I will communicate to the Poor Law Board the desire of the hon. Gentleman.

PRISON LABOUR—MAT MAKING.

MR. QUILTER (Suffolk, Sudbury): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is in a position to state what is the daily average number of prisoners employed in mat making; how many of that number are working for the Prison Department; how many have their labour let out to the trade; and what proportion of the last-named are working on behalf of the firm of Goodacre & Company, of West Ham and Glemsford?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. STUART WORTLEY, Sheffield, Hallam): The Secretary of State is informed by the Prison Commissioners that the daily average for the last year was 1,218, and that this number has since been reduced. Of these, as far as can be estimated, 288 were working for the Prison Department, and 930 had their labour let out to the trade. Of these latter 532 worked for Messrs. Goodacre.

*MR. QUILTER: Does not the hon. Gentleman think that 930 out of 1,218 is a very large proportion of prison labour to hire out in competition with free labour in a limited trade?

*MR. STUART WORTLEY: That is a matter for Debate.

CENSUS CLERKS.

SIR WALTER FOSTER (Derby, Ilkeston): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the census clerks, selected for employment under the Registrar General will "be chosen by open competition within suitable limits of age," as specially recommended by the Census Committee in its Report; and, if not, why not?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): The arrangements for appointing census clerks are not yet concluded, but steps will be taken by examination to secure that none but efficient clerks are appointed. It will be necessary to make clear that the appointments are only temporary, and do not set up any right or title to the permanent Civil Service.

THE WOMEN'S UNION.

MR. WALTER M'LAREN (Cheshire, Crewe): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will explain why he refused to receive a deputation of women, mainly representing the Women's Union, who wished to lay before him certain complaints respecting the conduct of the police, who were stated to have behaved with great harshness to working women during their agitation for better wages; and whether he will re-consider his refusal and receive the deputation?

*MR. STUART WORTLEY: The Secretary of State in the exercise of his discretion did not consider then, and does not consider now, that any public advantage would be gained by his consenting to receive this deputation. Complaints as to assault should be addressed to the Courts of Law, and not to the Secretary of State, who has no power to determine whether or no assaults were committed on particular occasions. The allegations as to the harsh conduct of the police were duly referred to the Commissioner of Police, and his Report shows that every care was taken by the police to avoid rough usage, and that they in no way exceeded their duty.

TUBERCULOSIS IN CATTLE.

MR. LEES KNOWLES (Salford, W.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if he will state the names of the Commissioners to be appointed to inquire into the subject of tuberculosis in cattle, and the nature of their inquiry?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): The Commissioners are Lord Basing, Professor Brown, Dr. George Buchanan, Mr. Frank Payne, and Professor Burdon Sanderson. They are appointed

"To inquire and report what is the effect, if any, of food derived from tuberculous animals on human health, and, if prejudicial, what are the circumstances and conditions with regard to the tuberculosis in the animal which produce that effect upon man."

MR. SEXTON: May I ask why no person connected with Ireland has been appointed on the Commission?

*MR. RITCHIE: The fact that Ireland might desire to be represented did not occur to me. The Commissioners chosen are men of great professional ability, in whom I am sure the three countries will have confidence.

MR. SEXTON: If the Irish Members desire to have a representative, will the right hon. Gentleman consider the point?

*MR. RITCHIE: I am afraid it is too late now, because the names have received the Royal Assent, and the Warrant has been made out. I will, however, inquire and let the hon. Member know the result.

THE GRENADIER GUARDS.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he has yet considered the sentence on the men of the Grenadier Guards; if the men sentenced were old or young; if they will remain in England to undergo their sentence, or whether they will accompany the regiment to Bermuda; and if he will recommend the reduction of the sentence?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I have not considered the sentences. The men of the Grenadier Guards who have been convicted by Court Martial are aged 27 years and nine months, 26 years and two months, 28 years and one month, 25 years and seven months, 25 years and 10 months, and 29 years and six months. They will remain in England to undergo their imprisonment.

MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee): May I ask on what principle the six men, and six men only, were selected for trial, and whether any punishment, except being sent abroad, is to be awarded to the other insubordinates? I will also ask whether the right hon. Gentleman will lay on the Table of the House a complete copy of the proceedings of the Court Martial?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: My reply to the latter part of the hon. Gentleman's question is entirely in the negative. The reason why six men were selected for trial was that, according to the custom in such cases, the men tried were the senior soldiers in the respective companies.

MR. SINCLAIR (Falkirk, &c.): May I ask whether the sending of the troops abroad is to be considered a punishment?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I can only, as I have already said, lay the facts before the House. The House must draw its own conclusions.

*MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I feel the difficulty of Parliamentary interference where discipline is concerned, but having been myself a private soldier I venture on an appeal. As the sentences passed on the convicted men were considered excessive, will the right hon. Gentleman, from the point of view of mercy, consider whether part of those sentences may not be remitted?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I have not yet had an opportunity of seeing a copy of the proceedings in question, or forming any opinion upon them, but I deprecate Parliamentary interference in such cases. Of course, I take full responsibility in the matter.

MR. E. ROBERTSON: Is there any special reason why the Reports of these proceedings should not be laid on the Table, as is usual in such cases?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: It is not usual to lay the proceedings of Courts of Inquiry on the Table.

MR. E. ROBERTSON: This is not a Court of Inquiry, but a Court Martial; and I must press for a reply to the question.

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I am afraid I must decline to lay the proceedings on the Table.

*MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): Will the right hon. Gentleman order an inquiry into the conduct of the officers?

MR. CONYBEARE: Is there any precedent for sending a regiment abroad as a punishment for insubordination?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I have not pursued my historic inquiries far enough to be able to answer the question of the hon. Member.

An hon. MEMBER: Has Colonel Maitland applied to be tried by Court Martial?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I have not heard so.

PRIZE FIGHTS AT THE PELICAN CLUB.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if any Reports have reached him as to alleged prize fights having taken place at the Pelican Club and other places; if the fact of the men wearing a small hand glove places them beyond the restrictions of the law; if he is aware that at a recent exhibition of this nature at the Pelican Club one man was seriously hurt; and if in future the police will be instructed to stop all prize fights, whether with or without gloves?

MR. STUART WORTLEY: The Secretary of State has received representations on the subject of glove fights. In the opinion of the Secretary of State the wearing of a small glove does not by itself affect the character of a contest which may, or may not, be illegal by virtue of the attendant circumstances, and irrespectively of the fact whether gloves are worn or not. I have no information as to a man having been recently hurt at the Pelican Club. The Secretary of State is advised that exhibitions of skill in boxing, as distinguished from prize fights, are not in themselves illegal. It would be impossible, therefore, to give any such general instructions to the police as are suggested.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: If information reached the police that one of the combatants had been severely punished, would it not be within the province of the police to interfere, or is the fact that gloves are used, although a man may be knocked senseless, to debar the interference of the police?

MR. STUART WORTLEY: I have no doubt that every case would be considered on its merits.

OVERLOADING OF CATTLE SHIPS.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if his attention has been called to several instances of alleged overloading of cattle ships from New York to Liverpool; if the death-rate among the cattle is very high on these passages; and if reports of great cruelties to cattle on board these ships have reached him?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): I fear the death-rate in some of these cases has been extremely high, but I have no information that would justify a charge of cruelty. I have directed inquiries to be made on the whole subject.

NEWFOUNDLAND.

MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he can confirm the report that Sir Baldwin Walker has paid the damages claimed by Mr. Baird for illegal seizure of his lobster factory on the coast of Newfoundland; and whether, as the litigation is apparently now ended, he will now state under what law of the Imperial Parliament, or the Newfoundland Legislation, or in virtue of what prerogative of the Crown, the instructions to commanding officers were issued by Her Majesty's Government?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de Worms, Liverpool, East Toxteth): I know nothing more than the telegrams in the newspapers; and as I am not in a position to confirm the report, I must refrain from answering the second part of the question.

THE LOCAL TAXATION BILL.

MR. BARBOUR (Paisley): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if the £40,000 he purposes to give to Scotland is to be divided proportionately between the Burgh and County Councils or given to County Councils only; if to County Councils only, can he state on what principle this decision has been arrived at?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): The sum in question, which amounts to £50,000, and not to £40,000, as stated by the hon. Member, will be divided proportionately between Burgh and County Councils.

RATE OF EXCHANGE IN INDIA.

MR. KING (Hull, Central): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether, in view of the fact that since March last, when the official rate of exchange between the Indian and Imperial Governments was fixed at 1s. 5d. to the rupee, the rupee has risen in value to over 1s. 7d., whereas the Indian Government is, to its great profit, now paying its servants their family remittances, furlough, and pensions at 1s. 5d., the Secretary of State will now arrange, since it is practically certain that the rupee will not fall in value during the current financial year, to give the benefit of the rise in exchange to its servants by settling with them at the current rate?

SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE (Kensington, N.): Before the right hon. Gentleman replies to the question, I wish to ask a further question on the same subject, of which I have given him private notice. I wish to know whether he is aware that more than one-half of the Indian Uncovenanted Civil servants pensioned in England receive pensions of less than £200 a year; and is he aware that a nominal pension of £200 a year is reduced by the loss of the exchange to about £135, although the Government get about £160 for the same sum at the current rate?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): In reply to the question of the hon. Member for Hull (Mr. King), I have to say that the Secretary of State cannot alter the official rate of exchange after it has been once fixed. It is applied to very large transactions, amounting nearly to £1,000,000. In reply to the hon. Member for North Kensington (Sir Roper Lethbridge), I have no doubt that the figures he gives are correct, but such considerations cannot affect the current rate.

MR. KING: Is it not the fact that since the official rate was fixed a Silver Bill has been passed in America, which practically ensures what I state in my question, that the rupee will not fall in value during the current financial year?

SIR J. GORST: I am sorry to state that the Secretary has no information of what passes in the United States.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): If I put a Motion on the Paper for a Return of the amount of profit which the Government make under this head, will the right hon. Gentleman oppose it?

SIR J. GORST: I must have notice of that question.

MR. MAC NEILL: Then I will repeat it to-morrow.

THE INDIAN BUDGET.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India when the Paper which he last year described as an explanatory Memorandum on the Indian Financial Statement will be circulated; and if he can say on what date the Indian Budget Statement will be made?

SIR J. GORST: The Paper to which the hon. Gentleman refers will be circulated a few days before the Indian Budget was taken. In regard to the last paragraph of the question of the hon. Member, I have to say that I can neither foretell nor fix the day upon which it will be for the convenience of the House to discuss the Indian Finances.

MR. BRADLAUGH: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will remember that last year he gave us two months to consider this Paper.

SIR J. GORST: The hon. Gentleman is in error. I did not give two months to consider the Paper. I circulated the Paper when I thought the Indian Budget was coming on, but the House postponed the consideration of it.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): May I ask the First Lord of the Treasury if he can give the House any information as to the day upon which the Indian Budget is likely to be taken?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I am afraid that further progress must be made with the Bills now before the House and with Supply before the Indian Budget can be taken.

THE AMIR OF AFGHANISTAN.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether any and what communication has been recently addressed by the Viceroy of India to the Amir of Afghanistan relating to the treatment of some of the Amir's subjects; if he can state what reply has been received from the Amir; and whether he will lay Papers upon the Table?

SIR J. GORST: Yes, Sir; certain communications have taken place, but it would not be to the public interest to produce them.

THE SHIRE DISTRICT.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he can assure the House that Her Majesty's Government will not accept any arrangement with the Government of Portugal by which the British Settlements in the Shire district and the Shire Highlands are placed under Portuguese rule?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: No such proposal has been at any time entertained by Her Majesty's Government.

ARMENIA.

MR. SCHWANN (Manchester, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether his attention has been drawn to the report in the Daily News of 19th July, that General Hassan Hauri Pasha has been appointed Governor of Erzeroum and General Osman Nowie Pasha (Governor of Van, in the places of Samih Pasha and Halied Bey dismissed; whether he knows anything as to the previous history and character of the two former; and whether it is true, as reported in the Daily News of the 21st instant, that

"Osman Ghazi Pasha has been appointed to command in Armenia to carry out a policy of wholesale persecution and suppression in Armenia" which is said to have been decided upon by the Porte?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: We have no official knowledge of these appointments.

MR. LEVESON GOWER (Stoke-upon-Trent): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether Her Majesty's Government have reason to believe that it is the present intention of the Porte shortly to proclaim a state of Martial Law in Armenia; whether such a proclamation would be in distinct violation of the undertaking of the Turkish Government in the Anglo-Turkish Convention of 1878, to introduce reforms into the administration of that country; and whether, in the event of such a proclamation being issued, Her Majesty's Government will notify to the Porte that they hold themselves fully absolved from all obligations imposed upon England by this Convention?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs will answer the question.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: We have received no information of any such intention on the part of the Porte, and it is, therefore, unnecessary that I should reply to the hypothetical questions suggested by the hon. Member.

CYPRUS.

MR. E. ROBERTSON: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies if he can explain what were the grounds for the opposition of the official members of the Legislative Council of Cyprus to a Bill, brought forward by Mr. Pascal Constantinides, having for its object the formation of an Agricultural Bank in Cyprus, which was one of the foremost remedial measures urged by the Cypriot Deputation that waited on the Colonial Office in the autumn of 1889, and which was recently passed by the majority of the members, seeing that repeated promises have been made by the Colonial Office to attain that object; whether the Colonial Office intend, in the case of the Bill in question, to allow the views of the elected representatives of the people to be carried out; whether in view of the fact that recommendations adopted by the representative section of the Legislative Council have been frequently disregarded, it is proposed to take any steps to give better effect to the wishes of the majority; whether any and what action has been taken to mitigate the heavy pressure of taxation obtaining in Cyprus, and which was also a matter of urgent appeal in the Memorial submitted by the Deputation referred to; and whether it is true that Her Majesty's Government have refused appreciably to curtail the expenditure of which complaint was also made?

BARON H. DE WORMS: The answer to the first and second paragraphs of the hon. Member's question is that the High Commissioner has not yet reported officially as to the introduction of this Bill, or the proceedings which took place upon it. It is not the case that the Colonial Office has made repeated promises to attain the object of establishing an agricultural bank. All the promises which the Secretary of State has made upon the subject have been conditional on a practicable scheme being brought before him. The third paragraph of the hon. Member's question contains such controversial assumptions that it is impossible to give it an answer. If he will refer to the Colonial Office Letter, to the Cyprus Deputation of the 4th of August, 1889, at page 10 of the Blue Book C 6003, he will see that those assumptions are not admitted to be accurate by the Secretary of State. As regards the views of Her Majesty's Government on the question whether the taxation is oppressive, and whether both the taxation and expenditure can, and ought to be reduced, I would refer the hon. Member to the views of Her Majesty's Government as expressed in the Secretary of State's Despatch of the 22nd of March on pages 33 and 34 of the Blue Book C 4903, to which I have nothing to add.

BRAZIL.

MR. P. STANHOPE (Wednesbury): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the attention of Her Majesty's Government has been called to the action of the Provisional Government of Brazil, in arbitrarily confiscating concessions granted to British Railway Companies in that country; and whether Her Majesty's Government will take steps to point out to the Brazilian Government the serious injury thereby inflicted upon its credit?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The attention of Her Majesty's Government has been called to the action of the Provisional Government of Brazil in cancelling two concessions granted to a British Railway Company in that country, on the ground that the company had failed to fulfil the conditions of the contract. The company state in their defence that this failure is due to circumstances beyond their control. Her Majesty's Minister has been instructed to make friendly representations on the subject, as it is believed that the action of the Provisional Government was founded on erroneous information as to the proceedings of the company.

RAILWAY RATES.

COLONEL BLUNDELL (Lancashire S.W., Ince): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade when the Report of the Board of Trade inquiry into Railway Rates, of which Lord Balfour of Burleigh was President, will be issued, as the Midland, London and North-Western, Great Western, and North Staffordshire Railway Companies have announced an increase of 9d. per ton upon coal and coke to Hastings and St. Leonards, such increase to take effect from 1st August?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I do not see the precise connection between the first and second parts of my hon. Friend's question. As provided by the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888, a Report will be presented to Parliament when it is seen whether the companies do or do not come to an agreement with the Board of Trade on the maximum rates proposed.

MORTALITY AMONG CORNISH MINERS.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when Mr. Pinching, the Inspector of Mines in Cornwall, was instructed by the Government to inquire into the excessive rate of mortality among the miners of Cornwall; whether he can state what steps Mr. Pinching took to acquaint himself with the facts as to the prevalence of the disease, its causes, its results, and the best remedies; whether he has received from Mr. Pinching any evidence upon the subject, or any written Report in addition to the opinion telegraphed on the 14th instant; whether he is aware that no notice whatever of any such intended inquiry was given in the county and among those principally interested in the subject, namely, the miners themselves, and that, consequently, no evidence on the part of the miners can possibly have been placed before the Inspector; and whether, as no inquiry will be satisfactory or command the confidence of the mining population which is not thorough and public, he will cause such an inquiry to be held in the locality?

*MR. STUART WORTLEY: The hon. Member seems to be under some misapprehension as to what has taken place. No special inquiry has been ordered, or is being held. In the ordinary course, the question of the hon. Member, when it first appeared on the Paper, was referred to the Inspector for his Report and observations. It may be assumed that the Inspector had made himself acquainted, in the ordinary discharge of his duties, with the necessary facts, without taking special steps to investigate a matter which had for many years past been engaging the attention of the Department, and which was specially reported upon in 1888, with a view to the amendment of the existing law. The Inspector's written Report has not yet been received. The Government are already in possession of what information they require to enable them to deal with the question of improving the conditions of work in Cornish and other metalliferous mines, so far as they can be improved by legislation, and a further inquiry of the nature suggested by the hon. Member does not seem to be necessary.

MR. CONYBEARE: Is it the fact that the Home Office have received a telegraphic opinion, from Mr. Pinching, and do they intend to act upon that telegraphic opinion?

*MR. STUART WORTLEY: The Bill has been drafted which is to deal with the question.

MR. CONYBEARE: Will the Bill be introduced this Session, so that the Representatives of the miners may have an opportunity of considering it before the Winter Session?

*MR. STUART WORTLEY: I am unable to say.

MR. CONYBEARE: Do the Government share the opinion of Mr. Pinching that everything that is necessary is done for the miners, and that they are in no danger?

*MR. STUART WORTLEY: That is a matter of opinion upon which the hon. Gentleman will be able to form his own judgment when he sees the Bill.

CUSTOMS HOUSE MESSENGERS.

MR. J. R. KELLY (Camberwell, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether any Memorial has been recently received by the Treasury from the messengers at the Custom House praying for the redress of certain grievances; and whether, if so, he will state when a reply to it may be expected; whether the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Customs have recently decided to fill only each alternate vacancy to the first-class messengerships, and whether he will state the reason for which two vacancies in such class have remained unfilled; and whether, in view of the fact that the whole of the second-class messengers entered the service under the conditions set forth in the Treasury Minute of 1st April, 1873, giving them the right of rising to the maximum of £90 per annum, he will take the necessary steps for the carrying out of such Treasury Minute?

MR. JACKSON: A Memorial from the Customs Messengers was received on the 16th inst., and is now under the consideration of the Treasury. It will be answered in due course; but, pending the answer, I am not in a position to answer other questions.

CIVIL SERVICE WRITERS.

MR. J. R. KELLY: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether Civil Service writers who may be recommended by the heads of their Departments for appointments as statistical abstractors, but who previously to becoming writers may have been clerks in Government offices and have commuted their pensions, would be ineligible for such appointments under the provisions of the Superannuation Acts or otherwise?

MR. JACKSON: I do not know who the officers are described by the hon. Member as statistical abstractors, and I, therefore, can give no reply as to the particular instance which he cites. The Superannuation Act requires the Government to recall pensioners to the Service when practicable. That and the Commutation Act prescribe the reductions to be made in receipts of pensioned men re-appointed to the Public Service, whether they are drawing or whether they have commuted their pensions.

QUINQUENNIAL VALUATION OF THE METROPOLIS.

MR. J. R. KELLY: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether his attention has been called to the great difficulty which has been experienced in obtaining proper information for the purposes of the Quinquennial Valuation for the Metropolis, more especially with reference to the value of tenement houses, of which the weekly rentals have in the first instance been given in but very few cases; and whether, with a view of obviating such difficulty in the future, he will consider the question of the desirability of so altering the forms (9 B) as to include a question specially applicable to tenement houses, and also a notice to the owners of such houses that they are required to state the full weekly rentals received by them?

MR. GOSCHEN: I am informed by the Inland Revenue Department that they have not heard of any such difficulty as that referred to by the hon. Member. All the Returns for the valuation now being made for the current year have already been received and laid before the Assessment Committees for the purpose of hearing objections. The question of altering the form of the notice for return in the manner suggested by the hon. Member will be considered before the next Quinquennial Valuation.

MACEDONIA.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the attention of the Foreign Office has been called to a letter which appeared in the Times of Saturday last, describing in detail the deplorable condition of anarchy which prevails in North-Western Macedonia, the frequent acts of robbery and murder perpetrated on the Christian population there by Albanians and other Mussulman tribes, and the virtual connivance of the Turkish Authorities in these outrages; whether he can now give the House any information as to the massacre of Christian refugees near Kossovo, regarding which he was questioned three weeks ago, and an account of which appeared a month ago in a semi-official journal at Vienna as well as in other German newspapers; and whether Her Majesty's Government intend to take any steps to inform themselves regarding the condition of this part of European Turkey, where elements of disorder exist which seriously threaten the peace of the East?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The Reports from Her Majesty's Consular Officers tend to show that there is considerable agitation and insecurity to life on the Turco-Servian frontier, and in North Albania. Troops have been sent to the disturbed districts to restore order. With regard to the alleged massacre of Christians at Kossovo, the Porte knows nothing of it, but promises to make inquiries. The truth seems difficult to arrive at. The Vice Consul at Scutari has been requested to make further inquiries.

MALTA.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs with reference to the following passages respecting the Maltese clergy, which occur in a Despatch from Sir Lintorn Simmons to Lord Salisbury, dated 12th December, 1889, describing his interview with the Papal Secretary of State:—

Mr. Goschen

"The Cardinal seemed surprised at the state of ignorance of the priesthood, and expressed an opinion that measures must be taken to improve their education," and to the following, which occurs in the Despatch of 23rd December:—

"In discussing the subject of the education in the English language of those who will officiate as clergy in Malta, and of their instruction as to the condition under which the island is governed, I informed Cardinal Rampolla, generally, of the sadly ignorant state of the priesthood in the island;"

whether Sir Lintorn Simmons has been requested to give the grounds for these statements reflecting on the education of the Catholic priesthood; and whether the letter, dated 20th June, from Cardinal Rampolla to Monsignor Pace, Bishop of Malta, in which the following passage occurs:—

"His Holiness is well satisfied at receiving the information which you furnish relative to the education of your clergy," has been communicated to Sir Lintorn Simmons or Her Majesty's Government?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I understand that Sir Lintorn Simmons's statement was founded on the Report of the Director of Education, an extract from which had been placed in the hands of Cardinal Rampolla. Cardinal Rampolla's letter to Monsignor Pace has not been communicated either to the Foreign Office or Colonial Office.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Will any apology be sent to the Maltese priesthood for this accusation of ignorance brought against them?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I have already referred the hon. Member to the authority for the statement of the special Ambassador.

Subsequently,

MR. T. M. HEALY: I am very reluctant to forestall a discussion by moving the adjournment in consequence of the very curt answer of the right hon. Baronet the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs. If the right hon. Gentleman can assure the House that some endeavour will be made to rectify the matter by making an attempt to procure the letter of Rampolla, I will certainly defer the Motion. I would suggest that the Cardinal's letter ought to be obtained by the Government.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am sure it would be very far, indeed, from the wishes of Her Majesty's Government to cast any reflection upon any section of Her Majesty's subjects, and I will endeavour to get information upon the subject by next Thursday.

MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he is aware that Section 29 of the Letters Patent of the Constitution of Malta (12th December 1887) provides that "All votes of public money shall, if challenged, be determined by a majority of the votes of the elected members present, and the votes of the official members shall not be recorded on such questions:"

and whether, in view of the fact that a majority of the elected members of the Council of Government in Malta is opposed to the payment of the expenses connected with the Mission of Sir Lintorn Simmons to the Vatican out of the revenues of Malta, he will consent to place upon the Estimates a Vote for the Mission in question?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The hon. Member is correct in his statement as to Section 29 of the Letters Patent. It will not be necessary to place a Vote upon the Estimates; for if the hon. Member will refer to Section 39 of the Letters Patent and the Schedule, he will see that £1,000 a year is at the disposal of the Government for special services under the title "Civil Contingencies."

IRISH CIVIL DEPARTMENTS—THE SEVEN HOURS SYSTEM.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the seven hours system, recommended by the recent Royal Commission, is being applied in Dublin offices; and, if so, whether it would be a ready and economical method of supplying the deficiency in the staff of the Registry of Deeds, and whether it would permit of the daily work being ready for public inspection on the following morning?

MR. JACKSON: The Government is in favour of the extension of the seven hours system to the Civil Departments in Dublin wherever practicable and economical. It is already in force in the following Departments:—Chief Secretary's Office, Prisons Office, Fisheries Office, Local Government Board, Office of Works, and Registrar General's Office.

It has been sanctioned for the Registry of Deeds, and will, no doubt, facilitate and hasten the process of registration.

THE NATIONAL LEAGUE.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON (Armagh, N.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he is aware that, at the Glin Branch of the National League, the following resolution was proposed and passed unanimously, on Sunday, 29th June:—

"That the branch condemns the continued arbitrary action of the Knight of Glin in again refusing the offer of a fair rent from Mr. John G. Fitzgerald, one of his oldest and most respectable tenants, and hopes, even now, he will see the folly of carrying out another death sentence on his property;"

and whether, a week afterwards, certain horses were killed and barbarously mutilated on this evicted farm of the Knight of Glin?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN, Dublin University): According to a report in the Limerick Leader, it is the case that a resolution was unanimously passed at a meeting of the Glin Branch of the National League in the terms stated in the question. I am informed that on the morning of July 8 a colt was found killed, and two other colts stabbed in several places, apparently with a hay-fork, on the farm of the Knight of Glin, from which a man of the name of Hayns had been evicted in 1882.

CHARGE AGAINST IRISH CONSTABLES.

MR. ROCHE (Galway, E.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether the Government intend to pay the expense of defending the constables against whom Mr. Fahy and Morrissey obtained decrees for £5 and £2 at last Quarter Sessions held at Gort for false arrest; also the cost of appeal which was heard before Judge O'Brien at Galway Assizes, he confirming the County Court Judge's decree, with costs; and whether he will state what course he will adopt in reference to the conduct of the constables?

MR. MADDEN: I must ask the hon. Gentleman to postpone the question. I have not received the information that will enable me to answer it.

MR. SEXTON: As the Chief Secretary is in his place, I will ask him if he is aware that the appeal has been dismissed. The fact is, that two constables arrested these two men, dragged them through the streets, kept them all night in custody, and then brought them before the Magistrates, who dismissed the case. An appeal against the decision of the County Court Judge's decree has now been dismissed by the Judge of Assize, and, as these men have acted on the advice of the right hon. Gentleman and brought their case before a legal tribunal, I wish to know what steps he proposes to take in the matter?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I will telegraph for information.

PUBLIC BUSINESS.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): I wish to inquire of the right hon. Gentleman whether the Heligoland Bill will be taken on Thursday, and also whether he is now able to indicate the time, to which my hon. Friend behind me refers, when the Foreign Vote may be taken, and when the various questions connected with the island of Malta may be considered?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The Government propose that the Heligoland Bill shall be taken on Thursday. I am not able to say when it will be possible to put the Foreign Office Vote on the Paper, but I hope it will be in the course of next week.

*MR. J. LOWTHER (Kent, Isle of Thanet): Will the Heligoland Bill be the first Order?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Yes.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I would remind the right hon. Gentleman that there is a strong feeling, at all events on this side of the House, that the matter requires early attention.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I assure the right hon. Gentleman that it is the desire of the Government to consult the convenience of hon. Members as much as possible; but the right hon. Gentleman is very well aware that there is a great pressure on the Government.

MR. BUCHANAN: Will it be possible to discuss the whole question of the Anglo-German Agreement on the Heligoland Bill?

*MR. W. H. SMITH was understood to say that the Speaker would decide that question.

Mr. Sexton

MR. BUCHANAN: The Government will make no objection?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: No, Sir.

MR. H. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Kent, Faversham): When will the Naval Estimates be completed?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am not able to state when they will be completed.

RAILWAY RATES.

In reply to Mr. TOMLINSON (Preston),

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH said: The Board of Trade do not propose at present to issue any further Papers in reference to railway rates.

MR. TOMLINSON: Where can the Papers be got?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: At the Stationery Office.

INTESTATES ESTATES BILL.—(No. 59.)

Lords Amendment to be considered forthwith; considered, and agreed to.

COUNTY COURTS (PLAINTS).

Address for—

"Returns, from every County Court in England and Wales, of the Total Number of Plaints, &c., entered in each Court, from the 1st day of January to the 31st day of December 1889, both days inclusive, distinguishing those not exceeding £20, those above £20 and not exceeding £50, and those by agreement over £50;"

On Motion of Sir John Dorington, Bill to amend the Law relating to Footpaths and Main Roads, ordered to be brought in by Sir John Dorington, Sir Richard Paget, Mr. Charles Acland, Mr. Hobhouse, and Mr. Wharton.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 395.]

ORDEES OF THE DAY.

CENSUS [EXPENSES].

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

(4.10.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That it is expedient to authorise the payment, out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, of all expenses that may be incurred for the purposes of the Census under any Acts of the present Session for taking the Census of England and Wales, Scotland and Ireland."

Mr. SEXTON: I presume that the Treasury have arrived at an estimate of the expenditure. I should, therefore, like to know what will be the proportion for each of the three Kingdoms.

(4.11.) Mr. JACKSON: I am afraid that I cannot give the information without notice. I am not sure whether an estimate has yet been made of the full cost. The amount likely to be required in the course of the present year has at present only been estimated.

Mr. SEXTON: I will put a question down for Thursday.

Question put, and agreed to.

Resolution to be reported To-morrow.

(4.14.) PUBLIC WORKS LOANS [REMISSION].

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Resolved, That it is expedient to authorise the remission of a loan, made by the Commissioners of Public Works in Ireland in respect of Killeany Pier, in pursuance of any Act of the present Session relating to Local Loans.

Resolution to be reported To-morrow.

CENSUS (ENGLAND AND WALES)
BILL (No. 385.)

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

Mr. ATKINSON (Boston): Will the persons enumerated have an opportunity of declaring their religion under the head "Protestant," or "Catholic?"

THE CHAIRMAN: That question can be raised on Clause 5.

Clauses 1 to 4 inclusive, agreed to.

(4.16.) Clause 5.

*MR. W. A. MACDONALD (Queen's Co., Ossory): I beg to move, in page 2, line 11, after "age," to insert "capacity to read and write." I think the Amendment is one of very great importance. If it is necessary to ask the age and sex of the population, I think it is far more necessary and expedient that the state of their education should be ascertained. There is no acquisition more important than the power to read and write, and I do not think it will be said that it can be difficult to obtain the information.

Amendment proposed, in Clause 5, page 2, line 11, after the word "age," to insert the words "capacity to read and write."—(Mr. W. A. Macdonald.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*(4.18.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): It might be interesting if we were able to get a Return of those in this country who are unable to read or write.

*MR. W. A. MACDONALD: Who are able.

*MR. RITCHIE: It is the same thing.

*MR. W. A. MACDONALD: With deference, I submit that it is not.

*MR. RITCHIE: I will not enter into a dispute with the hon. Member. I am afraid that no person would be willing to return himself as incapable of reading and writing, and as the information would undoubtedly be inaccurate it is not desirable to endeavour to obtain it.

*(4.20.) MR. W. A. MACDONALD: I do not think the argument of the right hon. Gentleman should have any weight at all. At the present moment you ask for a person's age, and there can be no doubt that many inaccurate Returns are made as to ladies' ages. In many instances false Returns are made, but, nevertheless, the information is asked for. I do not see that there ought to be the least difficulty in getting a satisfactory answer to such a simple question as whether a person can read or write.

(4.22.) MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): The suggestion of the hon. Member is one that is worthy of consideration, and I think there are other inquiries that would be exceedingly useful, in order that we might obtain some idea of the condition of the population. In foreign countries, especially in the colonies and in America, the Census Returns are much fuller than those of this country. It is, therefore, of importance that the Government should see their way to extending the scope of this clause.

*(4.25.) MR. RITCHIE: We are quite willing to learn everything we can from the experience of foreign countries, but I must point out that the methods by which the Returns are checked in foreign countries are such as it would be impossible to adopt here. It is perfectly clear that the Return asked for would be altogether unreliable, and, therefore, it is not desirable to enforce it. As to the age, no Return would be of any value unless the age was given.

*(4.27.) MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): The right hon. Gentleman opposes the Amendment on the ground that the information, because people would be unwilling to render it, and resent its being asked for, would, when procured, be unreliable and misleading. Now, there are no countries in the world where the people would more strongly resist any attempt to force information from them at the point of the sword than America and the British colonies, and there could be no difficulty experienced here that would not be experienced there. Nevertheless, this information is asked for and is supplied in the United States, and in some colonies, and I submit that in this country it would, if obtained, be of more value and utility than many of the Returns which are actually made.

*(4.29.) MR. RITCHIE: The hon. Gentleman must not forget that the whole matter has already been inquired into by a strong Committee; but they did not recommend that this information should be obtained.

Question put, and negatived.

(4.30.) MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to move, in page 2, line 5, after "age," to insert "nationality of father." The Committee reported in favour of an improvement in the means of ascertaining the number of foreigners here. I think it is exceedingly desirable that we should possess some better data, and the best means of ascertaining the number would be if the nationality of the father were given.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 5, after the word "age," to insert the words "nationality of father."—(Mr. Howard Vincent.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*(4.31.) MR. RITCHIE: My hon. Friend is mistaken if he thinks that the nationality of the father would be of any real practical value. It will be sufficient to know where the individual is born and whether or not he is a British subject.

*(4.32.) MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I speak only from memory, but I believe that no one in the Committee but the hon. Member himself was desirous that the nationality of the father should be given. There certainly is nothing in the Report of the Committee to justify the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Member.

Question put, and negatived.

(4.34.) BARON DIMSDALE (Herts, Hitchin): I beg to propose, after the word "age," to insert "and religion." In moving this, I wish to remind hon. Members that this was one of the questions into which the Committee inquired, and on which they took evidence, but as to which they pronounced no definite opinion. I have now endeavoured to raise the question in a way most likely to commend itself to the attention of the Committee. The two Amendments of which I have given notice have been taken bodily from the Irish Census Bill. In these days, when the great question of the day is union or separation, it is not desirable to have different laws for the two countries. I cannot conceive anything which would tend more to the repeal of the Union. Here it is proposed to have one law for England and another for Ireland. The hon. Member for East Mayo on the Second Reading said that he did not know any Irish Roman Catholic who would not be glad to make a declaration of his religion, and from what I know of Irish Protestants the same remark applies to them. But I know that objection is entertained to the proposal by the Nonconformists, who do not like being what they call ticketed. By a subsequent Amendment I intend to provide that nobody shall be subject to penalties for refusing to state his religious profession.

It is very remarkable that the leading Members of Administrations, whether Liberal or Conservative, have always been in favour of this proposal, and they have yielded only in deference to the opinion of Nonconformists. One reason why this census is wanted is on account of the important effect it would have in any discussion on disestablishment. A respected clergyman in my own neighbourhood the other day said the Government had not done much for the Church this Session, for they had not given them a Tithe Bill, nor had they consented to a religious census. It is evident there is a strong feeling among the clergy in favour of this census.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 11, after the word "age," to insert the word "religion."—(Baron Dimsdale.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'religion' be there inserted."

(4.42.) MR. H. J. ATKINSON (Boston): I am not aware where the hon. Member has obtained his information as to the wishes of Nonconformists in this matter. I have sat on Conferences and Committees of Nonconformists for the last 35 years, and I never heard any of them object to being "ticketed." Personally, I have no objection to being ticketed myself, for either my political or my religious opinions. I have good grounds for holding them, and I am quite prepared to stand up and give my reasons for those opinions. I hope my hon. Friend will disabuse his mind altogether of that idea. The Amendment includes one which I was going to move, but I am willing to accept the larger proposal. I hope my right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board will be merciful, and give us what we ask; if not, I will appeal to the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian, in whose society I should be most happy to find myself so far as this question is concerned. It is said that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian in a certain publication advised how the names of those should be arranged who had gone over from the Church of England to the Church of Rome. They were people of position. I hope the right hon. Gentleman has interest enough in the rank and file to give his support to this proposal. I am aware that it would be a shock to some right hon.

Gentlemen opposite to have their opinions on political or religious subjects recorded at stated intervals, because so many changes would have to be registered. I do plead that the number of Roman Catholics and Protestants, at all events, shall be given. As to whether the number of members of the Church of England, and the number of Dissenters and Nonconformists, should also be given I do not very much care; but if the numbers are given hon. Members opposite must clearly understand that there is a difference between a Dissenter and a Nonconformist. It will not do to mix up Dissenters with Nonconformists. I cannot agree with my hon. Friend the Baron that the census should show how many of the people are members of the Church of England and how many are Nonconformists, because by law every man who has no religion belongs to the Church of England. Put it in this way. Suppose that a man dies, declaring himself to be neither a member of the Church of England, nor a Nonconformist, nor a Dissenter, his relatives would call in a Church of England clergyman to bury him, and the man would be treated as a member of the Church of England. I do not desire to know how many people are members of the Church of England, and how many are Wesleyan Methodists. If my hon. Friend's Amendment is defeated I suppose I shall be in order in moving mine!

THE CHAIRMAN: No.

MR. ATKINSON: Then, Sir, I think there is a great want of business arrangement in this House, which is supposed to be a model of Parliamentary conduct. Surely if we cannot succeed in getting the larger demand conceded, we ought not thereby to be precluded from trying to get a smaller concession. I should have thought that common sense would have dictated the adoption of such a course. I do appeal to the right hon. Gentleman, whom I have supported for 40 years as Chairman, candidate, and Member, to consent to this Amendment or to a modification of it.

(5.51.) MR. PICTON (Leicester): The hon. Member who last spoke taunted his fellow Dissenters.

MR. ATKINSON: I am not a Dissenter; I am a Nonconformist.

Mr. H. J. Atkinson

MR. PICTON: I am sorry I do not appreciate the hon. Member's position. I will say, however, he has taunted his fellow Nonconformists with having a distaste to be ticketed; but there is another difficulty which the hon. Gentleman has not realised. A great many persons do not know how to describe themselves in the matter of religious belief. Personally, I should not know how to fill up the Return, or how to describe myself in this respect; and there are hundreds of thousands in this country who are in a similar position. The hon. Member for the Hitchin Division of Hertfordshire has let the cat out of the bag. The religious census is to be a kind of plébiscite in favour of the Established Church; but this plébiscite is a matter which ought to be decided at the polling booths. As to the principle of equality between England and Ireland, hon. Members ought to remember that the circumstances in the two countries are very different indeed. In Ireland religious differences are clearly marked, and are comparatively few in number. The vast bulk of the population is divided into the three great denominations of Catholics, Anglicans, and Presbyterians. Other classes are exceedingly few. It is, therefore, of considerable importance to know what proportion the Catholic population in Ireland forms of the whole people. On the other hand, it may be said that there are about 365 denominations in this country—one for every day in the year. If the Irish people desire it, by all means let them have a religious census in Ireland, but we do not want one in England.

*(4.56.) MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I hope, in the interests of accuracy, that the President of the Local Government Board will stand by the Bill. The whole question has been carefully considered by a Committee, and the evidence tended to show that in proportion as the number of questions to the householder were multiplied, the chances increased of diminishing the accuracy of the replies received. Quite apart from the merits of questioning people as to their religious views, as we all know, there are sufficient persons not distinctly attached to any religious denomination to destroy the value of any census records on the subject.

* (4.58.) MR. WHITMORE (Chelsea): As a member of the Census Committee, let me say it is not accurate to say that the Report of the Committee had any definite bearing on the merits of a religious census.

* MR. J. E. ELLIS: I have no wish to convey an erroneous impression. I gather the Report amounts to this, that the Committee did not find themselves in a position to make any recommendation.

* MR. WHITMORE: The Committee have not thought it right to weigh the relative merits and demerits from the political point of view of a religious census. From the statistical point of view the Return would be valuable; but when the Committee came to consider the political difficulties which surrounded a Return of this kind, they felt that they were not the proper body to go into those questions. The evidence we had before us strengthened my own opinion in favour of a religious census. It is, undoubtedly, a strong fact that in Ireland there has not been any difficulty encountered in making a Return as to religious belief. Out of the whole population only 3,000 neglected to make the return. In our Colonies this Return is cheerfully made. I confess it seems to me that the balance of argument is in favour of a religious census. The hon. Member for Leicester, whose mind on religious subjects is exceptionally flabby, need make no return of his religious belief. I believe the vast majority of the population would have no difficulty, and would in no way object to making the Return. The main objection to a religious census is that an exaggerated importance may be attached to the figures. It is said that great numbers would return themselves as members of the Church of England when, in reality, they had no very definite opinions. I quite feel the force of that objection, but it is an objection which will apply to nearly all the Returns under the census. No one pretends for a moment that the Return in any one of the columns of the census is absolutely and mathematically correct. The Return is made subject to all the inferences and deductions which an observer of human nature has a right to put upon a Return. Everyone knows the value of a Return of age; no one thinks that it is absolutely accurate, especially in the case of one sex. So, undoubtedly, it would be the case with respect to a religious census. The Return would not be absolutely and mathematically accurate, but it would be a far more trustworthy Return than any we have at present. It would be properly open to criticisms and inferences, but I think it would be an important and interesting addition to our statistical information, and, therefore, I hope the Committee will assent to the Amendment proposed.

* (5.2.) MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire): The hon. Member for Boston, taunted us with having changed our opinions. I would remind the House that the man who never changes opinions is a fool. [Laughter.] I do not use that word to convey any personal disrespect. It is an old and true saying. I do not know where the hon. Member for Boston got his knowledge of Nonconformist opinion. I certainly should not have guessed from his Votes whether the hon. Gentleman was a Dissenter or Nonconformist. But, speaking for myself, I have represented a constituency of Nonconformists for something like 22 years, and I can state that a great many Nonconformists look upon a religious census as a means of inviting a man to say he is a member of the Church of England. In the eye of the law I believe we are all members of the Church of England, and the consequence is you would get all the persons whom the late Mr. Miall used to call "absenters" credited to the Church of England. The hon. Member for Chelsea candidly avowed that a religious census would not be at all satisfactory, or represent the real religious opinion of the country with perfect truth. He said that an observer of human nature would be sure to draw his own conclusions, and to make allowances. But I am afraid those who looked at the Returns are not observers of human nature, and they would at once conclude that the members of the Church of England were enormously in excess of the members of other denominations, and they would, therefore, be led to a false conclusion. In Wales there is deep religious feeling, and I am perfectly certain that there the people would have no hesitation in stating their religious faith. But when you come to the "absenters" in England you have a very different state of things. I had hoped that this matter was settled. With regard to the Committee, they certainly came to no conclusion on the point. But I understand from the First Lord of the Treasury that the Government has settled the matter, and I hope the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board will bring some pressure to bear on his supporters to resist this Amendment, which was being quite unexpectedly sprung upon us.

*MR. RITCHIE: The right hon. Gentleman must know that the Government are bound to the Bill which they lay before the Committee. At the same time I am bound to confess that, when the right hon. Gentleman appeals to me to control our followers on this particular matter, this is one of those points in respect of which we do not feel at all inclined to put pressure upon our supporters or the friends of the right hon. Gentleman who are with us. The Bill is the Bill of the Government, and to that Bill the Government, of course, will adhere. At the same time, I am bound to say that I think there is a very great deal to be said in favour of the suggestion made by my hon. Friend, and I am not in the least astonished that he has brought forward his proposal. There is great force in the arguments used on this side of the House, and in the arguments used on the other side; at the same time I do not share the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down. If the Return proved unsatisfactory, I take it that it would be because of the failure of those who are not members of the Church of England to make the Return they were asked to make. To them would attach the blame if any preponderance of the Church of England were shown. But though there is something to be said in favour of the proposal, it is not one which the Government, under the circumstances of the case, at present are prepared to accept. We should be very sorry indeed if any very sharp differences of opinion were to be raised throughout the country by a demand for such a Return. We should be sorry indeed to raise religious or political feeling in the various communities, and the effect of which would be felt in other matters in respect of which we desire to obtain information. We have adopted mainly the recommendations of the Committee with regard to the information to be obtained, and, looking to the sharp differences of opinion which exist, we see that it will be well to adhere to those recommendations, and not ask the House to assent to a religious census.

*(5.12.) MR. HOBHOUSE (Somerset, E.): I intend to vote for the Amendment, for I do not think that this question is at all one to be regarded from a Party or sectarian point of view, and I am sorry those considerations have been so far introduced. No one disputes that if this item were included in the Census Returns it would be of very great statistical advantage. I believe in Canada and the United States the Religious Return is always included, and no serious difficulty has been experienced, in spite of the great number of denominations in those countries. I cannot believe that there is a very large number of people of the opinions of the hon. Member for Leicester, who would return themselves to the enumerators as members of the Church of England. I was very glad to hear my right hon. Friend say that the Welsh people had no objection to the Return, and I believe there would be very little objection in the rest of the country.

(5.13.) MR. CAMPBELL BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.): I confess I listened with considerable astonishment to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board. I remember distinctly the First Lord of the Treasury said that the Census Bill would be precisely the same as on previous occasions. Yet the President of the Local Government Board gets up and encourages his followers to support the Amendment, which he knows will be bitterly opposed on this side of the House. I do not say it is a breach of understanding or of faith, but certainly it is not what we expected from the statements on the part of the Government with regard to this business in particular. I speak for a good many Members on this side of the House when I say that we are not afraid of a religious census because of the result it may bring about. We object to it on principle. I object to being asked of what religion I am. If a religious census is put in practice in other countries, all I can say is, I am glad I do not belong to those other countries. It is on this principle, and not because the result might be deceiving owing to weak people representing themselves as being what they are not, that many on this side of the House are strongly opposed to this Amendment. We have been led to believe that no such proposal would be encouraged by the Government, and according to what fell from the mouth of the First Lord of the Treasury these Bills were to be really the same as those that have been passed on previous occasions. Consequently, I was amazed beyond expression to find that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board, practically on the part of the Government, although he said the Government did not support the Amendment, giving a sort of back-handed support to the Amendment.

(5.16.) MR. RITCHIE: I do not think that a single word of what I stated could possibly have suggested the tone the right hon. Gentleman has adopted. I stated most distinctly that the policy of the Government was the policy of the Bill; that the Government intended to adhere to the Bill, and to oppose the Amendment; but it seems to have given the right hon. Gentleman much astonishment, that at the same time I could acknowledge there were some good arguments in favour of the Amendment, and that we did not propose to put that pressure which was suggested by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Denbighshire upon the supporters of the Government. The right hon. Gentleman said truly that this ought not to be treated as a Party question, and we, having stated our views in regard to the matter and that we adhere to the Bill, propose to leave it to those who generally support the Government to act according to their own views on the subject.

(5.18.) MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): I must remind the Committee of what took place in regard to this Bill yesterday, the result of which was that there was no discussion on the Second Reading of the Scotch Bill. Will the right hon. Gentleman say that that was not the result of the acceptance by the Scotch Members in good faith of the statement that the Bill as it stood was to be adopted by the Government and their supporters? I say, unhesitatingly, that had we supposed that such an Amendment as this, involving a principle on which, as regards Scotland there exists the widest divergencies of opinion, these Bills would not have been allowed to pass the Second Reading as easily as they did. We were, in point of fact, led to understand that this discussion would not arise, and one of the supporters of the Government actually stated that he did not intend to press for and did not know whether a Division would be taken. It certainly is a most unusual thing to hear a Minister say that, although the Government themselves intend to vote for a Bill, all those who support the Government are at liberty to vote as they wish. If that is the sort of understanding we are to have in regard to public measures let us be told that it is so; but at any rate it is not the sort of understanding we have been accustomed to in this House.

(5.20.) MR. M. STEWART (Kirkcudbright): I only wish to say a word in reply to what has just fallen from the hon. Gentleman opposite. Are we on this side of the House to be expected invariably to vote for every proposal which comes from the Front Bench, without any regard to the views we ourselves entertain, or to the views our constituents wish to express? This is a question on which, in Scotland, there has been greater division of opinion than on almost any other subject, and I intend to vote according to what I believe to be my conscientious duty. In the discharge of that duty I shall vote for the Amendment of my hon. Friend, and I may add that I think the Government are perfectly right in the course they are taking on this question. I am glad they have left it as an open question, and that they do not regard their supporters as bound to follow them in their action on this Amendment.

(5.21.) MR. S. RENDEL (Montgomeryshire): We are called on to divide upon this question under somewhat peculiar circumstances, and I think it important that there should be no misapprehension, such as would appear to have been created in the mind of the hon. Member for East Somerset (Mr. Hobhouse) as to the attitude of the Welsh Members. It is quite true that the Welsh people are not at all afraid, and have nothing to fear from the results of a religious census; but, at the same time, it is a great mistake to suppose that they are favourable to this proposal, or at all approve of a religious census. On the contrary, they strongly object to it on principle. But, without delaying the House by going over the obvious arguments from a Welsh point of view, I would point out that the effect of adopting this Amendment would be to create a religious agitation as to the character of the machinery to be employed and to what extent it would affect the influence of the Church. I think, under the circumstances, it would be the most harassing and unwise proposal the House could pass, and I do hope it is clearly understood that coming, as this proposition does, at the last moment of the Session and by surprise, when, to our amazement, we hear from the Government that this is to be left as an open question, the Welsh Members as a body join in a vigorous protest against the Amendment.

(5.23.) SIR R. FOWLER (London): I feel bound to enter my protest against the assumption of the hon. Gentleman opposite the Member for Aberdeen (Mr. Esslemont), that because the Second Reading of this Bill was passed without a Division certain hon. Members on this side of the House have no right to dissent from this portion of the measure. I protest against the dictum of the hon. Gentleman that we are bound to vote against an Amendment the object of which is to carry out the views we have long entertained on this subject. We who are independent supporters of the Government ought not to be called upon to go with them into the Division Lobby when they are taking a course of which we do not approve, although, of course, the thirty gentlemen who are members of the Ministry are bound to vote for the Bill as it stands.

(5.24.) SIR H. JAMES (Bury, Lancashire): I am sure that no one can object to the right hon. Baronet and other supporters of the Government expressing their views on this subject, but, to my mind, the question is of far too much importance to be left to run loose without responsibility on the part of those who introduced the measure. No one objects to an estimate being formed of the religious opinions of the population; what is objected to is an attempt to insist on a man's making public his religious views, ["No, no!"] Hon. Members say "No," but if this Amendment be carried every man will be bound to make this Return. I know that the refusal will not be subject to a penalty, and that, legally, he need not make the Return unless he likes; but if he is asked to give his religious opinion, and he does not choose to do so, he leaves it open to the public to express doubts as to whether he really holds the religious views he professes in his private life, or to say he has no religious views to declare. This Amendment involves a change in our system of dealing with this question in England and Wales, which has never been adopted before, and to which I have always been opposed. It involves an inquisition as to men's religious opinions which ought to be most private, and ought certainly not to be made a matter of public discussion. I would much rather insist on asking a man what are his political opinions, and how he has voted; for it seems to me that from such a declaration many considerations are absent that must necessarily affect the question as to what are a man's religious opinions.

(5.26.) VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Lancashire, Darwen): I am wholly at a loss to understand the indignation of the right hon. and learned Gentleman, because he himself was responsible as a Member of the Government which brought in the last Census Bills, one of which contained a provision imposing on Ireland the necessity of making a religious Return. Why did not the right hon. and learned Gentleman exhibit on that occasion all the energy and eloquence which he has evidenced on this? He has spoken of people being compelled to state their religious belief, but he knows there is nothing in this Amendment of my hon. Friend compelling anyone to make a statement on this point. It simply allows the people of this country, if they please, to state the religious opinions they hold, and they may either say what those opinions are, or that they have no religious opinions at all, or to decline to answer the question altogether. The hon. Member for Leicester has stated that he would have a difficulty in making such a Return,

I do not think the hon. Member would find that he would have any difficulty, as he need not put any statement in that particular column of the Return; but I am sure the hon. Member does not belong to that class who would be afraid to state what religious views they hold, and I am equally certain that he would not state religious views which he does not entertain.

MR. PICTON: My statement was that if I were to refuse to state my religious views I might be put down as a member of the Church of England.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE: The hon. Gentleman sits among the Members for Ireland, and probably that may have influenced him in forming so rash a conclusion. Does he not know that after the census is taken no man will be one whit the wiser as to the religious belief of any of his neighbours. I should be inclined to say that Returns such as are asked for by this Amendment would furnish almost the most interesting statistics we could have. There is no reason why we should not follow the example of all our colonies and part of the United Kingdom, namely, Ireland, as well as the advice of many of our fellow subjects in this House—I refer to the Scotch Members. For these reasons I think hon. Members should feel no scruple in voting for the Amendment.

(5.30.) SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I think the noble Lord in his address to the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Bury (Sir H. James) forgets at which end of the Bench the right hon. Gentleman sits. The noble Lord, in the language he used to the right hon. Gentleman, was almost as vehement as he would have been if he had been attacking us. But, with the consent of the noble Lord, I will say a word as to the course the Government are taking. We had hoped that we had got into smooth waters, and that we were going to conclude the Session. The Government, on the Second Reading of the Bill, made it distinctly understood yesterday that their policy was to exclude the religious question from this Bill. [Ministerial cries of "No."] "No"? Well, we so understood it. It was in the spirit and upon the faith of that statement that the Second Reading was agreed to. I have never known a Government depart from an understanding made in this House without being justly condemned and properly punished for it. What is the position of the Government now? At an earlier part of the Session they introduced unnecessarily a liquor question, and now it appears as if they want to introduce a religious question. If they do introduce it there will be no question of Parliament meeting in November, for we shall sit till then. From the observations of the President of the Local Government Board I should say that the Government are playing fast and loose with the House. When the Government say, "We are bound to take one course ourselves, but our followers may do as they like," we know very well what it means. We know that it is an instruction to those who sit behind them, and who are a majority in the House, to defeat them on a point on which they want to be defeated. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury will at once remove the impression produced by the remarks of the President of the Local Government Board by assuring the House that the Government stand by the declaration made yesterday that this is not to be a religious census—a declaration which certainly prevailed up to half an hour ago.

MR. ATKINSON: No, no!

SIR W. HARCOURT: There is an hon. Gentleman behind the Government who undertakes to say that there was no understanding arrived at.

MR. ATKINSON: I do not say "no" for them; I say it for myself.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I do not at all care about the hon. Member's saying it for himself.

MR. ATKINSON: I do.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I quite recognise that. It is quite right that he should; but what I want to know is, what more responsible people than the hon. Member think about the matter. I think we have a right to claim a specific declaration from the Government. We have a right to expect that the Government will abide by what they have said, and that they will use their legitimate influence with their supporters to induce them to reject the Amendment.

*(5.35.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I have no hesitation in responding to the appeal of the right hon. Gentleman. The Government undoubtedly stand by what they have said. They are responsible for the Bill they have presented to the House, and, in their opinion, it is not desirable to introduce into the measure the provision under consideration. All that my right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board said was that the Government are not able to exert such pressure upon some of their followers as is necessary to prevent them from voting for the Amendment. Have not the followers of the Government already voted against them in the course of this Session? I wish the House to understand distinctly that the Government have presented this Bill in perfect good faith, believing that, on the whole, it is far better to proceed on the lines settled in the past than to make the census a religious one. Personally, I should have no objection whatever to the introduction of the religious question, but I respect the objections that are entertained against that course by a very large number of my fellow-subjects. I therefore deprecate strongly the attempt to introduce into a measure of this kind a subject which must cause heat, and, to a certain extent, ill-feeling, and certainly a vast amount of misrepresentation. It is a misfortune that this should be the case; a very great misfortune, for the statistics in regard to religion, if they could be obtained, would be very valuable. But if there is a very strong objection on the part of a large number of persons to give this information, I am not one of those who would insist upon its being furnished, nor do I think it would be sound policy to insist on its being given. The Government, therefore, stand by the Bill, and will vote against the Amendment, and I should regret the fact very much indeed if this provision were agreed to. I trust I have satisfied the House that the Government have acted in complete good faith, and that they desire that the measure shall pass in its present form.

(5.39.) MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): [Cries of "Divide!"] I take it that hon. Members who cried "Divide" are in favour of the Amendment. I can quite understand their anxiety for a Division. They fancy they have a majority—I do not think so, but they do—and they are anxious to take advantage of the circumstances. The course the Government have adopted has been somewhat curious. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board went out of his way to say that he did not intend to exert any pressure on hon. Gentlemen behind him, and that they might vote as they liked.

*MR. RITCHIE: That observation was called forth by a remark of the right hon. Member for Denbighshire, who appealed to me to put all the pressure I could upon Members who differed from me with regard to this question, so that they might vote against the Amendment. It was to that that my observation was directed.

MR. LABOUCHERE: What did the right hon. Gentleman say in response to the appeal of my right hon. Friend, who urged that the Government should put that ordinary pressure on their followers which is usual when a pledge has been given to the Opposition? The right hon. Gentleman said he could not do so. He turned round with a sort of nail-his-ears-to-the-pump look and said, "Do as you like; I will not exercise any pressure." I say that when the Second Reading was passed, it was passed on the distinct understanding that the Government were not going to allow the introduction of this religious question. It is a curious fact that the First Lord of the Treasury has avoided using any words of exhortation to his followers. In fact, he went out of his way to say that, personally, he had no objection to a religious census. What the right hon. Gentleman ought to do is this: he ought to say that the Government pledged themselves to pass the Bill as it stands, and that if they are thwarted they will drop it. If the right hon. Gentleman were to say, "If this Amendment is forced upon us, we will withdraw the Bill," the hon. Baronet the Member for the City of London and other independent Baronets and Members on the opposite side of the House would shrink into their shells at once and follow the Government humbly into the Lobby.

* 5.45.) MR. WINTERBOTHAM (Gloucester, Cirencester): [Cries of "Divide!"] Hon. Members who object to further discussion have apparently come down to the House to spring this Amendment upon it. Until an hour or less ago we had no idea on this side of the House that a Religious Census Bill was contemplated. We came down to discuss a non-contentious—a Census Bill merely. If the Amendment is passed, the feeling of the country, which is that a man's religious belief is a matter purely for his own conscience and not for the State, will be even more intense than the feeling evoked by the Ministerial Liquor Bill. Hon. Members in this House may not in the least object to state their religious views, but many of the people whom they represent cannot afford to do so. There are tens of thousands of domestic servants in this country, and not a few of them are engaged on the conditions that they go to church and communicate, and in the villages of England what amounts in result to religious persecution prevails to a large extent. I mean that for a labourer to declare himself and his family to be Dissenters or Roman Catholics, would mean giving up all share in coal and blanket funds, and getting the cold shoulder in many ways. This Division List will be scanned everywhere throughout the land, for it will tell the people who the men are who wish to revive the old methods and touchstones of religious bigotry and intolerance. If the Amendment is carried, there are many of us who will exhaust every means at our disposal to prevent the Bill from passing.

(5.47.) MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): As Independent Members have been spoken of, I wish to say that it would be very interesting to have these statistics as to religion, if they could be obtained; but the collection of them would cause too much heart-burning, annoyance, and irritation. I shall, therefore, vote for the Bill in its present form.

*(5.47.) MR. H. J. WILSON (York, W.R., Holmfirth): I desire to enter a protest against the proposed alteration of the measure. I had to leave the House shortly after the Debate commenced, and only heard the observations of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board, in reply to some earlier Amendments. In those observations, however, the right hon. Gentleman took his stand on the recommendations of the Select Committee, and did not tell his followers that they could vote as they liked, and I naturally inferred that the Government intended to stand by the Bill. When I returned to the House, however, I found that the right hon. Gentleman had set his followers at liberty in this particular matter. If this Amendment is accepted, it will lead to very great difficulty and inconvenience. The enumerators will find it difficult to carry out their work, especially in cases where they have to instruct the people how to fill up the Returns; and, further, the selection of the enumerators will be a more serious, and perhaps contentious, matter than it need otherwise be. Then I would ask how long or wide is it proposed to make the religion column in the census paper—for there are a good many forms and shades of religious belief in this country, and some people may find it difficult to describe themselves in the ordinary space of a census paper.

(5.49.) MR. ILLINGWORTH (Bradford, W.): It is impossible for anyone to imagine that the object of the proposal is merely to ascertain the religious belief of the people of the country. I contend that the proposal has an ecclesiastical and political object in view. Nobody will be influenced in the slightest degree by figures collected in such a way or be influenced by them in any degree in considering the question of Disestablishment, either in England or Scotland. The feeling of the country on that important question will have to be tested in a very different way—at the polls. I trust the House will not allow any form of religious plébiscite to be taken, and I hope the Government will make it clear to their followers that they do not approve of the Amendment.

*(5.50.) MR. RITCHIE: Both the First Lord of the Treasury and I have declared that the Government think it would be most impolitic to introduce this Amendment into the Bill.

*(6.5.) MR. S. T. EVANS (Glamorgan, Mid): I beg to propose to insert, after "day," in line 14, "and whether any such person speaks Welsh only or both Welsh and English." I understand that the Government are prepared to accept the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in line 14, after the word "day," to insert the words "and whether any such persons speak Welsh only or both Welsh and English."—(Mr. S. T. Evans.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted"

MR. RITCHIE: I have considered the matter since last night, and as I gather it is the universal wish of the Members for Wales that these words should be inserted, I accept the Amendment.

Question put, and agreed to.

*(6.8.) MR. W. A. MACDONALD: I beg to move the insertion, after "lunatic," in line 16, of the words "and if a child, whether he or she, is attending school." I do not wish to press the Amendment strongly; but it does appear to me that if you do not accept this Amendment, you will have no complete classification of the number of children attending school. We can get details as to the number of boys attending the great public schools and you may obtain the number of children attending Board Schools, but there are very many children who attend schools of a different character. Many children attend private adventure schools, where they get a very good education, but there are no means at present of ascertaining the number of these children. I am anxious to know how many children, both boys and girls, attend school, and it appears to me that, unless you adopt this Amendment or some Amendment going in the same direction, you will not obtain what is a most elementary piece of information.

Amendment proposed, in Clause 5, page 16, after the word "lunatic," to insert the words "and if a child, whether he or she, is attending school."—(Mr. W. A. Macdonald.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

(6.10.) MR. RITCHIE: I quite appreciate the motive that prompts the hon. Gentleman in moving this Amendment, and, if I thought that the householder could be fairly asked under all the circumstances to give such information, I should be glad to do what I could to meet his views. But I am sure he will agree with me that it is extremely probable that what he desires will not be obtained, namely, correct information. There are some classes who will, no doubt, imagine that the information may be used against them for the School Board officers, and, however desirable it is that we should do everything we can to induce people to act according to law and to obey the law, it would be unfortunate if any impression were created in the minds of anybody that we desire to put the pressure of the law upon them.

Question put, and negatived.

(6.12.) MR. WOODALL (Hanley): I desire to ask the right hon. Gentleman if, in dealing with the deaf and dumb and the blind, he has given his attention to the recommendation in the Report of the Royal Commission, which Report was presented to the House a few months ago, and in which the importance of a specific and uniform classification was set forth? May we hope that in the method to be adopted for collecting information, there will be statistics distinguishing, for example, between those who are born blind, deaf, or dumb, and those who have subsequently become thus afflicted?

MR. RITCHIE: My attention has been directed to the Report of the Royal Commission and to that portion of it to which the hon. Gentleman has referred. If we were to obtain the information in an elaborate way, it would add considerably to the size of the Schedule. At the same time, I will undertake that the question shall be carefully looked into, and if there can be any alteration made in the Paper with regard to these persons, I shall be glad to consider it.

MR. WOODALL: Will the right hon. Gentleman consider the particular form of the question on the subject? Will he see, for instance, that the different classes of imbeciles are specified?

*(6.14.) MR. RITCHIE: The person filling up the Paper is to make a Return whether the persons in the house is afflicted in any of the modes to which the hon. Gentleman has alluded. If we were to subdivide the class in question the Paper might possibly be unwieldy, but I will consider the point.

MR. WOODALL: I take it the right hon. Gentleman recognises the importance of the question I have put, and that possibly by some supplementary process he may meet the desire I have expressed.

(6.16.) MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I desire to move an Amendment which I have not been able to put on the Paper. This clause provides that every occupier shall fill in the schedule and sign his or her name. I can conceive there may be cases in which the occupier or householder may be unable to read or write, and I have not been able to discover within the limits of the Bill that any provision is made for a case of that kind. I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether provision is made for such a case by instructing the enumerator to fill in the paper for the occupier, and whether, in that case, the occupier is required to affix his or her mark to the paper so as to authenticate it. I think it is desirable my Amendment should be moved for the purpose of eliciting from the right hon. Gentleman the information I desire.

Amendment proposed, in Clause 5, page 2, line 32, to insert—

"If such occupier be unable to read and write, then such schedule shall be filled up by such other person he may appoint to do so, and shall be authenticated by the mark of such occupier."—(Mr. Conybeare.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*MR. RITCHIE: The Amendment of the hon. Gentleman is really not necessary, because in Clause 6 full power is taken by which, if the schedules appear to be defective or erroneous, or the information is not complete, the enumerators may make them complete. Instructions are printed at the back of the paper to the effect that if householders are unable themselves to fill up the paper properly the enumerators are charged with the duty of filling up the Return.

MR. CONYBEARE: Is the enumerator required in that case to make any statement on the paper to the effect that he has filled up the paper on behalf of the occupier?

MR. RITCHIE: I have not had time to look into the matter, but I do not think it is one of importance. If the householder is unable, from any cause whatever, to fill up the paper he has a right to call on the enumerator to fill up the paper.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

(6.24.) MR. SOMERVELL (Ayr, &c.): I beg to move, in page 2, line 22, after "age," to insert "religious profession." I have no intention of reiterating the arguments which have been used in the discussion on a similar Amendment to the English Bill, but I desire to point out that the question of taking a religious census occupies totally different ground in Scotland from what it does in England. The numbers belonging to the various denominations in Scotland is a subject of discussion both inside and outside the House, particularly since the relation of the Established Church to the State has been brought into prominence by the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. Gladstone). If this opportunity of discovering with some degree of accuracy the numbers of the different denominations is lost, there will be no certainty upon the subject when the momentous question of Disestablishment may be submitted to the country, and statistics of a misleading character may influence the House in coming to a decision. The House has received Petitions from the Kirk Sessions of almost every parish in Scotland in favour of inserting a column of this kind. There is a very strong feeling indeed among the majority of the people of Scotland on the subject, and Scottish Members untrammelled by office on this side are unanimous in its support. If the Government accept the Amendment they will be giving effect to a strong popular desire, and will obtain valuable information on a question which is most keenly interesting to the people of Scotland, and which they consider of vital importance to them. I can hardly hope that the Government will on this question be induced to give an absolutely free hand to those who sit behind them, and also to the Members who occupy the Treasury Bench. If, however, the Government can see their way to recognising this claim I would press the matter to a Division, but I have no intention of wasting the time of the House either by prolonging my remarks, or by forcing a Division, if the Government do not see their way to refrain from making this a Government question.

(6.29.) THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): I am sure my hon. Friend has stated his views with great clearness and moderation, but I must say at once that we must assume, on this question, the attitude the Government took upon the English Bill; we are unable to assent to the Amendment. It is superfluous for me to dwell on the reasons; they have been adequately stated by my right hon. Friend, and I think they, in an equal degree, apply to Scotland. I do not deny the value that such statistics would have, but they could only be obtained by a census carried out with the assent of the country, and it is quite obvious, from what has passed here to-night, that that assent is not likely to be obtained. I must say, with reluctance, but quite distinctly, that we cannot accept the Amendment.

*(6.31.) MR. HOZIER (Lanarkshire, S.): I trust that everyone will clearly understand that those who are in favour of disestablishment, and actually claim to have the people of Scotland at their back, are those who are afraid of the results this census might disclose. For our part, we on this side of the House are keenly anxious to have the information, so that we may know exactly where we are.

*(6.31.) MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): I am very unwilling to continue this discussion, for I think the answer of the Lord Advocate ought to be satisfactory to every Scotch Member. I am really surprised that the two hon. Gentlemen who have spoken from the other side of the House should not be satisfied with the statistics their Party have gathered up in regard to the denomination to which they adhere. We have been told that these statistics have been proved and tested by ministers and elders, and are vouched for on the faith of their church and religion, and yet now they come here upon this Bill and say these statistics cannot be relied on and that they must have State Authority for them. ["No, no!"] Well, I think the statement of the Lord Advocate is conclusive that a large number of people will not furnish these religious statistics. This is really a manoeuvre of the Church Defence Association, with a political and ecclesiastical purpose, and I think the Government act wisely in not giving countenance to it.

*(6.34.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I believe an understanding has been arrived at between my right hon. I, therefore, move that you do now report Progress.

SAVINGS BANKS BILL.—(No. 240.) SECOND READING. [ADJOURNED DEBATE.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment to Question [21st July], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

And which Amendment was—

To leave out from the word "That," to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, it is inconvenient to assent to the Second Reading of this Bill before the terms of the First Schedule of the Bill have been filled in."—(Mr. Howell.)

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

(6.35.) DR. CLARK (Caithness): I understand that my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland is anxious to say something on behalf of the Banks whom he thinks have not yet had the opportunity of stating their case. I think myself the case has been fully gone into, and nothing remains that cannot be dealt with in Committee. With the modifications the Chancellor of the Exchequer suggests, I think the Bill ought to go through.

(6.36.) MR. LENG (Dundee): I will only say a few words in support of that view. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has met a very large deputation representing banks in England, Scotland and Ireland, and has made concessions to that deputation which have almost entirely satisfied them. Some remarks were made last night as to the serious condition which it was alleged some of the banks presented, but that seems to me an argument not for delaying but for proceeding with the measure. I do not think it necessary to detain the House, but on the part of the Scotch banks I may say that they are exceedingly well satisfied at the way in which they have been met by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and there is every anticipation that the Amendments he has placed on the Paper will meet with general acceptance.

(6.37.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): I have no intention to continue the Debate, because all that remains to be said may be reserved for the Committee stage. I do not know that it can be shown that the concessions made are altogether satisfactory; so far as I understand they are somewhat a whittling down of the suggestions of the Committee last year, suggestions which, I believe, are of a very moderate character in themselves. From the draft of the proposed Amendments, with which the right hon. Gentleman has been good enough to supply me, some of them seem to destroy the recommendations of the Committee. But the main project is the constitution of the Committee of supervision, and that can be more practically discussed on the 2nd clause.

(6.38.) MR. STOREY (Sunderland): I am just a little anxious to submit a few questions.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member having already spoken, and moved the adjournment of the Debate, has exhausted his right to speak.

MR. STOREY: That, Sir, was on the adjournment of the Debate on the Amendment.

MR. SPEAKER: That Amendment the hon. Member for Bethnal Green asked leave to withdraw.

MR. STOREY: And the House objected to that.

MR. SPEAKER: Yes; and upon that the hon. Member spoke, and moved the adjournment of the Debate.

MR. STOREY: What I understand took place, Sir, is that there was a Division upon the adjournment of the Debate upon the Amendment. The Division decided against the adjournment, and afterwards the hon. Member asked to be permitted to withdraw the Amendment. I am quite clear upon that. After that the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord consented to an adjournment.

MR. SPEAKER: I have the record of the proceedings here. The hon. Member for Bethnal Green moved an Amendment. Upon that the hon. Member moved the adjournment, and consequently, under the Rules of Debate, he has spoken and cannot speak again.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): May I ask, Sir, is the Amendment of the hon. Member for Bethnal Green still before the House?

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Sunderland interposed on the question before the House with a Motion for adjournment. That constitutes a speech.

MR. BUCHANAN: But will you inform us, Sir, what is the question before the House now? Is it the Amendment?

MR. SPEAKER: The original Question was that the Bill be read a second time, to which the hon. Member for Bethnal Green moved an Amendment. The hon. Member will find the position set out in a note at the foot of the Orders of the Day.

Mr. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.): With the permission of the House, I will withdraw my Amendment after the explanation given.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question again proposed.

(6.40.) Mr. STOREY: I will trespass on the time of the House but a few minutes, for I have no disposition by long speeches to retard the progress of the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman will agree that I had some reason to complain last night. The fault is no more that of the Government than my own. I had serious objection to the measure, and the right hon. Gentleman was good enough to promise that before the Second Reading he would put before us the Amendments to which he was willing to agree, so that I might ascertain if my strong objection to the original scheme was assuaged. Owing to misadventure a copy of these Amendments did not come into my hands until after the Division last night, and had not reached me when I made my objection. Since then I have availed myself of the courtesy of the right hon. Gentleman and have examined the Amendments, and I am bound to say that, while the Bill as originally drawn was in my judgment an exceedingly reprehensible and unnecessary Bill, the Amendments to which the right hon. Gentleman has consented have, to a considerable degree, modified the objections which I and many persons connected with Savings Banks have felt. After saying that, I will occupy a few minutes in stating the views of the Savings Banks, and perhaps I shall not be thought at all impertinent in expressing those views when I say that personally I have filled every position in connection with the management of a Savings Bank. I have been auditor, secretary, manager, and, at the present time, I am Trustee of a thriving and very considerable Savings Bank in my own town of Sunderland. For 20 years I have studied the law dealing with these banks, and the method of their operations. I know the position to which they have attained, and the points upon which they have reason to complain. I think the object with which the Bill was originally drawn entirely unnecessary. I think that the statements made regarding Savings Banks have been grossly exaggerated, and in some particulars they have been most unfair and unjust to those most valuable institutions. These institutions existed long before the Post Office Savings Bank, and were started and have been carried on by a number of gentlemen from philanthropic and humanitarian motives, to assist the people in acquiring habits of thrift. I was grieved and astonished to hear the charge made last night that politics entered into the management of these banks. My experience is that they are managed by persons of all religious creeds and political opinions, who work together on broad humanitarian principles. We have Church of England clergymen, Catholic priests, Nonconformist ministers, all acting together on broad humanitarian grounds for the encouragement of thrift. The remark was an unfortunate one. I do not agree with it, or in the fear entertained that the proposed Committee will have a political aspect. While I say this, I say that Savings Banks, established and carried on as I have said, have been hardly treated on both sides of the House by officials, and by private Members. What are the facts? I am credibly informed, on the authority of an hon. Gentleman opposite, that there are 300 or 400 of these Trustee Savings Banks in existence, and in the course of 50, 60, or 70 years, for many of them have been in existence so long, there have been a few instances only in which there have been defalcations, and some slight loss to depositors. I do not think that any business transactions can show a much better record. During their existence these banks must have turned over capital to the amount of £1,000,000,000, and in the course of these transactions there have been very few departures from rectitude in the management and losses to depositors. Is there any public department or private business of which more can be said than of the Trustee Savings Banks as a whole? I appreciate the public spirit and honesty of purpose actuating my hon. Friend (Mr. Howell), but I think he is not altogether zealous with knowledge. He made some notable admissions. He said the law at present, if properly administered, is amply sufficient for securing proper government of the banks. But what more can be said of any law? It is admitted that the managers or Trustees have not been the people who have made a profit out of the small amount of defalcations which have taken place, and if this is all the indictment that can be brought against them, it will not be possible for any change in the law to guard absolutely against dishonesty on the part of paid officials. By no system of public audit can you absolutely guard against that. In my judgment, and in that of many connected with Trustee Savings Banks, no such legislation as is now proposed is necessary at all. But the Government having determined to take up this legislation the managers of these banks, taking a common-sense view, said, "We will get the Bill amended as far as we can, and make the best of a bad business," but let me say in regard to opinions expressed by managers of banks in favour of the Bill, that though they have expressed satisfaction at the changes made in the original Bill, there are a considerable number of them who think there was no necessity to have moved in the matter at all. Looking at the Bill, as amended, I may venture to point out that there are even yet some changes that ought to be made in Committee. I do not know whether hon. Members have noticed what the first clause originally was. Of course, as it has been revised, I will not discuss it, but I may mention that it absolutely provided that Savings Banks should stamp on the face of every pass-book the fact that the Government are not responsible for the security of the funds of the Savings Bank. A more unjust, a more unfair slur to 'cast upon a great institution, or a set of great institutions, which have done untold good, I cannot conceive. The Chancellor of the Exchequer smiles when I speak of a slur being thus cast, but what would he say, if in any business with which he happened to be connected, an Act should specially provide that every invoice should bear the statement that the Government had no responsibility for money concerned? Why, it would not be true. Savings Banks have between £40,000,000 and £50,000,000 capital, and every penny of the money, except about £2,000,000, is invested with the Government, so that for 38-40ths the Government must be responsible.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): The point is not whether the Government are responsible for the funds invested, but whether the Government are responsible to the depositors. It was to prevent depositors having the belief that the Government are responsible for disasters that may occur. There was no desire to cast any slur upon Trustee Savings Banks, but simply a desire to state the fact that the Government are not responsible for deposits.

MR. STOREY: Well, I need not discuss it, for the right hon. Gentleman has accepted an Amendment at the hands of the managers of the banks that the statement on the pass books shall be that the Government are only responsible for the funds invested with the National Debt Commissioners. It is a concession for which we are not ungrateful. If in Committee he will accept a further and consequential Amendment, setting forth that the books shall also bear on the face of each the amount of money the bank has so invested, that will be an additional advantage to the banks. I will not trouble the House with the observations I intended to make on other clauses, because I admit they are points of detail I can raise in Committee, but there is one point to which I invite serious attention. I ask the attention of every hon. Member connected with Savings Banks to the proposed omission from the Bill of Clause 11. As the House is aware, at the present time a depositor is only allowed to have £150 altogether in a Savings Bank, which may accumulate by the addition of interest to £200. Clause 11 proposes that in future a depositor may have £200 in the bank, and may draw out the interest every year. The Chancellor of the Exchequer now proposes to withdraw that clause. I listened to the observations of the right hon. Gentleman not only with regret but with positive anger at the way he and his predecessors have treated Trustee Savings Banks in this matter. It must be remembered that the old limit was adopted at a time when £150 was a very large sum for a working man. As working men have grown in means, and in the present prosperous state of the country, £150 by no means represents the same proportion to wages as it did in old days; it is easier now to save £300 than 50 years ago it was to save £150. It was recognising this fact that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian—I wish he were present now, for he and his Government deserve blame, though perhaps those right hon. Members who were Members of his Government, and are now on the Front Bench, will take the blame on their shoulders—the Government of the right hon. Gentleman brought in a Bill in 1880, and the present Chancellor of the Exchequer shares the responsibility, for he was a Member of that Government.

MR. GOSCHEN: No, not in 1880.

MR. STOREY: I thought the departure of the right hon. Gentleman from among us was of more recent date, but I find I am wrong. The Government of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian brought in the Savings Banks Bill, and that was a double-barrelled Bill; it contained clauses reducing the interest payable by the Government to Trustee Savings Bank, and for increasing the amount that workmen could deposit. What was the fate of that Bill? The right hon. Gentleman came down to the House one day and told us that he proposed to ask the House to pass the first part of the Bill, but in deference to opposition in certain quarters, he would not press the second part; but he gave a distinct promise that it should be brought on in the next year. The House accepted his proposal, as the House was in the habit of doing in those days. We were anxious to have the limit of deposits increased, though we did not wish to have the rate of interest diminished. But next year came, and the Bill was never re-introduced, or, if it was, it was not passed. I am told it was never re-introduced. So the engagement made with the Savings Banks has never been kept to this day. It was a fair engagement, taking account of the new state of things arising out of the different character of the time. It recognised that working men could well afford to save more money, and that there ought to be no absurd limitations placed by Parliament on their willingness to save. I did hope that when the right hon. Gentleman brought in this Bill he would have carried out the engagement entered into by the Liberal Government, and have increased this limit. But what has the Chancellor of the Exchequer now done? Why, he has withdrawn Clause 11, out of deference to opposition from certain quarters. No doubt the House well understands what are those quarters. The House well knows that it is the Joint Stock and other Deposit Banks which forced the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian to give up his proposal, which was similar to this, and it is the same opposition which is preventing the Chancellor of the Exchequer from pressing this matter at the present time. Workmen now have become more prosperous, they have more means and better wages, and are able to save larger sums than formerly, and, therefore, it is a just thing that the amount they can deposit should be enlarged. I submit that it is to the public interest that these limits should be increased. The proposal made was, in all conscience, moderate enough; to my mind, it was entirely inadequate, and I think the limit should have been at least £300. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will realise that his chance of carrying this Bill through is by no means enhanced by his withdrawal of this clause. I trust that the Government are in such a frame of mind that they will willingly concede anything in order to secure the passing of the Bill, and I, therefore, give notice to the Chancellor of the Exchequer that I shall put down Amendments which, if adequately supported, will enable the right hon. Gentleman to disregard the opposition, the interested as against the public opposition, of these Joint Stock and Deposit Banks, and which also will enable him to fix the limit at £200.

(7.7.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: It was my intention to postpone the remarks I had to make on this question, but I hope I may be permitted to say a few words. Having been a Member of the Committee to which the Bill was referred, and recognising that it is founded mainly on the recommendations of the Committee, it is my intention to give the Government whatever assistance I can in the passing of the Bill. My hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland commenced his observations by saying that the Bill was unnecessary, and that the evil it was intended to cure was greatly exaggerated. I must protest against that statement. The Committee which sat on this subject last year, and which gave the greatest possible attention to the subject, unanimously agreed that considerable changes in the law were necessary. I may, at this point, thank the hon. Member for Bethnal Green for having raised this question, for I think the Resolution of the Committee abundantly justified the action he took, and although, perhaps, the Bill does not go so far as he desired, yet I think a public service has been done in calling attention to the matter. The Committee, I may say, felt that they would not be justified in going into minute inquiries in the cases of individual banks, because they might periodically affect the interests of really sound banks. I agree that, as the Report sets out, if the provisions of the law are really carried out by Trustees, managers, and officers, there is ample security for depositors, but there is reason to think that there are cases, though I believe not many, in which the law is not observed, and that is really the danger of the position. In some cases the Trustees or managers have negligently allowed the officers to make entries or receive money without that supervision over them which the Act contemplates. What is, therefore, necessary is that there should be something in the nature of an audit, or independent inspection. In saying that I do not wish to throw discredit on the Savings Banks generally. I know that the large majority of them in the great towns, such as those at Liverpool, Manchester, Bradford, and Glasgow, are conducted with a degree of security and care which could not be excelled, but there are a number of smaller banks where the Trustees do not pay attention to the every-day business which is desirable. Now, the recommendation of the Committee is that there should be some audit, so as to secure that the provisions of the law are adequately carried out. The real crux of the thing is this—that if the audit is to be a Government audit then there cannot be a doubt the Government will become responsible. If the audit is to be a Government audit it would be better that the business of the banks should be handed over entirely to the Government. But all the Members of the Committee deprecated this, and I presume this is in accordance with the view of the Government themselves. The point, then, is how to arrange the audit independent of the Government, and yet for the Government to participate in it. The suggestion of the Committee is that the Board of Inspection or Audit should be of a thoroughly representative character, composed of members representing the Trustees, the depositors, and the Government, and I understand the Government have adopted this view. On the whole, I concur with the general lines of the Bill, which is framed on the recommendations of the Committee, and, so far as I am concerned, I regret that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has given way as much as he has done to the Trustees of the Savings Banks. I believe the Bill has thus been weakened, and the right hon. Gentleman must not be surprised if efforts are made in Committee to induce him to strengthen the Bill on those very points.

*(7.20.) MR. TOMLINSON (Preston): As representing the views of some of the assenting parties to the concessions proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer at the meeting in the Conference Room, I desire to say that they only wish to have those concessions, as they understand them, embodied in the Bill. So far as I gathered the effect of the proposed modifications, as explained by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, they appeared to me to effect the objects of the proposals made in the Conference Room, except with reference to Clause 1, as to which I did not distinctly catch the words of the proposed Amendment. It appears to me that the best course that can now be taken will be to have the Bill read a second time, and then committed pro forma, in order to introduce the proposed Amendments, the re-committal being postponed, so as to allow of the Amendments being considered by those connected with the Trustee Banks. With regard to the last remarks of the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, I wish to say that those who are interested in Trustee Banks expect to have the whole of the Amendments embodied in the Bill, and will be satisfied with nothing less.

(7.22.) SIR A. ROLLIT (Islington, S.): I confess that at first the Bill prepared by the Government was not very acceptable to Savings Banks, but, taking a somewhat different view to that expressed by the right hon. Gentleman opposite, I am bound, on behalf of the great majority of Savings Banks, to thank the Chancellor of the Exchequer for receiving the deputation which a short time since I had the honour to introduce to him, and for framing the Bill in a way which, I believe, is acceptable to them: I have just received a message expressing the hope that no obstacle will be placed in the way of the Bill, which protects alike the public and the banks.

MR. STOREY: That is from Hull?

SIR A. ROLLIT: Yes, they believe it to be an advantageous measure. I think that the attention of the House could hardly be directed to a more important subject, for no institution does more to teach thrift to the people, and to demonstrate its advantages to them, than Savings Banks. There is one feature in the Bill which I particularly approve, and that is that in future the position of the Trustees will be one of substantial reality, that they must attend a meeting, at least once a year, that they will be expected to also attend six meetings of the Committee of Management, that the nature of the connection of the Government with these institutions will be clearly set forth, and that the Committee of Audit or Inspection will be of a thoroughly representative character, representative of the views, experience, and interests of the banks on the one hand, and of the Government on the other. I welcome any precaution which will give additional security to these banks, and thus increase the confidence of the people in them. I cordially agree with the view of the hon. Member for Sunderland that the limitation of amount of deposit should be extended in the Savings Banks, for there ought to be free trade in facilities for saving rather than a regard for vested interests. Speaking for the Savings Banks generally, I welcome the Bill, and hope it will receive the unanimous assent of the House.

(7.28.) MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I wish—

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Member has already spoken.

MR. GOSCHEN: I should like—

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The right hon. Gentleman is in the same position, and cannot speak without the leave of the House.

(7.29.) MR. GOSCHEN: Yes, I am in the same position, but, with the leave of the House, I should like to say a few words in answer to the points which have been raised. In reply to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford, I may say the Government certainly do not contemplate wholly appointing the Committee or Board of Inspection; for their view is that it should be largely representative. With regard to Clause 11, it was dropped in order to get rid of the more contentious part of the Bill, and thus enable it to be passed into law this Session. If we are pressed on all sides, and in different directions, the fear would be that the Bill might be lost. The Bill, as a whole, is considered a valuable measure, and I do trust hon. Gentlemen will do their best in the spirit of compromise to assist the Government to pass a measure which only the hon. Member for Sunderland, I think, considers ought not to be passed. In reply to my hon. Friend behind me, I do not think it would be advisable at this period of the Session to refer the Bill to a Select Committee.

MR. STOREY: Will the right hon. Gentleman tell me whether the Savings Banks agreed to the withdrawal of the clause?

MR. GOSCHEN: No, Sir. I discussed with them the points to which they attached most importance. There was no argument with regard to this clause. It was a very small clause, and some compromise was made. Of course, I shall be prepared to deal with the point when it is reached.

(7.32.) MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I think hon. Members are really forgetting the exact circumstances. At present from £150 to £200 can be deposited in the Post Office Savings Bank or a Trustee Savings Bank. In the case of an ordinary family of five, that would enable one family to deposit £1,000. At that rate, if every one invested, we should have something like £70,000,000,000 invested. Therefore, instead of increasing the maximum, what we should endeavour to do is to induce people to invest in Consols, which are equally secure, and have the advantage, or disadvantage, of rising and falling according to the prosperity of the country, and do not bear a fixed rate of interest guaranteed by a section of the community. While we ought not to raise the maximum, I do not think it ought to go forth to the world, seeing that a family can invest £1,000, that we wish to limit the savings of any individual family.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed; considered in Committee, and reported.

Bill re-committed for Monday next, and to be printed. [Bill 396.]

PUBLIC WORKS (LOANS) BILL.—(No. 39.)

*MR. DUFF (Banffshire): I do not quite understand the limitations of this Bill. I observe that a sum not exceeding only £10,000 is to be lent to the Scotch Fishery Board. Last year they had £20,000. Will this limitation prevent other applications from Scotland being entertained by the Public Works Loan Commissioners?

(7.36.) MR. GOSCHEN: My hon. Friend will understand that the sums named in the Bill are quoted by Acts of Parliament. Under those Acts of Parliament we are bound to say what is necessary for each of these purposes. I am bound to say that in the case of the Fishery Board the result of the loans which have been made is that the sums reclaimed in some cases have been so small that we have not thought it right to issue the £80,000, and the amount has been reduced to £10,000. It would be misleading the House if we issued as loans what really turned out to be subsidies.

(7.38.) MR. SEXTON: This Bill proposes to nominate and appoint persons for five years. It proposes to confer upon them very important functions, and to administer the loans made from the Public Revenues for local works in various parts of the Kingdom. I have looked with curiosity through the list to see what districts are represented.

*MR. JACKSON: It does not extend to Ireland.

MR. SEXTON: Are there no loans to Ireland? I see by the 4th clause that a loan in Ireland is named.

*(7.40.) MR. JACKSON: I might explain to the hon. Member that the Public Works Loan Commissioners no longer make loans to Ireland. That is done by the Board of Works in Dublin, who grant the whole of the loans on public works in Ireland. The House will, therefore, see that the names of the Commissioners apply to England and Scotland and Wales. Section 4 is necessary for this reason. It refers to an old debt for money lent for the repair of Killeany Pier, which amount was written off in former years from the Local Loan Account, but that writing off did not exonerate the locality from payment. But representations were recently made that this debt still stood against the Local Authorities, and it is withdrawn as against them. It is necessary to do that by a clause in this Bill. That has been written off so far as the Local Loan Account is concerned; but it still stands as a liability against the locality.

(7.43.) MR. SEXTON: I am much obliged for the explanation as regards that point. Although the disbursement of loans with regard to Ireland is conducted by the Board in Dublin, I would point out that this is an Imperial Department connected with the Imperial Revenues, and it is not expedient that this important Imperial Department should be constituted without any representation whatever of Irish interests. This Commission is constituted as if the United Kingdom were composed of England, Scotland, and Wales, and that Ireland had no place in it. I find there are four Peers, who are not connected with Ireland, and nine other English and Scotch gentlemen. I should like the Chancellor of the Exchequer to explain why a Department constituted for the administration of Imperial Revenues should be established without any reference to Ireland. I believe Ireland has as much interest in the outgoings from the Imperial Revenue as she has, in one sense, in a disbursement made for her benefit. It is not a proper thing that an Imperial Department should be constituted with reference to England and Scotland, as if Ireland was not included in the United Kingdom. I do not know upon what qualifications these gentlemen have been selected, but I would suggest that two Representatives of Ireland might very properly be appointed. I respectfully submit that course to the Government.

(7.44.) MR. GOSCHEN: The point which the hon. Member has raised comes upon us by surprise. The hon. Member will be aware that the gentlemen appointed are not salaried officials. It is an honorary office. If, in future cases, Ireland desires representation from the point of view put by the hon. Member, I can only say that we are glad that hon. Members opposite do not wish to dissociate themselves from matters of Imperial concern.

MR. SEXTON: I had intended to divide on the Second Reading. I will not take that course, but I give notice that unless the Government themselves nominate two persons representative of Ireland, the Irish Members themselves will bring forward an Amendment.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday.

SUPPLY—ARMY ESTIMATES.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £258,400, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for the Salaries and Miscellaneous Charges of the War Office, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1891."

*(7.45.) MR. MONTAGU (Tower Hamlets, Whitechapel): I feel it my duty to move the reduction of this Vote by the sum of £500, part of the salary of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War. My object in doing so is to call attention to a question which I raised last year, namely, the re-admission of the public to the Tower Wharf. I feel quite certain that the people of the East of London will not rest contented until the privilege of using that wharf is restored to them. I do not now intend to make a second speech on this subject, but will content myself with a mere recapitulation of the bare facts. It is not denied by the Government that the public up to the time of the Crimean War had full access to this open space, which was the most enjoyable promenade in the neighbourhood of Whitechapel. I have letters from some of the oldest inhabitants in the district on the subject, and I suppose the Committee are aware that at the time to which those letters refer the river was not in so good a condition as it is at present, and also that the population of Whitechapel, and, indeed, the East of London generally, was very much smaller than it is now. Moreover, at that period there were a good many wealthy residents in the district, whereas at the present day the population consists almost entirely of the working and labouring class. I think—and I have no doubt the Committee will agree—that some consideration is due to that class, and that we ought to afford them, during their dinner hour, and at other times when they are not at work, as many opportunities as we can to enjoy the fresh air of the riverside. The opening of this wharf to the public would be a boon not only to the inhabitants of Whitechapel, but to those of Limehouse and St. George's-in-the-East. I am sorry the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board is not in his place, because he, as the Representative of the Tower Hamlets, is fully aware how few open spaces there are for the use of the people of the East End, and of the necessity which exists for increasing, as far as possible, the opportunities of open air recreation for the benefit of the people. I would remind the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War that last year the explanations he offered on this subject were not considered satisfactory, and a Division was taken, and that course will be adopted on the present occasion unless the right hon. Gentleman consents either to restore the privilege of access to the Tower Wharf, or to afford some clear and satisfactory explanation of the reasons why that wharf is not to be devoted to the use of the public, as in former times.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Item A, Salaries of the War Office, be reduced by £500."—(Mr. Montagu.)

(7.49.) COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): Of course the Committee is aware that a Motion for the reduction of the salary of the Secretary for War is merely put forward as a medium for discussing a particular grievance, and that it is not at all aimed at the right hon. Gentleman; indeed, if it and the other Motions for the reduction of his salary were to be agreed to the right hon. Gentleman might find that he would be without salary altogether. Of course the public will understand that Motions like this for the reduction of the Secretary's salary are a mere Parliamentary fiction, enabling us to raise certain questions upon which we think discussion is desirable. I may say that I have always taken an interest on matters relating to the Tower. I served on the Committee appointed to consider the question of the Wharf Bridge, and only a week ago I went to look at the place to see what objections could be offered by the Secretary for War to this proposal. The right hon. Gentleman stated, on a former occasion, that the opening of the wharf would create difficulty in relation to the landing of stores. I think that that objection is really an insignificant one. There are only about 200,000 rifles stored in the Tower, and I believe that only about five barges a year are unloaded at the Tower Wharf, which affords a large open space between 200 and 300 yards in length. I do not think it would be found that the admission of the public to the wharf would interfere in any way with the unloading of the few barges that go there. I believe that this argument about the unloading of stores is a fiction, and that there must be some other reason behind. If the argument be that the closing of the wharf is necessary for the defence of the Tower, I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it is so regarded by the Constable of the Tower and the other high Military Authorities. There is a ditch between that wharf and the outside buildings connected with the Tower, and it would be perfectly impossible to attempt to take the Tower from that position. Indeed, if such a thing were attempted, the wharf would be about the worst spot from which any assault could be made. This being so, I can only attribute the objection to opening the wharf to the fact that there are certain officials who, for their own particular objects, desire to exclude the public. I do not suppose the hon. Member for Whitechapel desires us to pass an Act of Parliament to hand the Tower Wharf over to his constituents. I have no doubt he would be content to see it put on the same footing as the barrack field at Woolwich, where the Commandant can always close that field to the public at any time he may think proper. Indeed, they never hesitate to turn the people out when they want the field for cricket, lawn tennis, or any other purpose, in which no doubt they are quite right, but as it is the public get as much use of the place as they require. So in the case of the Tower Wharf, if barges are coming there to unload it would be very easy to exercise the power of excluding the public, and, of course, in time of war, when the Tower might be used as a real depository of military stores, the Government would be justified in keeping that wharf entirely to themselves. As it is, however, there is no such necessity, and the public are unnecessarily excluded.

*(7.58.) THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): I have, since the discussion of last year, again very carefully considered this question of throwing open the Tower Wharf, and I can assure the Committee that I have approached the matter with a desire, as far as possible, to promote the interests of the seething population in the neighbourhood of the Tower. Indeed, the present Government have already demonstrated their desires in this direction by throwing open the gardens on the other side of the Tower, a privilege which has been used without detriment to the Government, and, doubtless, with great advantage to the public. But I am bound to say that the opening of the Tower Wharf is very strongly objected to by the Military Authorities, who have considered the question as well as myself, and have come to the conclusion that it would not be consistent with their duty to throw this wharf open to the public. The hon. and gallant Member opposite has drawn a parallel between this wharf and the barrack field at Woolwich, and, no doubt, the parallel was a very ingenious one, but I am compelled to oppose it on very different grounds from those urged by the hon. and gallant Member. The Tower is, as the hon. and gallant Member said, largely used as a storehouse, and there would be great inconvenience, not to say danger, if the Military Authorities were deprived of the fullest and most unrestricted use of the wharf whilst stores are being dealt with. Having made a personal examination of the place, and given the matter the very best consideration I can, I have come to the conclusion that the request made cannot be acceded to.

(8.1.) MR. MONTAGU: The right hon. Gentleman has not specified the danger that would arise from the admission of the public, and there is a very large space available for a promenade. I would urge upon the right hon. Gentleman that the very narrow walk in the Tower gardens is quite insufficient to meet the needs of the population, and would remind him that the terrace at Windsor is thrown open by Her Gracious Majesty to the public on Sundays, and I would ask the right hon. Gentleman to consider whether, in this case, an experimental exception cannot be made on Saturdays and Sundays, when, surely, the admission of the public would not interfere with the landing or embarking of stores?

MR. E. STANHOPE: I shall be very glad to consider that point, but I cannot give an answer until I have done so.

(8.2.) CAPTAIN VERNEY (Bucks, N.): We shall be very glad if the right hon. Gentleman is able to tell the Military Authorities what pressure has been put upon him in the House. It may very well be that it is of less importance to use the Tower as a storehouse than to give free access to the riverside to the seething population of the district. A storehouse can easily be found at some spot on the river bank, where it will not interfere so seriously with the enjoyment of the people. The right hon. Gentleman evidently feels himself, as much as we do, the importance of this question, and I believe he will welcome a little pressure being put upon him by the public.

MR. MONTAGU: I will withdraw the Motion.

(8.4.) DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): The right hon. Gentleman said there would be danger to the public in opening this walk. Are we to understand that combustibles are stored in the Tower? We know that empty rifles are not objects of danger to the public.

Mr. E. Stanhope

If the Tower is used as a storehouse for explosives, I maintain that there will be very serious danger to the seething population on that side of the City. I would appeal to the right hon. Gentleman to look at the question in a common sense way, and with the object of benefiting the people of the district. It is ridiculous for the Military Authorities to say there is danger in opening the river side walk, when the moat and gardens are open to the public. I insist upon a reply to my question, whether combustibles are stored in the Tower?

(8.7.) MR. E. STANHOPE: I am certainly not prepared to say what is in the Tower.

DR. TANNER: What I want to know is, are combustibles stored in the Tower of London?

MR. E. STANHOPE: What we have in the Tower depends entirely on the requirements of the Service.

DR. TANNER: Of course, the public will be able to form their own judgment from the character of the right hon. Gentleman's reply, and I hope the public will take very good care that no such things as lighted pipes are to be seen in the Tower Gardens in future. I have put the question entirely on the ground of public safety, and I sincerely hope the public will take notice of the equivocating reply of the right hon. Gentleman.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

(8.9.) MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I wish to bring before the Committee a question affecting the Secretary for War and also the Under Secretary for India. It relates to the charge for military stores made by the War Office upon the Government of India. It appears that a dispute has been going on, I am sorry to say altogether for nearly 20 years. During the past year an attempt has been made to submit it to arbitration, but the Secretary of State for India has refused to let it be so submitted. The allegation made on the part of the Government of India, as far as we can judge from the accounts submitted to this House, is that charges of an exorbitant nature have been made against the Government of India for stores. The Government of India, as I understand it, have never assented to that price, and have paid on account of it, as I understand, only something like 90 per cent., leaving the 10 per cent. in suspense. It surely is most unbusiness-like, even if it be true—and I believe it is not the case that the 90 per cent. represents the real cost—that year after year there should be a discrepancy in the accounts.

*MR. E. STANHOPE: Mr. Courtney, I do not know whether I am right in asking you whether this discussion in regard to the issue of warlike stores should not have taken place on Vote 6, which deals with warlike stores?

*MR. BRADLAUGH: On the point of order, Sir, I wish to submit that I am attacking the Secretary for War for having refused to submit the claim to arbitration. It is on that ground that I am basing my statement to the Committee, the facts I am using being merely illustrations used to enable the Committee to understand my complaint. I shall be quite content if the Secretary for War will now say that during the coming year some steps shall be taken to put an end to an undignified dispute between two great Departments of the State, and in which it is alleged that overcharges are made against the Government of India. I was about to appeal to the Under Secretary for India (Sir J. Gorst) on behalf of the starving population of whom he was speaking the other night, to state the facts and the steps taken to try and induce the Secretary for War to submit the question to arbitration.

THE CHAIRMAN: It seems to be a question of policy as to the mode of settling the dispute. If that be so, it is debatable upon this Vote.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: It is a rather long story, and I have no wish to take up the time of the Committee if the Secretary for War will state that the matter shall be dealt with by arbitration during the next six months or something of that kind. There is a real bond fide case. The auditor of the India Office has reported directly against the War Office, and I shall have to appeal to the Under Secretary for India to place before the Committee the written opinion of the auditor on the subject. If the Secretary for War will not say that the matter shall be submitted to arbitration it will be my duty to submit the whole case to the Committee, and, if necessary, to move a reduction of the Vote. It is really a rather gross matter, and will entail the production of a large amount of detail.

*(8.13.) MR. E. STANHOPE: The hon. Member may or may not be aware that there are a number of outstanding questions between the War Office and the India Office. Some questions of the kind were settled by a tribunal over which Lord Northbrook presided, and which is practically a standing Committee, meeting from time to time. Other questions are settled by the Government as a whole. The Cabinet has perfect competence to decide such questions, and it does decide them as they arise. I cannot give the hon. Member any other answer than that.

*(8.15.) MR. BRADLAUGH: That is not sufficient, because it appears that the Under Secretary for India asked the Secretary for War to submit the question to arbitration, and that request was declined by the War Office. I appeal to the leader of the House (Mr. W. H. Smith) to say whether he intends at this period of the Session to force on a Debate which must be lengthy, in which I admit my information must necessarily be incomplete, and in which I must ask the Secretary for War to give me further information. What reason can there be for not submitting this to some tribunal? I do not want to waste the time of the Committee in the matter. We find the Under Secretary for India saying "Lord Cross is unable to withdraw the claim." What is the claim? It is one, rightly or wrongly made, that the War Office have been overcharging the Government of India? I do not wish to ask the Committee to express any opinion on that, but I shall ask them to do so if I do not get an assurance that this matter will be made the subject of an investigation. I ask for an assurance that there will be some kind of arbitration, so that there may be no need for me to ask the Committee for an opinion.

*(8.17.) MR. E. STANHOPE: I am anxious at this period of the Session to avoid any unnecessary discussion, but I cannot pass by the observations of the hon. Member. It is utterly impossible for me to admit that anything unjust has taken place.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: I do not ask the right hon. Gentleman to admit that.

*MR. E. STANHOPE: If anything we have been too indulgent. All this has arisen because last year the Indian Government were treated very leniently, and were not charged the full value for the stores. As, however, there appears to be a difference between the two Departments, the Government will undertake that it shall be looked into and settled.

*(8.18.) MR. BRADLAUGH: And in the event of the two Departments not coming to an agreement will there be some arbitrament between them?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: No; the Government must settle their own affairs.

*(8.18.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): The Government, of course, are responsible for settling all differences that may arise between two Departments of the Government. I will undertake, on behalf of my right hon. Friend and the Government, that a fair settlement of this case shall be arrived at between the two Departments. There shall be an inquiry and a settlement.

*(8.18.) MR. BRADLAUGH: I will be satisfied with that, merely adding that if, unfortunately, no settlement should be arrived at, or no settlement should be in course of being arrived at by some investigation, I will take the earliest opportunity that next Session affords of bringing the subject before the House.

(8.19.) MR. HANBURY (Preston): Before we pass to sub-head "b" I should like to say a word or two as to the Civil Central Department and the Central Military Department. I desire, in reference to the question raised the other night in reference to Lord Hartington's Commission, to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the statement he then made with regard to his intentions expressed his whole view of the steps that should be taken in order to carry out the recommendations of that Commission, because if that is so neither of the two most important objects embodied in those recommendations will be attained. Those two objects were—first, to fix responsibility upon some political person for the administration of the Army, and the other was that an expert officer should be made responsible for the strength of the Army. Under the present system, neither the Secretary for War nor the Commander-in-Chief is really responsible for anything, and it is impossible to punish anybody when anything goes wrong. It is impossible, if things go wrong, to prevent them coming to Parliament, and saying, "Our duties are so immense that, although we assume responsibility for everything, we are only fallible men, and we have more duties thrown upon us than we can attend to ourselves; there is no proper sub-division of duty in the War Office, and though we are nominally responsible our responsibility is a farce." In addition to all this responsibility thrown on these two great offices you have this further fact, that it is impossible to bring home responsibility to the Secretary of State for War. Take, for instance, the failures we have had in our Army lately in regard to our great guns, our swords, our bayonets. Under this system it is impossible to punish anybody. If we attack anyone very low down in the Department, the Secretary for War very chivalrously comes forward and says, "I will bear all the responsibility." That sounds very fine, no doubt, but it means nothing at all, because his responsibility is only a Party one, and if anything goes wrong the Party say, "That may be wrong, but we have to keep the Unionist Party in power—or some other Party in power—and we must back them up." It is the same in the case of the Commander-in-Chief. As long as we have a Royal Duke for a Commander-in-Chief, and a Secretary for War who is backed up by Parliament, that state of things must necessarily continue, and it will be impossible to drive home responsibility. The Commander-in-Chief, as an expert, ought to be responsible for maintaining the strength of the Army at a proper point. But in neither the Army nor the Navy is this principle adopted. I was astounded, on the Committee on the Navy Estimates, at the answer I received from Sir Arthur Hood to a question I put to him as First Sea Lord of the Admiralty. I asked—

"Before these Estimates were framed, did you even take into your calculations what were the requirements of this country, and what the strength of the Fleet ought to be, because if you did not do that as Executive Officer, these Estimates are all illusory, and we do not know whether we have voted too much or too little."

He replied—

"I did not do that, and within my knowledge it has never been done."

That is the way we vote this money. In the case of the Duke of Cambridge, in July or August last year His Royal Highness went about the country complaining that we ought to have 9,000 or 10,000 more men to render our Army efficient. Did the noble Duke impress that on the Secretary for War before the Estimates were framed? He did not, and I say, therefore, that such a thing is ridiculous. We ought to have an expert to whom we can look for advice on such a matter as this—a man who, having vast knowledge on the subject, can form a reliable opinion as to what the forces of the country ought to be. We ought not to allow the Military and Naval strength of this country to depend upon mere Party emergency. I hold that the most important recommendation of the Royal Commission has not been dealt with at all. Then, again, the complaint has been made that the Commander-in-Chief, having no definite duties assigned to him, has a roving commission to go about and meddle and muddle everything; not that I wish it to be understood for a moment that the Duke of Cambridge does that, but I say that that is the result of our system of dual control without fixed responsibility. There is no definition of responsibility. There is no reason, if we keep a Commander-in-Chief, why definite duties should not be assigned to him. There is no other Army in the world, so far as I know, where a man who should lead the Army in time of war has a sort of roving commission to deal with all Departments of the War Office. It seems to me that to have Committees and Commissions and Councils to assist the Secretary for War, instead of having a well-defined sub-division of duties, is a step in the wrong direction, because my experience is that Commissions and Committees and Boards are simply things to screen responsibility. The object of any attack I make on this Department is to secure that there shall be one man to whom you shall look for responsibility if anything is wrong, and I hold that the more you depend on Boards and the like the more responsibility is hidden from the public eye, and the more difficult is it to trace it. With reference to the Committee of the Cabinet, I desire to know whether the decisions will be recorded?

THE CHAIRMAN: Order! I do not see how that question comes up under the sub-head we are now considering. As the sub-head contains the salaries of the Secretary of State and the Commander-in-Chief, the examination of their functions is quite permissible; but to enter into the question as to what is to be done by the Committee of the Cabinet appears to be out of order.

MR. HANBURY: I am anxious to know whether the statement the right hon. Gentleman made with regard to the Committee of the Cabinet applies also to the other Committees and Boards, because our great difficulty in regard to all these Departments and Committees is that we can never get at the facts of the case. Will the records of these Commissions and Councils be accessible to the public, and not only to persons within the War Office and the successors of my right hon. Friend? I now pass to the Board of Promotion, and I want to know whether the right hon. Gentleman is going to afford the officers an opportunity of testing their qualifications for promotion? At the present moment it is very difficult for anybody to find out who is the officer best fitted for promotion. In the German Army there is every opportunity of knowing who is fitted for promotion, especially in the higher ranks. There there is a school, so to speak, in which the future Generals are trained. The German Generals can be tested by being put in command of Army Corps. We have nothing of the sort here. We have not got an Army Corps to which—

THE CHAIRMAN: I fail to see how this comes under the sub-head at all.

MR. HANBURY: I take it that the Board of Promotion will be composed of officers connected with the War Office, and my argument is that this Board will carry us very little further than the present system. Under the present system there is no opportunity afforded to officers of distinguishing themselves, or of showing their qualification for promotion. I do not think it would be possible for my right hon. Friend to go as far as they go in the German Army; but I do think he might throw a little more responsibility upon colonels of regiments and regimental officers, so that we may see how far they are qualified for promotion. I now wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman one or two questions with regard to the difficulties which have arisen within the last two or three weeks in regard to the Guards. I do not desire to say anything which will in any way interfere with the Secretary of State's control. In the first place, I have to ask, in regard to the Guards generally, whether he is going to lay down the rule that in future all the officers shall live in barracks, because what has taken place shows pretty clearly that the privilege the officers of the Guards have hitherto enjoyed ought to be done away with once for all. [Colonel NOLAN: Unmarried officers.] I do not know what is the origin of the outbreak; but I think there is a very strong public opinion that the officers of the Guards have not been in touch with their men as officers ought to be, and as I believe the officers of other regiments generally are. One can judge of this by small things. Coming down to this House I have noticed officers of the Guards going to the Wellington Barracks. I have seen them saluted by men, and yet take no notice of the salute. It makes me indignant to see that. It is not the conduct of officers or gentlemen; and we may depend upon it that things of this sort—

THE CHAIRMAN: Again I do not see the relevancy of the hon. Member's remarks. These are matters which ought to be entered into on the Vote for men and pay.

MR. HANBURY: Do I understand I am not entitled to ask the Secretary of State for War on this Vote the two following questions: Whether there were really any justifiable complaints on this matter—of course, whether they were justifiable or not the punishment of the men was richly deserved, because they took the wrong course to obtain redress—whether there were any justifiable complaints, such as complaints about barracks damages, food and sentry work; and, if so, whether the Secretary of State for War, or some other responsible person, is going to put an end to such a state of things, and whether the Secretary of State has provided, or the Regulations of the Army provide, any proper means by which privates, who are complaining of injustice done by their Commanding Officer or anybody else, can report their complaints to the Inspecting Officer when he comes round? It strikes me as a curious fact that, although this regiment was inspected only a few days ago, no complaints were made to the Inspecting Officer. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman can give me some information on these points. (8.40.)

*(9.12.) MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): I do not know how far the rules will permit me to enter upon a subject the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Hanbury) has treated. I mean in reference to recent occurrences in the Guards, but I understand, Sir, you have allowed the hon. Member to address one or two queries to the Secretary of State, and I presume I shall be in order in following the same line to a certain extent. I do not take the same view with the hon. Member as to responsibility and control of Parliament over the Army. I hold that Parliament should have absolute control, both in general management and in matters of detail. That being the case, if you will permit me to enlarge, not at great length, on events which have recently taken place, there are two questions I wish to ask. It is inconvenient on a question like this to ask questions of a Minister who is not present, but if in order I will proceed, and perhaps the Financial Secretary can give me answers. I think it may fall within the scope of your ruling if I press the right hon. Gentleman for a clear and definite answer on two points, though I know that clear and definite answers are not particularly pleasant to a Minister, especially in regard to such grave circumstances as these upon which I have to comment. I should like to know whether it is contemplated to hold any sort of inquiry into the conduct of the officers who are responsible, I suppose, for the maintenance of discipline in the regiment. I do not wish to attribute any lack of judgment in dealing with the men to the officers or to any particular officer, but I desire to say that some officer evidently has not known exactly how to deal with the men in this matter, and that owing to that officer's want of tact and judgment a state of things has arisen which the Duke of Cambridge characterised as being almost unparalleled and as reflecting grave discredit on one of the first regiments in the British Army. When the Commander-in-Chief commits himself to a statement of that kind, the House of Commons ought to allow considerable latitude in discussing the question. When we see a regiment of which we are all justly proud ordered away at a moment's notice, and in a way in which it has not hitherto been customary to order a regiment abroad, I do think the Secretary of State for War, now that his salary is under consideration, might vouchsafe to us some slight modicum of information on the grave matters which have been going on in the interior economy of the regiment. I have always thought, in common with other Members, that it is not usual, nor I believe has it been usual, to send the Guards away except in case of war, and the last time they were ordered away I believe it was to Canada, complications existing at that time with the United States Government which it was thought might lead to war. But owing to the misconduct, or the alleged misconduct—for the public are absolutely ignorant of what did transpire—owing to the alleged misconduct of 6 or 7 men, all young men, we have this fine regiment ordered away at the expense of the taxpayers for an uncertain period to a place like Bermuda, which, though it may be an agreeable and healthy place of resort, is not the sort of place to which such a regiment would be sent in this particular juncture. I think we are entitled to know what really occurred at the barracks. So far as we know, and our only knowledge is derived from the Press, five or six men refused to turn out at bugle call and locked themselves in their quarters, and used some foolish and insulting words to their officer. For this, which may have been a harmless freak of very young men, almost boys, a very grave degradation—I think I may call it so—has been inflicted upon the smartest regiment in the Army; and I would ask why such a very severe sentence, ranging over a period of from 18 months to two years, has been inflicted on men for an offence which in other conditions of life would have merely called for reprimand? When men place themselves voluntarily under military discipline they must, more or less, take the consequences of their own act, but even to men under military discipline some fair measure of justice should be extended; and for a fault of this kind to inflict sentences which on civilians would only be inflicted for aggravated assaults or burglaries, or other crimes of the most serious nature, is a course which will tend to render it difficult to get recruits to enter Her Majesty's Army, and which may in the end prove subversive of that discipline. Military Authorities think it will tend to strengthen. I shall not enlarge further upon that, I will merely press upon the Secretary for War that he should give a distinct answer on the point I have placed before him, and especially upon the point whether we may hope for a relaxation of the sentence upon the men, who I think at the very most were misled into a neglect of discipline. There is another matter I hope I may be in order in raising. I have addressed more than one question to the right hon. Gentleman on the grievances of General Mitchell—I do not know whether I shall be in order—

THE CHAIRMAN: That would come under the Military Vote, Vote 1.

*MR. E. STANHOPE: Vote 11 I think, Sir, would cover it—retired pay.

*MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I feel an uncertainty as to which ruling I am to follow?

*THE CHAIRMAN: The question may be raised on Vote 11.

*MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: Then I will not now continue my remarks on that subject. I hope, however, that the Secretary of State will give some definite answer to my questions concerning the recent disturbances among the Guards.

(9.22.) COLONEL HUGHES (Woolwich): I desire to move that the salary of the Secretary of State for War should be reduced by the sum of £100, for the purpose of bringing before the House a miscarriage of justice which has happened in connection with the Department over which the right hon. Gentleman, speaking generally, so ably presides. Some two months ago I presented a Petition from certain labourers employed at Woolwich Arsenal, and this was ruled out of order, because it applied for an increase of wages, and thereupon I sent it through the heads of the Department at Woolwich to the War Office. I have a letter from the Commissary General, Colonel Ingram, acknowledging receipt, and this is dated May 14.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): As a matter of order, I would point out that the amount for wages was included in Vote 1, and that this has nothing to do with the Vote under discussion.

THE CHAIRMAN: I was waiting to hear the exact point of the hon. and gallant Gentleman's complaint. If it refers to wages only, then it is relevant to Vote 1.

COLONEL HUGHES: At the present moment I am waiting to hear a reply to that Petition, and this has not yet been received, and I take it this involves a complaint of the conduct of public business in the Department of which the right hon. Gentleman is the head. I am desirous of enlarging my remarks and to deal with what the petitioners desire; and, subject to your ruling, Sir, I feel sure I shall have the sympathy of the Committee.

THE CHAIRMAN: If the hon. Member complains of delay in not attending to a communication from himself to the Department he must confine himself to the facts in relation to that delay.

COLONEL HUGHES: Submitting myself to your guidance, Sir, I will confine myself to that. The letter of acknowledgment was dated May 14. The Petition related mainly to labourers in the Ordnance Store Department to the number of nearly 1,000. Colonel Ingram informed me he had forwarded it to the War Office. Yesterday I applied to Colonel Ingram to know what had become of it, and to-day I have received a reply from that officer stating that no answer had been received from the War Office. Now, under these circumstances, no reply having been received, these men being in the employ of a Government Department, having a grievance and having applied to the heads of the Department for redress in a Petition sent under cover of a letter from myself, and two months having elapsed without any reply beyond a bare acknowledgment from the official to whom it was immediately sent, I feel it is a duty to my constituents that I should mention the subject-matter embodied in the Petition.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

COLONEL HUGHES: On a former occasion, when I endeavoured to move for a Committee of Inquiry, I was told that I should have an opportunity on the Estimates of raising the question on a Motion to reduce the salary of the official immediately concerned, but to my mind it is much better to appeal at once to head quarters. I have no complaint to make against those in charge of the particular Department where the complaint originates. I know they spend all the money they can get from the Treasury for wages; my complaint must be of those responsible for the Estimates.

THE CHAIRMAN: If the complaint refers to the inadequacy of pay, it ought to be brought forward on the Vote containing the amount for the wages of the men.

COLONEL HUGHES: I could only raise the point by moving a reduction, and that would be placing myself in a false position, for my complaint is that the wages are now insufficient. If, by the Rules of discussion, I must place myself in such a ridiculous position, I will do so to secure my object, but I thought that as payment of wages is made under the authority of the Secretary of State, I could raise the subject now. If this is not so, Sir, what Vote do you suggest as relevant to the purpose? This may appear amusing to hon. Members, but it is no laughing matter to those men on whose behalf I am pleading. I desire to do my duty to my constituents, and I think I am entitled to assistance, not only from the Chairman, but from hon. Members around me.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member must find out the Vote upon which the question of pay arises, and upon that bring forward his complaint.

(9.30.) DR. TANNER: The hon. and gallant Gentleman has addressed several letters to the War Office, and simply because he stood up for poor working men in his own constituency he has been treated in a contemptuous way and has received no proper answer. As far as I can gather from the remarks of the hon. and gallant Member, the War Office have not behaved with courtesy to him, or in a way in which a Public Department should behave. I do think that some explanation is now due from the Secretary for War, because I gather that there must be some fire in the complaint raised, and that it is not all smoke.

(9.32.)* MR. E. STANHOPE: I am only too glad to have this opportunity of answering.

DR. TANNER: It is very hard to get you up.

MR. E. STANHOPE:* I am only too glad of this opportunity of saying a few words in reply to my hon. and gallant Friend. He complains that certain labourers have not received an answer from the War Office. But I may mention that when the Petition was received a letter was written to the hon. and gallant Member who had made certain allegations which were highly misleading, and he was asked to point out what labourers were receiving 25s. or 30s. a week. All this time we have been awaiting a reply to that question. But I do not wish to get rid of this question on that point. No doubt some of the labourers in the Ordnance Store Department have been asking for an increase of wages. I hope that these men will approach me in a proper manner. They must not approach me through the hon. Member.

DR. TANNER: Why not?

MR. E. STANHOPE:* They must approach me through the head of the Department.

DR. TANNER: Yes, on their knees.

MR. E. STANHOPE:* I hope and believe that the men, if they are well advised, will adopt that course. If they do, they will get an answer in a few days, for I never hesitate for a moment to listen to complaints which reach me in a legitimate manner. I have listened to the speech of the hon. Member for Preston, and I confess I do not recognise in his description any resemblance to the War Office as it now exists. He asks me for certain particulars about the records of the War Office Council. All I can say is that the proceedings referred to are recorded for the benefit of the Government that is and the Governments that are to come, and not to be communicated to the public. I cannot gratify the hon. Member for Preston with the information he desires, and I believe it would only be an additional means of finding fault with the Estimates.

MR. HANBURY: I only desire that in cases where the Secretary for War takes a course contrary to that advised by the Council the fact shall be made known, so that the House in case of necessity may attach the blame in the right quarters.

MR. E. STANHOPE:* I am not prepared to do that. With regard to the questions relating to the Guards, the hon. Member for Preston asks me whether I will lay down a rule that all officers of the Guards shall reside in barracks, and he spoke of abolishing what he called the privileges of the Guards. One of those privileges is that they pay for their own lodgings. For my part, I should be exceedingly glad if I could provide that the officers should reside among their men; and although I am not going so far as to require every officer henceforth to reside in barracks, yet I think that a fair proportion of the officers—at any rate, the unmarried officers—should have the means afforded them of living in barracks.

MR. HANBURY: Is the right hon. Gentleman going to treat the officers of the Guards in exactly the same way as the officers of other regiments?

MR. E. STANHOPE:* In other barracks quarters are provided for the officers. I should, indeed, be glad to provide accommodation in the barracks for the officers of the Guards.

MR. HANBURY: Why not?

MR. E. STANHOPE:* It is easy to say "Why not?" but the hon. Member must know that the space in Wellington Barracks and Chelsea Barracks is limited. Then the hon. Member asked me as to complaints and their nature. He requested me to tell him whether or not they were justifiable, and what I have to say in reply to that is that I do not intend to give any information. I do not think it would be in the interest of the Public Service—

MR. HANBURY: May I again interrupt the right hon. Gentleman?

MR. E. STANHOPE:* No, no. I shall decline to afford any opportunity either to the hon. Gentleman or the House to discuss this. This is a question on which I do not propose to give any information at all.

MR. HANBURY: What I asked was whether there were any justifiable complaints, and whether the complaints are going to be remedied. I ask that purely as a matter of fact and for our future guidance. We have heard a great deal on the subject of rations and as to sentry duty. I only want to know if these complaints are to be gone into.

*MR. E. STANHOPE: Any complaints that are made I am ready to consider. If I find anything in them I shall be happy to remedy them, but I am not prepared to give the House of Commons any further information on the subject. Then the hon. Member asked as to the opportunities the men have of bringing forward their complaints. Well, every soldier in the Army has a book telling him in the plainest way the mode in which, if he has any complaint to make, he can make it. In that book the soldier is told that if he thinks himself wronged he can make complaint to the captain. If he thinks himself wronged by the captain he can complain to his commanding officer, and if he thinks himself wronged by the commanding officer he may complain to the general or other officer commanding the district or station. The officer to whom complaint is made must, in due course, make inquiry. I cannot pass this by without saying one single word. I have tried to deprecate strongly any interference with the discipline of the Guards, and I hope that I carry with me the general sense of Parliament. But I hope the Committee will not run away with the notion that because of this unfortunate occurrence in one single regiment of the Guards, therefore they must look with suspicion on the brigade of Guards as a whole. The Guards have a most honourable record. They have served in all parts of the world with distinction, and at all times when serving in London the Guards have met not only with the approval of those who command them, but the public have had every reason to be satisfied with the conduct and discipline of the Guards. I, therefore, repudiate, in the strongest way, the idea that because one battalion has offended the whole brigade of Guards should be blamed, or held open to censure and criticism. They have hitherto deserved well of their country.

DR. TANNER: I rise to order. I wish to ask whether any hon. Member has imputed any blame to any other battalion of the Guards than the 2nd Battalion?

Mr. Hanbury

THE CHAIRMAN: The right hon. Gentleman is perfectly in order in the statement he was making. The hon. Member is under a complete misapprehension as to what constitutes a point of order. The question of order is one of form, and not of substance.

*MR. E. STANHOPE: As this Vote has now been under discussion for two days, and as the hon. Member behind me (the Member for Stockport) has a very important and interesting question in connection with it to bring forward, I hope that the Committee will now proceed in a businesslike manner to dispose of it.

(9.46.) COLONEL HUGHES: My right hon. Friend has said that I failed to answer a letter which was sent to me. That letter was an inquiry as to the wages of the labourers in the iron works, whereas the Petition referred to the labourers in the Ordnance Stores Department. That Petition was signed by 900 men, and I wish to know whether that can be sent direct, or whether a fresh Petition must be signed?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I should recommend that the Petition be withdrawn and sent in in the ordinary manner.

(9.48.) MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): I propose to deal now with one item on the Vote, i.e. that of the pay of the Commander in Chief. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War is constitutionally the representative of the Army in this House, and he is responsible to Parliament for the general administration of the Army. The Commander in Chief is at the head of the combatant portion of the Army, and is directly responsible to the Sovereign for the discipline and command of the Force. I entirely agree with the right hon. Gentleman that it is not a proper thing to bring before Parliament questions of internal discipline in connection with any particular regiment unless it becomes a matter urgently requiring the attention of Parliament. This is not a Committee of public safety. If it were, it would probably result in evils as great as those which cropped up in France. But at present we are asked to vote a certain sum of money for the pay of the Commander in Chief. I presume we are to infer from that that it is the intention of the Government to continue the Commander in Chief in his present position, and at his present salary, and yet having regard to what we have learned recently it appears rather strange that that should be so, because we have had a Report of a Committee accepted by the Government with regard to the positions and functions and responsibilities of the Commander in Chief which points in a different direction. The representations of the Committee are of a very serious nature. The Commander in Chief is entrusted now with a variety of functions. He is not only the Commanding Officer in Chief fulfilling duties which attached to the office when it was established in 1793, but he has also since had thrown upon him responsibilities for work previously discharged by officers who were heads of a variety of Departments. The Committee which sat under the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale declared that the present system resulted not only in overloading the Commander-in-Chief, but also in weakening the sense of responsibility in all the officers subordinate to him, but who were responsible to the Secretary of State only indirectly and through the Commander-in-Chief. It has been suggested that on the occurrence of a vacancy certain changes should be carried out, and that in these changes regard should be had to the responsibilities to Parliament of the Secretary of State, the improvement of the consultative functions of the professional advisers of Ministers, and the direct responsibilities to Ministers of officers charged with well-defined duties. What are those duties? Outside the duties proper of the Commander-in-Chief are all the subsidiary services without which an Army could not be worked. There are the Commissariat Department, the Clothing Department, the arrangements for transport and locomotion at home and abroad, the medical treatment of men in peace as well as in war, and last, but not least, the question of fortifications. Now it is impossible for anyone to discharge all these miscellaneous duties without weakening the responsibility of the officer in charge of the subsidiary service. Now, I think we are entitled to an explicit statement by the right hon. Gentleman on the points I am raising, namely, whether it is intended to continue the present Commander-in-

Chief in the same position, with the same responsibilities and with the same emoluments, during the whole of the ensuing financial year.

*MR. E. STANHOPE: Yes, Sir.

(9.57.) MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I wish to call the attention of the Committee to a subject of considerable importance, namely, the employment of reserve and discharged soldiers in various Government posts, such as clerkships and writerships, and as messengers and porters. This was a very important question, when considered in connection with the difficulties of recruiting. The Report of the Inspector General of Recruiting forms far from satisfactory reading, for it states that although the quality of recruits has been reduced, it is still impossible to get the required quantity of men. Several nostrums have been suggested, among them being the raising of the pay and the bounty, the better feeding of the men, and the finding of employment for reserve and discharged soldiers. If you do the former the money will only go into the canteen, if you increase the bounty you place a premium on desertion. As to food, I cannot agree with the Report of the Committee, which suggests that the bread should be baked in 2lb. instead of 4lb. loaves, for I think the soldier should have a meal between dinner time and breakfast time the next morning. It is, therefore, to the question of employment that I think we must look for a remedy. I think it would be a distinct advantage to the Public Service that men attached to a regiment should be enabled to keep in contact with their original trade, so as to be fit to resume it when they retire from the Service. During the last five years the Association for the Employment of Discharged Soldiers has procured employment for 5,000 men, and yet it receives but £200 a year from the Government, while the War Office Vote is £250,000. That is but a small quantity of bread to such an intolerable deal of sack. I think the matter is well worthy of consideration.

*(10.1.) CAPTAIN VERNEY (Bucks, N.): I shall move that the Vote be reduced by the salary of the Commander-in-Chief, £4,500, and I do not see how it is possible for the Committee to avoid doing so on that question. I understand that the right hon. Gentleman said in this House that when a vacancy occurred the duties of the Commander-in-Chief would be divided in an entirely different manner, and with great advantage to the Army. Are we to be told that because the Commander-in-Chief does not resign the Army is to remain in its present state? The Government have put off the Army and Navy Estimates until this late period of the Session, and then deprecate any discussion of the Estimates. I hope hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House will sit until the middle of September rather than allow the Vote to be taken without proper discussion, especially after the enunciation distinctly of a sound policy by the right hon. Gentleman himself. I move the reduction of the Vote by £4,500.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Item A, Salaries of the War Office, be reduced by £4,500, the Salary of the Commander-in-Chief." — (Captain Verney.)

*(10.5.) MR. E. STANHOPE: I rise at once to take up the challenge of the hon. Gentleman. I never heard the reduction of a Vote moved upon more slender or meagre grounds. I can quite understand a Motion for the reduction of the salary of the Secretary of State or anybody else connected with the War Office; but when the hon. Member takes upon himself what is, after all, an immense responsibility, he ought to give some reasonable grounds for it, while the only ground the hon. Gentleman gave was a misquotation from himself. All that I said was that I adopted entirely the language of the Royal Commission, that it was not likely that any successor of the Commander-in-Chief, if there was to be one, could for a long period of years have the same authority. The Commander-in-Chief has been in the service of his country for over 50 years, and he must have greater authority in the administration of the Army than any man who might succeed him for a long period. At any rate, changes which might afterwards be considered could not be adequately considered now. I have taken exactly the ground which the Royal Commission has taken, and I cannot, therefore, believe that the hon. Member is serious in proposing the reduction.

Captain Verney.

(10.7.) DR. TANNER: We know that the Commander-in-Chief cannot live for ever. We all know that he is an old gentleman to whom nobody has imputed any bad conduct or anything wrong. But it has reached the ears of many through the Press that the Commander-in-Chief is about to retire, and that our Royal Duke is to be appointed; and I think it would be a very good thing if we could get some definite and explicit answer from the Secretary for War. But I rose for another purpose. I was passing along by Wellington Barracks early in the morning, and I saw crowds of weeping women there who were not on the strength of the regiment which was going abroad. I would ask whether any provision is going to be made for these poor women, or are they to be left destitute?

*(10.10.) CAPTAIN VERNEY: The right hon. Gentleman says I misquoted him, and I consider that is sufficient ground for withdrawing my Motion, because it was only because of what I understood he said that I moved it. I beg leave to withdraw my Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

DR. TANNER: It appears to me that numbers of these poor people will be thrown into the workhouse unless something is going to be done for them. As an Irishman in London, I would ask whether anything can be done to alleviate the suffering caused by sending this regiment abroad?

*(10.11.) MR. E. STANHOPE: I am very sorry indeed that such cases should arise as the hon. Member has called attention to. When a regiment is sent abroad, there must necessarily be cases of considerable hardship. But, then, there is a good deal to be said on the other side. It would have been much better if, before marrying, the men had waited until their short period of service had expired. I hope something may be done by the charitably disposed.

MR. JEFFREYS (Hants, Basingstoke): Sir, with regard to discharged soldiers, I wish to call attention to the difficulty experienced in finding suitable employment for them, because, though they have served with the colours, they rarely know any trade. I would suggest whether it would not be possible to have technical schools attached to the regiments?

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Gentleman's observations are not in order. The hon. Member for Essex ingeniously connected his remarks with the pay of the Inspector General of Recruiting, but that was rather an evasion of order.

*(10.13.) MR. JENNINGS (Stockport): Mr. Courtney, I desire to draw attention to the expenditure on the Vote, though I am almost disinclined to go on with the discussion on account of the time which has already been consumed on the Vote. The subject is one of very considerable importance to the Public Service. For the organisation of the War Office the Secretary of State is not in any way responsible. It existed long before the time of the Secretary of State, and I doubt whether it is in the power of the right hon. Gentleman entirely to remedy its defects. The organisation is cumbrous, extravagant, and defective. If hon. Members look down the Vote it will be seen that the characteristics of the office are extravagant salaries, a larger number of persons to do the work than are required, and a constant tendency to accumulate high pensions. These are characteristics of other offices besides the War Office, but no other possesses them in greater perfection. In spite of reorganisations and large bonuses paid to persons to go out of office who ought never to have been in, at this moment the office is ludicrously overmanned. There are no fewer than five head accountants, costing £5,800 a year, besides a large number of principal and senior clerks. There is also an elaborate system of reduplication of work going on outside the War Office itself, and it is obvious to all of us that any Secretary of State, with a real eye to business, must sincerely wish that he had it in his power to make a clean sweep of the whole concern, and start afresh on a rational basis. At the present moment the staff of clerks and draftsmen cost £144,812 a year, while the copyists and boy clerks cost an additional sum of £8,800, making nearly £154,000 for clerical labour alone. It would be needless to say anything about this amount if the labour were indispensable, and if the sum paid for it were reasonable. A great part of the labour is, however, entirely superfluous, and it is paid for at an extravagant rate. I find that there are 18 principal clerks receiving salaries of £880 a year; 47 in receipt of £650 a year; and 31 receiving £480 a year. As times go, these are not bad salaries, especially when we remember that there are always pensions accruing upon these salaries, and that the whole of the clerical staff have not only the usual holidays at Christmas and other times, but that they have also a vacation of a month or six weeks during the summer; some of them getting as much as seven weeks off duty in the course of the year. I quote this fact from the evidence given before the Committee, of which I was a Member, by Mr. Knox, and I would point out that this estimate does not include the Saturday half-holiday which continues all the year round. If an advertisement were put in the papers for a clerk on these terms, Westminster Hall would not be large enough to hold the applicants. There is no doubt that the heads of the Departments work much longer and much harder than the clerical staff, and this may apply to some of the principal clerks to the heads of Departments, but these are the rules of the office, and rules of this kind are never wantonly infringed. No doubt it will be said that these clerks perform duties of a very onerous and difficult nature; but when this is the case, I think it is the exception rather than the rule. We are not left in any doubt or to vague conjecture on this subject, because the Royal Commissioners and the Select Committee of this House, who have gone thoroughly into the matter, have ascertained all the facts. They tell us there is a great mass of work at the War Office which only calls for ordinary intelligence, experience, and industry, and not for high intellectual attainments or advanced education. In their Second Report the Commissioners say the duties of the office can be done by clerks who have received an ordinary commercial education; but there are a large number of persons interested in the matter who wish us to believe there is something to do in Government offices which is not done elsewhere, and can only be done by those who have been properly initiated into all the mysteries. The fact is, that the clerks in the War Office are remunerated at a rate more than double that which they would receive for performing similar duties in any commercial establishment of this or any other country. Take the case of a principal clerk at the Receiving House, with 50 clerks under him, and great responsibilities upon his shoulders. His salary is only from £210 to £300 a year. Why should the Government be called upon to pay more than the market value of the labour done? The only reason is that it offers the clerks a fixed position, light hours, easy duties, a certain amount of social prestige, and a pension; but surely these are not reasons for the payment of extravagant salaries. The Committee, of which I was a Member, distinctly explained that a large portion of the work consisted of simple repetition; that the number of clerks employed in the office, especially in the higher grades, far exceeded what was necessary; and that the proportion of supervising clerks to those supervised was far too large. I am afraid we shall be told that this arises from the difficulty placed in the way of re-organisation by the Resolution of the House in 1888. The condition in which we are in at the present moment is this: that, notwithstanding the enormous expense of re-organisation in the past, there is a constant demand for new re-organisation. The moment one re-organisation is over the same machinery is set to work, and a new experiment in a few years becomes necessary. It is less than 12 years since a tremendous re-organisation was accomplished which cost the country over £40,000 in pensions and £110,000 in bonuses. What the public demand is that these Government offices shall be conducted on the same principles as prevail elsewhere, and that no more hands shall be employed than are needed to do the work. Furthermore, if there is nothing for the clerks to do, they must be called upon to retire on pensions obtained from a fund to which they have themselves contributed. During our investigation at the War Office we obtained a list of clerks retired under the age of 50 and found that there were 39 of them. They were retired at over half their full salaries, and bonuses of from £500 to £1,000 each. The public will not tolerate this operation again. I should like to call attention for a moment to a statement made on the undeniable testimony of a very competent witness. I allude to Sir R. Thompson, the Permanent Under Secretary, who admitted that much of the highly-paid work in the War Office could be dispensed with. Red-tapeism is supreme. Evidence has been given about a pane of glass of the value of 4s. 6d. which was broken. It took six months and an immense mass of correspondence to decide which Vote it should come under. Evidence has been given by a clerk at the War Office as to his daily duties, and that evidence related to a particular day selected by himself. All this Upper Division clerk, receiving a large salary, had to do was to certify that certain work had passed through his hands. He declared that the most important part of his daily duty was to see that the observations of a clerk of a Lower Division upon an account were grammatical—for it seems that an ordinary Lower Division clerk is very shaky in his grammar until he passes to the Upper Division, when increase of knowledge comes with increase of salary. I feel sure that if the Secretary of State for War had to re-construct the Office throughout, he would place it on a very different footing from that on which it stands at present. Another clerk, named Huggett, was called before the Commission and was asked whether there was not a great deal of unnecessary supervision, and he replied that there was. The fact is, that those who are supposed to check, examine, and supervise, leave the duty to clerks below them, thus proving the superfluity of labour in the office. It is a curious fact for the Committee to consider that the Germans get this work done, notwithstanding the immensely greater number of their Army, for £160,000, while the cost with us is £258,000. But in the German War Office military clerks are engaged, and are occupied in useful work, and not in writing elaborate Minutes about a broken pane of glass. The necessary work of the War Office is done by them, and done exceedingly well, and no complaint has ever been made about them. This illustrates the point I have endeavoured to set forth. I see no reason, also, why officers on half-pay cannot be engaged by the War Office, but red-tapeism is against them. I listened very carefully to the evidence of Mr. Knox, the Accountant General, a gentleman of great ability and of conspicuous devotion to the Service, and I was much surprised to hear him declare that the feeling in the Service is against the employment of military clerks. It is unfortunate that he should cherish a superstition against this system, especially as many high authorities in the Army are against him. Lord Wolseley and General Brackenbury, who are officers of high authority, have strongly recommended the employment of military clerks; and Lord Wolseley has stated that it would result in a large saving in civil pensions, in dispensing with highly-paid civil clerks, and in making the Army more popular. That is also the opinion of General Brackenbury, who told the Commission that he had never heard expressed even a suspicion of the military clerks not performing their duties properly. He declared that his own confidential clerk was almost entrusted with State secrets. Mr. Knox took a different view, and said that he would not trust military clerks. But there are already a large number of military clerks engaged at the War Office, and they do their work satisfactorily. In fact, there are 87 on this Vote, costing about £9,300 a year, while there are 394 civilian clerks, who cost £118,000 a year. The only objection, it seems, that is urged against the further employment of military clerks is that they might fall into collusion with contractors—that is, in short, they are not to be trusted; but that idea is ridiculous, and I deny that there is any force in the objection. Mr. Knox is in favour of the employment of University men in these positions, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer appears to support that view; but I contend that a University training, however desirable in itself, does not necessarily qualify a man to deal with business affairs. No great commercial firm would conduct its business on such principles, and on the same point the Committee may take the testimony of Sir Algernon West, than whom there is no higher authority in the Civil Service, who told the Royal Commission that a University man was of little use for this work without business experience. My objection to the selection of University men is not, of course, because they have had a University training, but because they receive far higher salaries than the nature of their work justifies the country in paying. It is often stated, in answer to this, that if these men had gone to the Bar they would have earned yet more money. But that is not certain; every barrister does not become a Lord Chancellor, with a purse-bearer. I undertake to say that there are many barristers now in practice who would be very willing to sell their wigs and gowns at half price if they could obtain desks at the War Office with salaries of £700 or £900 a year—salaries very much higher than the nature of the work justifies. But even if there were any foundation for the argument that if these gentleman had gone to the bar they would have made larger incomes, it is no answer to my contention. It is interesting to inquire what these clerks themselves have to say about their work. If it could be contended that this work is such as could not be performed anywhere else for less than £900 a year, I admit that the whole case would fall to the ground. One of the clerks in the War Office—a gentleman named Moir—went before the Royal Commission and told them plainly that there was no work in the Department which required even the mental attainments of a clerk in the Higher Division, and that a University man going into the War Office would, in the course of time, through the simple work he was constantly called on to do, utterly lose his brain power. Surely that is worse than anything I have presented to the House.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: In what Department is that gentleman?

*MR. JENNINGS: That I cannot say, as I did not make a note of the Department. I did, however, make a note of the number of the question, and I will give him that. It was question No. 4,824. Here we have a gentleman stating that a clerk in the War Office, simply through the performance of his routine duties, loses his brain power. Even Mr. Knox must be struck with remorse when he looks at the University wrecks who have gone to pieces on the rocks of £900 a year and a pension. I would not have brought this case forward on my own responsibility, but I thought that at least the clerks in the office could be trusted to tell the truth about such a matter as this. I will not dwell upon the fact that the amount set down for messengers in the War Office is nearly £9,000. The redeeming feature in this, however, is that the men are old soldiers, who may, it seems, be trusted to carry a letter, but not to copy one. I contend that their services should be much more utilised than at present. I am not so unreasonable as to call on the Secretary for War to make a reduction in the Vote at once, and I do not ask him to do more than that he will in the future facilitate arrangements by which it may be possible to make necessary and useful reforms. No one who has examined the working of this office can fail to come to the conclusion that it is open to a good deal of reasonable reform. The fact that previous attempts at reform have not succeeded is no reason why further efforts in that direction should not be made. I will not, however, in moving the reduction of the Vote, press the Motion to a Division. I only wish to give expression to the opinion, which I believe is held by the public and by the House of Commons, that the expenditure is extravagant and ought to be reduced.

*(10.45.) MR. BRODRICK: I am sure that no Member of the Committee can complain of the tone or substance of the hon. Member's speech. My hon. Friend has given great attention to this matter, and he was a valuable Member of the Committee who inquired into this and other War Office Votes. No doubt a considerable amount of evidence was taken on that occasion, and some of it, to which the hon. Member has referred to-night, would point to the necessity for some change in the existing system. At the same time, the hon. Member will not expect me to concur altogether in the gruesome picture which he drew of a War Office clerk condemned to short hours and a large salary losing his brain power through routine work, and unable to find any scope for his abilities. My hon. Friend will recollect that the evidence given before the Royal Commission referred to the War Office under the old system, before competitive examinations were introduced, and to the large number of clerks who dated from the old days of nominations. My hon. Friend will have noticed the enormous reduction which has been made in the number of Higher Division clerks receiving high salaries and entitled to large pensions appointed prior to the re-organisation. Originally there were over 200 of that grade, and our authorised establishment is 136, but they have been so reduced that the present number is 113, though I do not say that that number even is necessary for the work. I think that 60 or 70 would be nearer the mark, and proposals have been made to the Chancellor of the Exchequer for allowing some such limit to be drawn. The work to be done by responsible clerks is very large, and no man is now promoted to the higher posts except by selection, and when the Higher Divisions gets down to the normal level, the whole of its members will be employed on superintending duties, and we wish to carry on this process as rapidly as possible, as we regard it as to the advantage of the Public Service. My hon. Friend asserts that much of the work of the War Office is superfluous, and I am entirely in accord with my hon. Friend on that point. We have pointed out time after time that the principles upon which the House of Commons, acting through the Treasury, has forced the War Office to proceed in the audit of every single item of expenditure, are extravagant principles which could not possibly be carried out in any commercial enterprise. I must remind the Committee that the House of Commons is entirely responsible for these principles. The House cheers every allusion to the action of the Auditor General, and time after time we have been taken to task because my right hon. Friend the Secretary for War declined to allow the Auditor General to interfere in the practical new working of the department, not excluding such questions as those of contract, for which the Auditor General has no expert knowledge to guide him. With regard to the allegations of over-payment of the staff, we quite recognise that the great majority of the work of the War Office can be performed by men of ordinary intelligence and experience; and my right hon. Friend is filling all vacancies by the appointment of Lower Division clerks—copyists. With regard to military clerks, it is desired that as many shall be employed as is consistent with the work to be done. But it is a question whether we should be wise to take officers of nearly 30 years' service and put them to superintending work now performed by civilian clerks whose numbers were being rapidly reduced. As to the employment of soldiers and non-commissioned officers, this is done now as far as work can be found for them, and it proves to be advantageous. The numbers of military clerks has gone on increasing year by year, and we shall continue to employ them as long as we find it is really economical and labour-saving to do so. As to the messengers of the War Office, the expenditure upon them looks large, although they are entirely old soldiers. The physical conformation of the War Office buildings is extremely difficult to deal with. The War Office, I might almost say, is scattered all over this part of London. There are nine separate buildings, and messengers have to be constantly passing to and fro. The cost of messengers must continue to look disproportionate until it is thought necessary to re-build the War Office at considerable expense. However, considerable reduction will be made in the Vote, the number of established messengers being diminished, and temporary messengers being employed instead. Proposals in several directions have been submitted to the Chancellor of the Exchequer for reducing the expenditure at the War Office. We recognise that a much smaller number of highly-trained men, with a proportionate number of men of ability suited to the work they have to perform, will be sufficient for us in the future. Of course, the number of men has grown enormously, and the work has grown enormously. We have under arms half as many men again as we had in 1860, and the labour of the Department is correspondingly increased. Our desire is to study economy in every particular in the appointments and the administration, and to relieve ourselves, if we can, of some of the superfluous work that is thrown upon us. We adopt the spirit of the suggestions made by my hon. Friend, and we feel grateful to him for the moderate and the practical manner in which he has put them forward.

(10.57.) MR. A. O'CONNOR: Anybody who has listened to the explanations of the hon. Gentleman will not be surprised that the administration of the War Office falls sometimes into a muddle. He admits that the staff of the War Office is excessive, and he goes on to say that the amount of work it has to do is very large; that it was imposed on it by the House of Commons, which insists on the work of the Auditor General being carried out to a ridiculous extent. I do not think that is any answer to anyone who knows practically the organisation and administration of the War Office. Three-fourths of the staff of the War Office in its upper grades might be done away with, and I think the continuance of that staff is a very considerable reproach to the existing administration. The hon. Member has stated that the clerks in the Higher Division were to be reduced in number from 113 to 60. Then why are the extra clerks retained at all? If the time of clerks is fully occupied it must be either with necessary or unnecessary work; and if any part of the work done is unnecessary it ought to be got rid of.

MR. BRODRICK: There is no power to reduce the audit work, or to get rid of these gentlemen.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: No doubt there is a considerable amount of audit work, but it is not necessary to have it done twice over, and that which is the work of audit proper ought to be transferred to the staff of the Auditor General. No doubt there must be a sufficient clerical staff to enable the Department to know how much money it has expended and how much it has yet available. Having some knowledge of the Department, and having sat on the Royal Commission on Civil Establishments, I have no hesitation in saying that out of 47 senior clerks 30 might be dispensed with immediately; and out of 31 who have salaries of between £150 and £500, 20 might be got rid of. Many of these clerks are what is known as redundant; they were continued in the Department at the time of the last re-organisation. I contend that work might have been found for them in other Departments in which appointments and promotions are being made. The Chancellor of the Exchequer shakes his head; but does the right hon. Gentleman deny that promotions and appointments have been stopped in the Civil Service until redundant clerks have had work found for them?

(11.5.) THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I can assure the hon. Member that in the War Office, as in other Departments, the greatest difficulty has been found in dealing with redundant clerks; but you cannot stop promotions, for in that case there will be discontented service, and remonstrances will be made in this House by Members who will have their pockets full of complaints that the Government has been guilty of breach of faith.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: The right hon. Gentleman's explanation does not remove what appears to be the great blot on the system. Is it contended that a Civil servant has a vested right of promotion in his own Department irrespective of the public interests?

MR. GOSCHEN: Certainly not.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: Then if redundant men are transferred from Department A to Department B, and promotion is then stopped, why should there be an outcry in Department B which the Government are bound to recognise?

MR. GOSCHEN: It is human nature.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: Well, if human nature is to be yielded to, you will have cries from all directions. Human nature must not override the right of the public to obtain work from those whom it is bound to pay. The fact is, this House is, to a large extent, responsible for extravagance in the Civil Service, because both sides bring pressure to bear on a Member who does anything which remotely threatens what are regarded as vested interests. That is one reason why promotions and appointments are being made while there are still redundant clerks. Hard as it may seem to the country if work cannot be found for men, the Government will be justified in putting them on the retired list. It is said the men are over-paid for the work they do. In too many cases this is true. You have got into the Civil Service, if I may use the simile, horses to do asses' work, and having got these highly-paid men in the Public Service on certain conditions, you cannot dismiss them, and are bound to pay them their salaries. I do not propose that any very large, sweeping reductions should be made, but I do say that a very considerable reduction can be effected in the War Office in the higher ranks, and the change can be made without inflicting any great hardship on individuals by extending the system of transfer. Why should not men now in the War Office be transferred to the Treasury or the Colonial Office?

*MR. BRODRICK: One man has been transferred to the Treasury and one to another Office.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: No doubt. One man! But a great many men are transferred from the Treasury to other offices, especially if they happen to have been private secretaries. The Treasury is always treated with exceptional favour. If it is so easy to practise the principle of transfer when it is a question of giving Treasury men appointments in other branches of the Civil Service, why should it be so difficult to practise the principle in the case of the War Department? I believe that if the Civil Service were treated as a whole, a great many of the existing difficulties might be got rid of. I know it will be said by the Government that the men who are in charge of the Departments do not like to see strangers brought in from other Departments over the heads of their own men. That difficulty is never allowed to prevail when it is a question of transferring Treasury officers to good situations elsewhere, and a Minister of determination would very soon brush away difficulties of that kind. If a reduction of the Vote had been moved, I should feel it my duty to vote for it, because I believe this is an inflated Vote, a Vote which might, without any personal injustice being inflicted, be reduced.

(11.15.) MR. GOSCHEN: The present appears to be one of those occasions when the House of Commons is feverishly in favour of a reduction of establishments and the cheapening of the cost of Public Departments. But these are only spasmodic occasions, because it is often the case that when the Government take in hand any scheme by which a real reduction of the number of Civil servants will be effected, hon. Members, either from compassion or from other motives which I will not characterise, bring pressure to bear upon the Government in resistance to the scheme. I have been asked whether any Civil servant has a vested right to promotion. My reply is emphatically that there is no right of the kind. But although there is no vested right, there is an expectation on the part of persons who have entered the Service that after a certain time they will reach positions of larger emolument, and when such posts are abolished there is naturally disappointment and discontent. I wish I could convince hon. Members of the difficulties which the Government experience when they attempt to reduce the number of the superior appointments in the Service. I have Memorials before me at the present time petitioning the Treasury not to carry out the scheme of reduction which ought to follow as a result of the Royal Commission. The argument put forward by the petitioners are these: they do not exactly claim a vested interest, but they have worked up to a given point; they have done good service, and they have had for many years the expectation to rise to the superior posts; and I am sure it would cause cruel disappointment and dissatisfaction throughout the Civil Service if the Government were to proceed with anything like stringency in the direction of abolishing these superior posts, and a discontented Civil Service would be a great calamity to this country. It would, therefore, be unwise to proceed with any degree of exaggeration on this path, which, nevertheless, the Government ought to follow, as they are most anxious to carry out the views of the Royal Commission. I hail with satisfaction occasions like this when hon. Members declare they are with the Government in the attempt to abolish a certain number of these superior posts which are no longer wanted. At the same time, we must proceed with considerable caution. The hon. Member for East Donegal asked, "Why not transfer to the Treasury and the Colonial Office?" The answer is, that the Treasury and the Colonial Office are full and want no more clerks. The Commission reported that the superior posts in nearly all the offices are unnecessarily numerous, and that vacancies ought not to be filled up. We have not the opportunity of transferring clerks from the War Office to other Departments, because in those other Departments there ought also to be reduction on the same scale.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: The Local Government Board and the Board of Trade.

MR. GOSCHEN: I only wish I could convince the hon. Gentleman of the difficulties we have had with the Local Government Board and the Board of Trade. We have endeavoured to transfer some clerks from the War Office to the Local Government Board, but we have received most serious remonstrances from my right hon. Friend the President of that Department, who says that it will not be the best, but probably the worst, clerks whom the War Office will wish to send over. No Department ever wishes to transfer its best and most useful clerks, and, therefore, other Departments are afraid of getting bad bargains. The First Lord of the Treasury has taken the greatest pains to effect transfers from one office to another. Sometimes he has been met with what I may call grumbling acquiescence, and at other times the resistance has been so great it has been very difficult to carry out his object. The transfers are still on a small scale, and for the reason that in all the offices where the Government are trying to diminish the number of superior clerks the transfer scheme is fraught with difficulty. I hope the hon. Member and the Committee will not understand we are opposing the desire of the Royal Commission or the Committee on this point. We are anxious to make progress in this direction, but the difficulties are far greater than they appear to the casual observer. A comparison has been drawn between the emoluments received by civilians in the War Office in this country and the salaries given in Germany. Those who made that comparison have not made allowance for the fact that work of all kinds is paid for less highly in Germany than here. I wish the Committee to understand and I wish the public to understand this, that during the last four years fewer new men have been admitted into the Public Service than in any four years previously. The Government are doing all they can to keep down the cost of the Public Service, but, at the same time, they are attempting to do so in a manner which will not create discontent among the Civil servants.

(11.25.) SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I have also great experience in these matters, and I acknowledge, to a certain extent, the difficulties to which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has alluded. There are great difficulties about the transfer of Civil servants. The disposition always is to transfer the bad bargains, and there is a great unwillingness on the part of offices to accept the bad bargains of other offices. But this is only a question of degree, and it seems to me the hon. Member for East Donegal has raised a question of great width and importance, and has put his finger on a great abuse. If it was the case that the Civil Service was to be reduced all round, I could believe there was a justification for what the Chancellor of the Exchequer has said, but the Estimates testify that that is not the case. The Civil Service Estimates increase every year, and that increase means the employment of more men. At the same time, the number of redundant pensioned men is increasing. Men are pensioned in the prime of life on one pretext or another, and enormous burdens are thus imposed on the country. The Treasury ought to exercise firmness, and insist, when there are too many clerks in one Department, on transferring some of them to another Department. I admit that as soon as you exercise firmness, you are apt to have hon. Members of this House bringing pressure to bear on the Government on behalf of the Civil servants who think they are injured. That raises a wider question. In my opinion, a very serious and fatal mistake was made in giving votes to Civil servants, and giving them liberty to take part in political agitation. It is most difficult to keep the Public Service within proper bounds when you have public servants exercising great political power. The evil is growing, and I fear we may reach that unhappy state of things which obtains in America, namely, that the Civil servants go in and out with the Government. I respect their Republican system and the advantages it gives; but there is one blot on the system, that their whole Civil Service is political. There are not wanting tendencies towards the same danger in the Civil Service of this country. It is a great evil, and the War Office is an instance of the danger, as I think the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer has indicated. I am not quite sure if I am in order in another point on which I desire to ask a question; it has regard to policy. First, I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it is his view that the contributions from our colonies towards the expenses of the Army are adequate?

THE CHAIRMAN: That does not depend on the Secretary of State.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I am sure I do not know whom it does depend upon. But, Sir, I replace that question with another, which I think does depend on the Secretary of State, and that is, whether he confirms the view in regard to the distribution of the Army which was stated by the right hon. Gentleman the late Secretary for War; whether he maintains the view that it never was intended there should be any real localisation by the regimental quarters being in the district whence the regiment derives its name; whether it was never intended that localisation should be for anything but recruiting purposes? I will not attempt to discuss the merits of such a view, only I wish to know whether it is understood on both Front Benches that it never was intended to localise the Army beyond recruiting purposes. One other question I should like to ask, and it is suggested by a reply given to-day. An hon. Member asked in how many cases the liability of retired officers had been carried into actual service. The answer was that no occasion for their service had arisen; that none had been called upon.

*MR. E. STANHOPE: Not under that particular warrant.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: May I ask what this warrant is? I shall be very glad to understand the answer of the right hon.

Gentleman was not of general application, for I have always thought it a very great abuse that comparatively young men, well under the prime of middle life, should be retired from the Army and not be called upon to serve again.

THE CHAIRMAN: This should be brought on upon the Vote for Retired Pay.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: There is only one more question I wish to ask, and that has relation to promotion from the ranks. I have been given to understand that this principle of promotion from the ranks has been very much abused, and that these promotions are not made as the result of good conduct and long service; but that young men, the sons of wealthy families, are promoted by favour. I should like to be informed whether this is the case; whether the number of the commissions allowed for promotion from the ranks are not considerably reduced by the promotion of young gentlemen who, unable to pass the examinations in the regular way, enter the Army, and are promoted by this back-door system?

*(11.35.) MR. E. STANHOPE: I believe there were only two questions of the hon. Gentleman which were in order. First, as to localisation, the main object of this—namely, for recruiting purposes—has been gained. Its full effects in this respect have not yet been realised, but they were being experienced more and more each year. I have no reason to differ from the explanation given by the right hon. Gentleman opposite. As to promotions from the ranks, it is perfectly true that there are different degrees of promotion from the ranks. I am always glad to hear of promotions having been made actually from the ranks, and for good service, as these are an encouragement to soldiers to do their duty.

(11.37.) COLONEL KENYON-SLANEY (Shropshire, Newport): I rise, under peculiar difficulties, to ask the Committee to grant me a few minutes while I make a reference to an attack made, unknown to me and unexpected, from a quarter where I had no reason to expect it, upon a regiment with which I have long been intimately connected. I need hardly appeal to the feelings of the Committee, and I am sure I need not to the feelings of military men, to bear with me while I relate an attack which I am told has been made, unfortunately in my absence, by the hon. Member for Preston, upon a regiment with which I have been very closely connected. I am told that the hon. Member for Preston referred to matters of recent occurrence in the Guards, and used language which is absolutely outside the facts and wholly unauthorised and unjustifiable as coming from an absolutely ignorant and uninformed Member of this House. I am told that the hon. Member stated that there is a strong feeling abroad that the officers of the Guards are not as much in touch with their men as they ought to be, and as the officers of other regiments are. [Sir G. CAMPBELL: Hear, hear.] The hon. Gentleman says, "Hear, hear," but the reports and opinions of general officers under whom the Guards have served are to be preferred to the opinion of an hon. Gentleman whose chief distinction in this House is prolixity in debate. How, then, does it come that in all the experience of the various wars in which the Guards have taken part the Reports from those who have commanded them in the field have, without one exception, been absolutely favourable, absolutely good, and especially strong as to the working of the men under these officers, in which they have formed a favourable contrast with other regiments. I, as a Guardsman, would be the last in the world to draw an invidious comparison between the Household Troops and others; our proudest boast has been that when we have been brought into line with other troops our conduct and efficiency has been proved to be not one bit worse than theirs, and that boast is proved, not by empty words of a partisan, but by the express Reports of all those officers who have had to command them, under the most trying circumstances, and in the most recent experience. Are we to believe the testimony of general officers and brigadiers, those who have had experience in the Service, or are we to accept the expression of opinion of an hon. Member whose sole connection with the Army is that he has made himself somewhat prominent as a critic of contracts? It was injudicious on his part to assume a rôle for which he is absolutely unqualified. I would not venture to touch the hem of the hon. Member's garment in matters on which he is conversant, and the hon. Member would be better advised if he left matters of military efficiency and discipline to those who have, at all events, some slight acquaintance with the subject. I could enlarge on this theme, there is unlimited command of subject, but time is running on. I recollect when the battalion marched out of town—

THE CHAIRMAN: I have not interrupted the hon. and gallant Member in his reply to an attack made upon the brigade of Guards, but I may point out that the line taken by the hon. and gallant Member is not strictly relevant to the Vote, and that he would do well to confine himself in as few words as possible to repelling the attack made upon the regiment.

COLONEL KENYON-SLANEY: I much regret if I have travelled for one moment from the line I have laid down for myself. With reference to the statement of the hon. Member that he had seen officers of the Guards, when entering Wellington Barracks, fail to return the salute of their men, I can only say that I have served for 20 years in the brigade of Guards, and if there is one thing more absolutely insisted upon than another it is that never upon any occasion should an officer forget to return in the most accurate and direct manner any salute that may be paid to him. It may be that in London, where there are sentries at almost every corner, a young officer going to his club, and possibly thinking of other things, might occasionally forget to put his finger to the peak of his cap; yet upon that temporary forgetfulness—which is one I have very seldom in my long experience seen—an hon. Member does not hesitate to rise in the House and criticise the conduct of the officers as being that neither of officers nor gentlemen. You have warned me, Sir, and I do not wish to allow my warmth to cause me to over-run your forbearance. It is a cause I have much at heart. In conclusion, the Guards are willing to bear any criticism which recent events justly call down upon them. They may feel, as they do, most bitterly and terribly what has recently occurred, but I think it would have been wiser and in better taste, as well as in greater consonance with the feelings of gentlemen and officers, had the hon. Member, not especially conversant with the subject under discussion, refrained from making those charges, which naturally come with an especial bitterness and an especial sting at a moment such as the present. I have ample proof at my command to rebut any such flippant and frippery attacks. I have proved, I think, that the remarks of the hon. Member were characterised neither by good taste and judgment, or any knowledge of the subject, and I would invite the hon. Member for the future to confine himself to the rôle of a critic of contracts, and not to criticise either the code of honour or of duty which characterise the officers of the brigade of Guards, and which always has, always must, and emphatically always will characterise them on any duty to which Her Majesty may be pleased to call them.

(11.46.) MR. E. STANHOPE: No one can be surprised that my hon. and gallant Friend should have desired to repel with some warmth attacks which he thought to be unjustly levelled against the brigade with which he has been so long connected. I rise, however, not for the purpose of making any remarks on the subject, but rather in order to deprecate any further discussion. I hope the Committee will now allow the Vote to be taken, after three nights discussion.

(11.47.) COLONEL NOLAN: I do not wish to continue the discussion further upon this matter, but I think that it is only fair to the hon. Member for Preston to say that his principal point was that quarters should be provided for unmarried officers, and in that I agree with the hon. Member. As to the point raised by the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy about promotion from the ranks, the hon. Member is right in saying that there are 20 in the year, but these commissions are given away to gentlemen who enter the Army for the express purpose of being promoted. I have no objection to a man being promoted who is a gentleman, but I think that these 20 commissions should be the right of deserving non-commissioned officers. The present system, in my opinion, is unfair, and ought to be inquired into by the Secretary of State for War.

Question put, and agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum not exceeding £294,800, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for the pay of Medical Establishments, and the cost of Medicines, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1891."

(11.50.) MR. E. STANHOPE: I would make an appeal to the hon. Member for West Aberdeen, who I know desires to raise the question of the position of Army Medical Officers, not to press a discussion at the present time. As the hon. Member is well aware, I have had the advantage of receiving a deputation consisting of representatives of all the great medical bodies in England, Scotland, and Ireland, who have pressed certain matters upon my attention as to which I felt bound, in the face of such an influential deputation, to promise to give serious consideration. This I am now doing, and I would advise the hon. Member that if he brings on a discussion now it will be impossible for me to make any statement upon the representations which have been made to me. That being so, I think the hon. Member will see that in his own interest it is not desirable to raise a discussion now.

(11.52.) DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): I quite appreciate the friendly spirit in which the right hon. Gentleman has made the appeal, but I think it will be only satisfactory to professional friends, both inside and outside the House, that I should take the opportunity this Vote offers of making a few observations. I shall discuss the Vote in no unfriendly spirit, and it is in no obstructive sense I move to report Progress. I think, considering the position I have taken upon this question, it is expected that I should take the opportunity to express the views of those I represent. I, therefore, beg to move that you do now report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Dr. Farquharson.)

MR. A. O'CONNOR: When will Army Estimates be taken again?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: It is impossible for me now to say when.

COLONEL NOLAN: Will it be on Thursday?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: No.

DR. TANNER: I think we ought to know when this Vote will be taken. I have waited here all night for it, sitting through discussions in which I had not the remotest interest in the expectation of this Vote being reached.

*MR. E. STANHOPE: If the hon. Member had exercised a little more forbearance himself, the Vote might have been reached at a reasonable time, and we might now be in a position to take the Vote.

DR. TANNER: As a matter of personal explanation allow me to say that throughout I have only spoken twice, and the record will show that altogether I only spoke for 4½ minutes.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): If the right hon. Gentleman wishes to make progress with his Estimates he must treat us in a different spirit. We might have legitimately continued the discussion on the previous Vote by a Motion for the reduction of his salary because he has taken action contrary to the recommendations of the Committee he himself appointed. My hon. Friend is perfectly justified in taking what opportunity he can for his discussion; such opportunities are now rare.

*SIR WALTER FOSTER (Derby, Ilkeston): May I make an appeal to the right hon. Gentleman to definitely fix some day for taking the Vote? If not this week, then let him say some day next week. It will be a great convenience to Members, many of whom are much interested in this Vote. I do not wish in any way to obstruct business, but will he, in the interest of the Army medical officers, say on what day the Vote will be taken?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am most anxious to consult the convenience of Members as far as I possibly can, but, as the hon. Gentleman is, no doubt, aware, the whole of this week is mapped out, and next week must depend upon the results of this. It is impossible for me to upset the whole arrangements for the sake of one specific Vote.

Question put, and agreed to.

Resolution to be reported to-morrow.

Committee also report Progress; to sit again to-morrow.

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL (MONEY)
BILL.—(No. 388.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Bill be now read a second time."

(12.0) MR. BAUMANN (Camberwell, Peckham): I appeal to the Government not to take this Bill at this hour. It is an important measure, which deals with a large sum of money, and it is impossible to discuss it adequately now.

*MR. H. W. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.): There is absolutely nothing contentious in this Bill. No question of principle is involved. It has received the assent of the Treasury, and I think it would not be wise to delay passing it.

(12.2.) THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): Perhaps I may be permitted to appeal to the hon. Member to allow the Bill to proceed. It follows the precedent of previous years, and the effect of stopping it would be to arrest all the improvements and works in the Metropolis sanctioned by Parliament. I appeal to my hon. Friend to withdraw his opposition. I will undertake that we shall have an opportunity in Committee, of discussing any questions he desires to raise.

MR. BAUMANN: I must explain. I have carefully read the Bill; I am afraid the Secretary to the Treasury has not.

MR. JACKSON: I beg the hon. Member's pardon. I have read every word.

MR. BAUMANN: Part of the Bill refers to the sanction—

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Member has already spoken.

Mr. W. H. Smith

*MR. BAUMANN: Not on a Motion to adjourn the Debate. The Bill refers to schemes for the coming year, which have not received the sanction of Parliament. I think it is most improper and most unreasonable on the part of the County Council and the Government to ask that the Bill shall at this hour of the night be read a second time without discussion. Half of the Bill deals with schemes for the coming year, which are of an extremely contentious nature, and which have not received the sanction of Parliament. Those Bills require discussing, and I, for one, object—

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is exceeding his rights. He has already spoken twice.

(12.5.) MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): No doubt the hon. Member feels it rather hard that the Bill should come on so unexpectedly, because he was unable to issue his customary Whip to hon. Members opposite against it. He has already defeated two of the Bills of the London County Council this Session, and no doubt he will defeat this if he can. But, after what the Secretary to the Treasury has said, hon. Members will approve of the Bill. The hon. Member for Peckham will have an opportunity in Committee of objecting to particular clauses. The largest portion of the measure refers to matters now being dealt with by the Council, and it is important that power should be given for continuing the works.

*(12.7.) SIR J. COLOMB (Tower Hamlets, Bow): I trust that my hon. Friend will not press his objection. Opportunity has been promised him for discussing the details in Committee, and I, therefore, hope he will allow the Bill to be read a second time.

*(12.8.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): If the Bill is not read a second time not a penny will be available next year for the Council to carry on the works which Parliament has sanctioned. Nothing but the pressure of business has prevented the Government dealing with the demands of the London County Council in a different manner from that proposed to day, but I hope early next Session to lay before the House a scheme dealing with the finance of the County Council, which will obviate the necessity of these annual Bills.

(12.9.) MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I think that my hon. Friend has not been treated very well. I sympathise with his view. I agree that the question is of great importance to Metropolitan Members, and we object to pass the Bill without discussion. Had this been an Irish Bill, and had hon. Members for Ireland objected to proceeding with it, the Government would have at once given way, but although we Metropolitan Members on this side are nearly as numerous as Irish Members opposite, they will not give way. I beg to move the adjournment of the Debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Bartley.)

(12.10.) MR. KELLY (Camberwell, N.): I support that. I contend that it is not fair that the metropolitan Members should be called upon to agree to the Second Reading of a Bill of this importance without some sort of discussion. I appeal to the Government to give us reasonable facilities for that.

*(12.11.) MR. W. H. SMITH: The Government would be exceedingly sorry to press the Bill on if it involved any new principle whatever. The work authorised by Parliament to be carried out by the County Council cannot be proceeded with unless this Bill is introduced. The County Council are not responsible for the Bill. Parliament has already sanctioned the work for which the Bill is designed, and, under the circumstances, I trust my hon. Friend will not think it necessary to persist in his Motion. He can gain his object better by examining the details of the Bill in Committee rather than by postponing the consideration of the measure.

*(12.14.) MR. H. W. LAWSON: The real motive for delaying the Bill is the jealous animosity against the London County Council.

MR. BAUMANN: I wish to ask, Sir, whether the hon. Gentleman is in order in imputing motives to hon. Members?

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman would do well to avoid imputing motives; neither is he addressing himself to the question of the adjournment of the Debate.

*MR. H. W. LAWSON: I am not wishing to impute any private motive; I am only suggesting that it is hostility to the County Council which prompts hon. Gentlemen opposite to oppose the Bill. I hold that there is no occasion for the House to discuss the details of the Bill. These have already been fully considered by the County Council, which is the proper body to deal with this business. The President of the Local Government Board has explained that next Session it is his intention to introduce a measure which will make such Bills as these unnecessary, and which will place the London County Council, so far as money matters are concerned, on the same footing as other Local Authorities. I repeat that no new principle is contained in this Bill, and that all the House has to do is to agree to the County Council raising money for its public works and administrative duties in the usual way.

(12.17.) MR. GOSCHEN: After the controversial speech just delivered, I think it is not likely that the Bill can be discussed in a business-like spirit, and it would be better that the House should accept the Motion for adjournment.

Dr. TANNER rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put;" but Mr. SPEAKER withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question.

Debate resumed.

(12.18.) MR. CAUSTON (Southwark): I had hoped that the Government would stand firm for once, and I was going to appeal to the First Lord of the Treasury to resist this attack on the London County Council. I think the House should divide, if only to protest against the spirit of hostility towards the County Council displayed by hon. Gentlemen opposite.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): Her Majesty's Ministers have declared that they are strongly opposed to the Motion for the adjournment, and I hope the House will now give them the opportunity of voting against it.

(12.20.) The House divided:—Ayes 111; Noes 98.—(Div. List, No. 197.)

DR. CLARK: On the question of the date on which this Bill is to be taken, might I ask that it be put down as the first Order, so that we may have the opportunity of discussing its principle?

MR. SEXTON: The majority of the House having expressed an opinion, I submit it is too late to proceed with any other business, and I beg to move the adjournment of the House.

*MR. SPEAKER: I do not regard that as a regular Motion. We must go through the Orders of the Day.

Debate to be resumed upon Thursday.

ST. GILES', EDINBURGH (RESTORATION) BILL.—(No. 118.)

Order for Second Reading read, and discharged.

Bill withdrawn.

TRUST COMPANIES BILL [LORDS].
(No. 226.)

Order for Second Reading read, and discharged.

Bill withdrawn.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

On the Motion for adjournment:—

MR. DILLON: Sir, I wish to ask the Government whether they will now give some definite statement as to when they will take the Report on the Vote for the Irish Land Commission. I have sat here night after night, on the understanding that I would get an opportunity of discussing this Vote. I would only ask the Government now to state definitely and clearly when they will give us the promised discussion on the Irish Land Commission. I do not think it fair to the House, after we facilitated the Government on a particular occasion, that we should be kept here night after night without any apparent effect.

MR. JACKSON: I am not able to say definitely, but I think it will be possible to find an early opportunity.

MR. CONYBEARE: What business will be taken at 12 o'clock?

MR. DILLON: On what night will they take it?

MR. E. HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.): I desire to put it to the Speaker whether it is convenient that Report of Supply should be put down simply with the dates attached, without specifying what the Report is upon.

*MR. SPEAKER: The Clerk at the Table, when Report is taken, immediately reads out the first Resolution.

MR. E. HARRINGTON: I listened, and I did not hear any Resolution read.

*MR. SPEAKER: That was because Report was not taken.

MR. E. HARRINGTON: I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I apologise for having needlessly raised the question.

SIR W. LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth): When will the Local Taxation Bill be brought in, and will the allocation of the money now passed be embodied in a fresh Bill?

MR. MARJORIBANKS (Berwickshire): The Post Office Vote will be taken to-morrow, I understand?

MR. JACKSON: Yes. The date is not definitely fixed when the Local Taxation Bill will be taken, but I believe the Amendment will be embodied in the Bill.

SIR W. LAWSON: When will we have it?

MR. JACKSON: I cannot say. Probably to-morrow.

House adjourned at twenty-five minutes before One o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Wednesday, 23rd July, 1890.

CENSUS [EXPENSES.]

(12.20.) Resolution [22nd July] reported.

"That it is expedient to authorise the payment, out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, of all expenses that may be incurred for the purposes of the Census under any Acts of the present Session for taking the Census of England and Wales, Scotland and Ireland."

Resolution agreed to.

PUBLIC WORKS LOANS [REMISSION.]

Resolution [22nd July] reported.

"That it is expedient to authorise the remission of a loan, made by the Commissioners of Public Works in Ireland in respect of Killeany Pier, in pursuance of any Act of the present Session relating to Local Loans."

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That this House doth agree with the Committee in the said Resolution."

(12.26.) SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I presume that it would be of no use seriously to oppose this Resolution, but I have heard no reason stated why it should be passed. Every year we are asked to throw good money after bad for the purpose of inducing the Irish people to submit to a disagreeable rule, and whenever we are asked to wipe off debts it is invariably Irish debts. I find that in this case it is exclusively Irish debts that are dealt with, and I, for one, do not concur in the Vote.

Question put, and agreed to.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—REVENUE DEPARTMENTS.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Motion made, and Question proposed.

"That a sum, not exceeding £4,898,551 (including a Supplementary sum of £50,000), be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1891, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Post Office Services, the Expenses of Post Office Savings Banks, and Government Annuities and Insurances, and the Collection of the Post Office Revenue."

VOL. CCCXLVII. [THIRD SERIES.]

(12.28.) SIR S. NORTHCOTE (Exeter) : In rising to move the reduction of this Vote I wish to explain that I desire to bring before the House the case of Mr. Cotton in connection with the invention of the system of postal orders, and to express my regret that my right hon. Friend the Postmaster General has not seen his way to lay upon the Table the Departmental correspondence between Mr. Cotton and the Post Office. In the absence of that correspondence I am compelled to refer to information which I have derived from Mr. Cotton himself, and from my hon. Friend the Member for Limehouse (Mr. Norris), who has also considered the subject, and who claims to be the inventor of the postal order system. Replying to me last year the Postmaster General stated that Mr. Cotton was not entitled to be regarded as the inventor of the postal order system ; but I believe that I shall be able to substantiate the claim of that gentleman from the records of the right hon. Gentleman's own Department. On the 19th of July, 1888, the Post Office wrote to Mr. Cotton, and stated that the earliest suggestion of any system of the kind could be traced to May, 1858, to a further communication in 1860, and to another in 1865, and that the suggestions then made were all considered and condemned. This is important, because it clears the ground so far as to make the year 1865 the starting point. As a matter of fact, Mr. Cotton's original invention was put forward in the year 1866, and although other inventions had been condemned, that of Mr. Cotton was not ; but was adopted, with certain modifications. I believe that the Post Office claim Mr. Chetwynd as the practical inventor in 1874 ; further that it was invented in 1868, submitted to the Post Office in 1871, and brought out in 1874. I am aware that in the case of public servants there would be some risk in drawing a line in regard to rewards for the improvement of the Public Service ; but I submit that in this case the invention of Mr. Cotton has been substantially adopted, and that it has resulted not only in a large increase of the Post Office revenue, but in adding to the convenience of the public. I shall be surprised and disappointed if the Postmaster General says that because the scheme was not adopted in its entirety, Mr. Cotton is to be debarred from any reward for the services he has rendered. I have some personal knowledge of Mr. Cotton, and I know that he was unwilling to bring forward his claim prematurely, or until the value of his invention had been ascertained. But we have now had some years experience of the value of the invention, and when the Postmaster General informed me last year that he could hold out no hope of Mr. Cotton's claim being recognised, seeing the late period of the Session at which the announcement was made, I did not feel justified in pressing it. I undertook, however, to do so this year, and as the reply of my right hon. Friend to a question which I put to him was unfavourable, I feel that I have no alternative but to move the reduction of the salary of the Postmaster General by the sum of £50.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That Item A be reduced by £50, part of the salary of the Postmaster General."
 —(Sir Stafford Northcote.)

*(12.35.) MR. NORRIS (Tower Hamlets, Limehouse): I feel bound to speak upon this question, although, personally, I would far rather have left the whole matter in the hands of the Postmaster General. I must express my surprise that my hon. Friend thinks it necessary to move a reduction of the right hon. Gentleman's salary, as one would imagine the course taken by the Postmaster General has been the best to safeguard the purse-strings of the nation. So far as Mr. Cotton's claim is concerned, I believe I am correct in saying that there is no record of it in the Post Office. The real inventor of the postal order system is a Member of this House. The proposal was made by me in 1874—16 years ago—to the then Postmaster General, and my letter advocating the system as now in use is to be found in the records of the Post Office. As there is no previous record of the same kind, I think I am right in assuming that I was the first individual who brought the matter under the consideration of the Post Office in its present shape. My proposal was that the Office should issue postal orders for small amounts in the form of Post Office coupons, to be paid, in the case of small sums, on the day they were received, and if they exceeded a certain amount, on the day following. That coupons should be issued for 1s., 2s., 2s. 6d., 5s., and 10s., with a halfpenny stamp for all sums under £1, and with a poundage rate for sums above £1. My letter containing that proposal was sent in 1874, and I received a reply which I forwarded to the Times, to which paper I think the public are extremely indebted, because without the intervention of the Times and other papers I have no hesitation in saying that the postal order system would never have been adopted. The Bullionist and many other newspapers took up the proposal, and eventually it was considered by a Committee and a decision arrived at. It may be said that it was a small invention, but it will be admitted that it was a happy inspiration. We all know and believe that Rowland Hill was not the first proposer of the penny postage system. But although it may have been proposed by some one else, he was the man who brought it to bear upon the public mind and succeeded in securing its adoption. Notwithstanding the fact that the postal order system brings in to the Government a revenue of no less than £146,000 a year, I have no desire to ask for anything like pecuniary recognition; but as the actual inventor of the system, I shall be glad to have the good opinion of my fellow Members in this House, and a kindly recognition of my services. I hold in my hand a pamphlet, published with the cognisance of the authorities of the Post Office, stating the whole circumstances of the case up to the present moment, and it is very much against my own inclination that I should have considered it my duty to speak upon the matter at all. As I have already said, I would have much preferred to leave myself in the hands of the Postmaster General. I thank the hon. Baronet (Sir S. Northcote) for the kindly terms in which he has alluded to me. I am sure that in his own mind he feels that I have had most to do with an invention which to the outside world has been of such great importance and advantage. I will conclude by stating that the then Postmaster General, in introducing the measure to this House, advocated and supported the scheme as since adopted, by quoting an article from the Bullionist, which referred to and commended my proposal alone, and which is identically the present system of postal orders.

*(12.47.) THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, University of Cambridge): I have no doubt that my hon. Friend who has moved the Amendment is actuated by the most kindly feelings towards myself, but although I do not take exception to the Motion upon personal grounds, I confess that I do not see why the salary of the Postmaster General in 1890 should be attacked because a person who claims to have invented postal orders in 1866 has not received the reward which he considers to be due for his services. As a matter of fact, I have no more connection with the matter than any other hon. Member of this House. I have done my best to see that proper inquiry should be made respecting the claim of Mr. Cotton, and I must say that if every hon. Member who happens to number among his constituents an inventor is to demand that the merits of that individual ought to be recognised, the whole time of the House might be occupied in discussing claims of this kind. My hon. Friend the Member for Limehouse, in a speech the modesty of which we must all recognise, has put forward, shortly, his claim to be the inventor of the postal order system. I do not myself pretend to award the palm either to this or any other claimant that may come forward, but I think the Committee will agree with me that the hon. Member for Limehouse has made out quite as good a case as the hon. Member for Exeter (Sir S. Northcote) has made out for Mr. Cotton. The scheme of Mr. Cotton was that notes should be issued to the public from the post offices of the United Kingdom for sums not exceeding £1 in such a way as might be found most convenient without any further charge than a nominal sum, such notes to be paid in specie, provided that the payee affixed a postage stamp and wrote his name across it. That may be alleged to have been the germ of the postal order system, but I am afraid that even the suggestion of Mr. Cotton in this respect was anticipated. Certainly, in 1858, and even so far back as 1840, there are to be found in the archives of the Post Office letters in which some sort of scheme for the issue of postal notes was suggested. I do not think, therefore, that Mr. Cotton can be regarded as the original inventor of the system now in vogue. The system differs very materially from that of Mr. Cotton, which practically amounted to a small paper currency. In the first place, the postal order is not a permanent note, as Mr. Cotton's would have been, but one which only lasts for a certain time; in the next place, it is payable to order; and, in the third, the signature is not required. Indeed, it would have been impossible for anyone, who was not familiar with the practice of the Post Office, to have framed the present system for the issue of postal orders. The hon. Member for Limehouse has certainly as complete a claim as any that can be put forward by Mr. Cotton to be regarded as the inventor of the system, although, no doubt, Mr. Cotton, as a Devonshire man, was not unlikely to find favour in the eyes of the late Lord Idlesleigh, who was, as we know, a most amiable man, and not least so towards Devonians. I trust that my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter will be satisfied with having called attention to the subject.

(12.52.) SIR S. NORTHCOTE: I am afraid that the only satisfaction I have obtained is that of a combatant, who has received a severe blow, and is asked if he has not had enough. I have no wish, however, to prolong the discussion, and I am sorry to inflict any annoyance upon my right hon. Friend. He says that Mr. Cotton suggested no machinery for carrying out his invention, but I think he will find that a distinct scheme was laid down for the issue of notes for varying amounts. I, therefore, cannot admit that the scheme was not one which was set out in sufficient detail to warrant consideration, which, I am sorry to say, it has not received at the hands of the Post Office Authorities. I am afraid that I shall be compelled to press the Amendment to a Division.

Ayes 13; Noes 103.—(Div. List, No. 198.)

Original Question again proposed.

*(1.1.) MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I desire to make a few observations with reference to the relations between the Postmaster General and the subordinate servants of the Post Office. I think it is high time those relations were reviewed by this House. The subject to which I wish especially to direct attention is the issue of a certain Rule by the Postmaster General with the view of regulating the meetings of postmen on questions in which they are interested. According to an answer which the right hon. Gentleman gave me a few days ago, what has been done has been to relax a Rule of the Service on the subject of meetings outside the Post Office, not to make it more stringent, the conditions on which Post Office servants are now allowed to meet being that ample notice shall be given to the Local Post Office Authority that the meeting will be held and where, that the meeting shall be confined to Post Office servants directly interested, and that an official shorthand writer shall be present if desired by the Authorities. The old Rule to which the right hon. Gentleman refers forbid, on pain of dismissal, the holding by officers of any Department of any meeting beyond the walls of the Post Office for the discussion of official questions. Now, the existence of that Rule was entirely unknown to many heads of the Department. It was made by Lord Stanley of Alderley so long ago as 1866. A great deal has happened since then. In the first place, the legal position of Trade Unions has been greatly altered by legislation; and, in the next place, there has been a still greater change of public opinion as to the right of labour to combine to promote its own interests. An appeal to a rule of this kind promulgated a quarter of a century ago, and which has become a dead letter, is a remarkable instance of Rip Van Winkleism in high places. Had the right hon. Gentleman altogether denied the right of Post Office servants to combine, we could have understood his position, although, of course, we should have differed from it. But the right hon. Gentleman has conceded to Post Office servants the right of combination, and at the same time he has attached to its exercise conditions which make it futile and nugatory. The presence of a shorthand writer is calculated and designed for purposes of espionage and terror. I challenge him to deny that assertion. I am perfectly ready to admit that these combinations do at times impose very considerable inconvenience upon employers, and will, no doubt, impose inconvenience upon the Post Office; but we cannot draw distinctions between servants of the State and servants of a private employer. Some hon. Members may say that these are Departmental Orders with which the House ought not to interfere. With some Departmental Orders undoubtedly we should not; but where they infringe the ordinary rights of labour, I claim that we have a right to express an opinion. There is nothing sacrosanct about Government Departments. If a Department goes into trade it must be subject to the conditions and inconveniences of ordinary employments. There is one other subject personal to the Postmaster General to which I wish to call attention. It relates to the Savings Bank Department, in which there have been great changes lately, changes which, to a portion of the Staff, have given great dissatisfaction. A little while ago some 70 officers addressed a respectful Memorial to the right hon. Gentleman. They waited upwards of a month, and there was no reply; they then sent in a second Memorial and waited a week or 10 days. Having received no answer, they requested me to put a question in that House. I did so, and the right hon. Gentleman said he hoped the answer then given would relieve him from the necessity of giving an answer to the memorialists. In the course which the right hon. Gentleman has taken he has departed from the practice of his predecessors, and to some extent has forgotten the traditions of the Civil Service. As an old Civil servant, I always understood that not only have Civil servants a right to memorialise the head of their Department, but as a matter of courtesy they have a right to a reply. This instance is one of several which have come to my knowledge in which the right hon. Gentleman has not shown that courtesy and consideration to those whom the fortune of the day has made his subordinates which has been usually shown by the political chiefs of a great Department. We all recognise the courtesy of demeanour of the right hon. Gentleman in this House, but the obligation of courtesy is perhaps even more incumbent on the holder of high office towards those who happen to be his subordinates. As an old Civil servant I can tell him there is no body of men in the world who more appreciate courtesy and consideration, and I regret that the right hon. Gentleman seems to have forgotten traditions which in the past have been a distinguishing characteristic of the Service. There is one other matter to which I wish to refer. We know that as a consequence of the recent strike of postmen a number of those public servants were dismissed. I am not going to argue whether they were rightly or wrongly discharged, but I do desire to emphasise what appeared in a letter by Mr. Shipton as to the grovelling language used in a Memorial sent to the right hon. Gentleman a week or two ago by a number of the postmen asking to be reinstated. That is a very humiliating incident, because it is impossible not to draw the conclusion that such language was used simply because it was believed that it would be acceptable to the authorities of the Post Office. I am at a loss to determine which presents the more humiliating spectacle—the men who use such language, or the authorities who encourage the use of it. I beg to move the reduction of the salary of the Postmaster General by £100.

Motion made, and Question proposed.
 "That Item A be reduced by £100, part of the Salary of the Postmaster General."
 —(Mr. Pickersgill.)

*(1.17.) MR. RAIKES: I had hoped that other hon. Members who were disposed to follow on the same side would have done so, because it would be convenient that the speeches of hon. Members on the points raised should not be interrupted by more than one speech of my own. But, as no one has risen, I think it would be most respectful to the Committee not to delay my answer to several of the observations of the hon. Member who has just sat down. I do not at all deny that the question of the regulations in respect to meetings of official persons to discuss official questions is a difficult one. When I approached the question at the beginning of the present year in the Post Office, I found in existence the Regulation of 1866, to which the hon. Member has referred, and which sought to solve the difficulty by simply prohibiting any such meetings outside the Post Office buildings. By that Regulation the employés of the Office could only hold meetings on official questions in the building under the immediate supervision of the authorities. The hon. Member pointed out that the Regulation dated so far back as 1866. I quite agree with the hon. Member when he says that a great deal has happened since that Regulation was adopted. For instance, since then Post Office servants have become voters at elections, which of necessity gives them a claim to a freer hand in regard to meetings to discuss their grievances. I consequently rescinded Lord Stanley of Alderley's Rule, and the result of the new Regulations I introduced is that the Post Office employés can meet when they like and where they like. There is no dictation as to time, or place, or subject. But while giving to the servants of the Department this much greater latitude in the discussion of their own affairs, I could not forget that these affairs were also the affairs of the Department and of the nation in whose service they are. Accordingly, it seemed to me, that in order to keep such discussion within reasonable and legitimate bounds, it was desirable to lay down three conditions, which appear to the hon. Member to be very onerous, namely, that the men should give notice of any meeting they propose to hold; that the discussion at the meeting shall be confined to official persons, and shall be attended only by those official persons who are directly interested; and that the Department shall have a shorthand writer present, so that an authentic report of what takes place may be obtained. As to the latter condition, such meetings are often improperly and inaccurately reported by the newspapers, as hon. Members must know. Exaggerated and very untrue statements with reference to the relations between the authorities and the men have often been published, unfairly prejudicing and poisoning the public mind; and the authorities have been left without trustworthy means of knowing whether the statements reported were really made, or the language described as used was really uttered. So far from the presence of the shorthand writer being required for the purposes of espionage, it is no less a protection to the men than a means of information to the authorities, and I challenge the hon. Member to mention a case in which the presence of a short-hand writer at a meeting has led to the punishment of a man. The hon. Member must know, if he has followed the case at all, that much of the language which has been indulged in at those meetings has been, to say the least, of an unrestrained character; but not a single person has suffered for it. The experience of the last few weeks has shown how wise is the condition laid down that these meetings shall be confined to the public servants interested in them. No one can now be more sensible of this than the unfortunate men who, influenced by professional agitators, were unwise enough to go out on strike, and have thus placed themselves in a most painful position. I have been told that I have conceded the right of combination, but have attached conditions to it which made it nugatory. I will say frankly that I cannot admit that servants of the State stand on precisely the same footing as the servants of a private employer as regards combination. I have said, and will adhere to it, that the men are free to form an association and to act together for their mutual benefit and to discuss matters of interest to them, but I have never conceded, and never will concede as long as I have the honour to hold the office I do, that they have any right to form any association the object of which is to supersede the authority of Parliament and the Government in fixing the conditions of labour in the Public Service. The men engaged in the Post Office have many advantages. They receive an increasing salary, the advantage of sick pay, and a holiday annually on full pay. The postmen have the additional advantage of a uniform, and there is, also, the very important advantage of a comfortable pension at the end of service. They have, moreover, constant employment, independent of the vicissitudes of trade, and the honour of serving the Crown in a service which, up to the present time, has been conspicuous for its high character and popularity. On the other hand, the Post Office servant is simply called upon to submit to a certain and comparatively trifling amount of restraint in his action as a consequence of the service he is in—a restraint which is absolutely necessary. I have not had an opportunity of saying to my friends the postmen, but I shall do so when I have it, that if I were in the habit of using the sort of language about the head of the Government which they have indulged in with regard to myself I should not long occupy my present position in the service of the State. But, apart from this question of oratorical license, it is absolutely impossible to allow the government of any Department to be delegated to any irresponsible body if the service of the State is to be carried on without liability to collapse at any particular moment by a combination of a certain number of men insisting on more wages or less duty, who might thereby cripple the whole service of the Department, and bring that part of the business of the country to a standstill. I therefore say, freely and frankly, that while I express no opinion as to the ordinary rights of Trades Unions in regard to ordinary questions as between employer and employed, it is impossible for the Government to recognise the interference of such bodies in the relations between the State and its servants. With regard to another matter which has been brought forward by the hon. Member, I should be extremely sorry if it were supposed for a moment that with regard to the 70 petitioners to whom he referred I have been guilty of any intentional discourtesy towards either him or the memorialists.

MR. PICKERSGILL*: I did not say there was any discourtesy towards myself.

MR. RAIKES*: What I have done has been done, I believe, in strict accordance with the precedent which has been established by those who preceded me in Office. I believe that when Memorials come pouring in, all of them requiring the same things, or things very similar, to what have been previously urged, an answer given to one Memorial has been allowed to stand as an answer to the subsequent Memorials. I may state that the heads of the Department have had these matters under their careful consideration, and one of them has been in constant communication with the Treasury upon the subject, and the result of what has hitherto been done has been that the great majority of the employés affected by the new scales are more than satisfied with them ; in fact, I have received the thanks of a large majority of those persons. I am anxious, as far as I can, to meet the memorialists' views without injury to the Public Service, but as long as all the details are not finally adjusted it will not be in my power to deal with the matter finally. The hon. Member has referred to one other matter which I do not think quite germane to the subject under discussion. He has spoken of what he has called the grovelling language used in their Petitions by some of the men who went out on strike the other day, and who have sought to be taken back again, and he has said that this language showed the painful relations which existed between them and the Department, when they were under the impression that the use of such language would be welcomed. Who is responsible for this? Over and over again have I, in reply to Petitions sent to me by Mr. Mahon, who professed to speak on behalf of the Postal Union, and who is no more a postal servant than the hon. Member for Camborne, been obliged to state that we could not recognise him as an intermediary between the Postmaster General and the postmen. It would be an intolerable state of things if we were expected to give recognition to the interference of men of that description, who live by agitation, and whose life is spent in fanning the embers of discontent among various classes of workmen. If any one is responsible for such estrangement as has taken place it is those who have incited these poor men against their employers by denouncing those employers and painting them in the blackest colours, and thus leading the men to form altogether erroneous views with regard to the action of those employers. In conclusion, I have only to say that we have merely touched the fringe of this question as regards the particular objections put forward by the hon. Gentleman opposite. I do not wish to take exception to the terms of his speech, but I would add, before sitting down, that I recognise with gratitude the great forbearance shown generally by hon. Members opposite in refraining from interfering with the action of the Government, thus enabling us to bring a great Service through a trying ordeal without any great loss at a most critical moment, and with, I trust, every prospect of a successful and prosperous future.

*(1.37.) SIR E. J. REED (Cardiff) : I fully agree with those who regard this subject as one of great difficulty and delicacy, but, at the same time, having listened to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, I cannot help feeling that he is making a mistake which has been made on former occasions, namely, the mistake of looking too intently on one side of the question and neglecting altogether the other side. Several remarks have fallen from the right hon. Gentleman which have taken me by surprise. For instance, when the right hon. Gentleman enumerated the advantages which were possessed by the civil servants of the country he pointed out that their salary increases in a regular proportion, but I venture to say that the present disturbed condition of the Postal Service, over which the right hon. Gentleman presides, has arisen to a great extent from his own arbitrary interference with the increase of the men's pay, and also from the way in which, in some cases, he has treated the men not as servants who had rights of their own but as servile beings, almost in the position of slaves, while the men who, according to him, are entitled to steady increase of salary, have suffered deprivations of salary for no fault of their own.

MR. ISAACSON (Stepney) : What have they been deprived of?

SIR E. J. REED : I am willing to answer that question, but you, Mr. Courtney, have ruled that I cannot bring the Cardiff case in, although when we come to the proper Vote I shall be able to give a detailed account of those who have suffered, and who are still suffering, from the right hon. Gentleman's arbitrary violation of his own principle. The right hon. Gentleman makes a great point of the fact that it is a serious matter for the postal servants of the country to appeal to Members of this House for their consideration, and he asks, Why do they not go to him? I can give the right hon. Gentleman an answer to the question, derived from a practical experience of the work of the postmen of the great town which I have the privilege of representing. I do not hesitate to say that representations made from the town I represent, concerning the inadequate administration of the Postal Department there, have had no weight at all, and I have here a letter from the right hon. Gentleman himself, in which he recognises the fact that the representations previously made had been unavailing. Perhaps the Committee will allow me to read that letter, so far as it relates to this point.

*MR. RAIKES: I do not think the matter referred to by the hon. Gentleman is one that should be brought before the Committee at this stage, as it has no relation to the subject which is under discussion.

*SIR E. J. REED: I do not propose to discuss this point now. I am merely desirous of answering the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. I have to say that the postal business in the town of Cardiff was left in a disgraceful state for a long period, and it is owing to that condition that very much of the agitation has arisen. The merchants and traders of the town got no attention until they obtained the intervention of their Member. It will not do for the right hon. Gentleman to condemn the servants of the Post Office because they appeal to others, because this agitation would have arisen among the merchants of the town in consequence of the condition of the Postal Service. I sympathise with the right hon. Gentleman very much indeed in some of his observations. I can imagine that it must be very distressing and objectionable for the head of a Department to have men who are not in that Department at all making their representations to him concerning the service of the employés of that Department. I agree very warmly with his general proposition, namely, that the Service of the State is an exceptional Service, and I am sorry to say that, for the last six months, I have observed on the part of the employés of the Post Office, and of gentlemen serving under the right hon. Gentleman, a too ready disposition to exhibit absolute independence in their action. But the answer is this: In these days if you want to claim authority over your employés you must consider them, and fulfil your obligations as well as calling upon them to fulfil theirs. I venture to say that nearly all the trouble that has happened under the right hon. Gentleman's recent administration has arisen from the fact that the right hon. Gentleman does not recognise his obligations to the servants of the Department, while he insists upon their obligations. The right hon. Gentleman, for instance, referred to the obsolete rule introduced by Lord Stanley in 1866, and he seemed to think it a rather virtuous and meritorious concession that he did not enforce that rule. That regulation was a positive and ridiculous absurdity. Under the terms of that regulation half a dozen employés could not discuss at the dinner table of one of them the question of their salaries and the conditions of their service without incurring the risk of punishment by the authorities. Is that a reasonable state of things? When the right hon. Gentleman denies that a reporter was used to take shorthand notes for the purposes of espionage, and when he challenges my hon. Friend to produce any case in which a man has been punished because of the Report of a shorthand writer, I can only say I should have been very much surprised if anyone had been punished before this Debate occurred, or before the close of this Session of Parliament. But I will show, when we come to the Telegraph Vote, that men have been punished not because the Department was in any possession of any knowledge—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! It is extremely irregular and very inconvenient to make assertions in respect to another Vote before that Vote has been reached.

*SIR E. J. REED: I only referred to it to justify the statement I make. I must confine myself to saying generally on that question that men are punished by the Postal Authorities not because of what the Authorities know but because of what they suspect. That, Sir, I believe is within the limits of my knowledge. I cannot help thinking that, in the interest of the right hon. Gentleman himself, as well as the interests of the Postal Service, it should be understood that there is a very great deal of justifiable dissatisfaction with the present administration. It arises from the fact, in my opinion, that while the Postmaster General realises in the fullest and intensest manner the obligation of subordination and other obligations of the servants under him, he does not recognise, in anything like a proper degree or in a proper manner, his obligations to the servants of the Department.

(1.50.) MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): Sir, I am delighted that an interruption I made towards the close of the right hon. Gentleman's apology galvanised into something like energy the somewhat limp Postmaster General.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The hon. Member must refrain from making these irritating and unnecessary observations.

MR. CONYBEARE: I had not the smallest desire to cause irritation to the Postmaster General when I interrupted him. Therefore, I at once withdraw the un-Parliamentary expression.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

MR. CONYBEARE: Well, Sir, the Postmaster General, in somewhat strong language, denounced the professional agitators who have incited these unfortunate subordinates into something like open rebellion. It becomes my duty, having had something to do with that movement (though not as a professional agitator), which the right hon. Gentleman denounced in such unsparing terms, to explain something of the condition of things which led to the formation of the Postmen's Union. The Postmaster General would have the House believe that but for outside incitement everything would have gone on inside the Post Office as merrily as the proverbial marriage bells; just as it is said of Ireland, that there would have been no discontent in Ireland but for the professional agitators. But in the Post Office there has been an extraordinary growth of well-founded discontent, which sprang up spontaneously and without any outside encouragement whatever, and which resulted in the movement to which we are now directing our attention. The right hon. Gentleman, judging from his caustic observations with reference to my humble self, may think that I had something to do with the origination of the movement. I can assure him if that is his view he is purely and absolutely mistaken. This movement originated in September of last year, when I was under lock and key across St. George's Channel. The formation of the Postmen's Union was due to the manner in which the right hon. Gentleman punished Tom Dredge, who took the lead in pressing the claims of his fellows. It was not an actual agitation, but was conducted according to the rule within the walls of the Post Office. Tom Dredge was summarily dismissed. Following the example of the dock labourers the postmen determined to form a Union. The first thing that happened to me when I reached Euston, after my incarceration, was to receive a request from the Postmen's Union to become their Treasurer. I accepted the position without hesitation, knowing something of their objects. But when I went away in the winter, I advised them to obtain the services of some one else, as I could not perform the duties of the office. That is the only connection I ever had with the Postmen's Union. The great stress of the right hon. Gentleman's attack is against a gentleman I know, and whom the right hon. Gentleman denounces, and stigmatises on every possible occasion as a professional agitator. I should like to challenge the right hon. gentleman to prove his statement. This gentleman, Mr. Mahon, with two others, was appealed to by the postmen themselves quite spontaneously. He and two others had been engaged for years past, not in professional agitation, but in assisting their fellow workers, men of their own occupation, to fight the battle of labour, as they, as citizens of a free country, had every right to do. I will tell the right hon. Gentleman why Mr. Mahon and the others were appealed to. It was deliberately and specifically stated by the men that they did not dare to form a Union themselves and to place members of their own body in a prominent position on it, because the moment they did so they would incur the wrath of the right hon. Gentleman, and would immediately suffer penalties. I dare say the right hon. Gentleman will say their fears were unfounded. I tell him they were not. It is perfectly notorious that the very placing of these men in a prominent position as leaders of the movement was quite sufficient to bring about their dismissal. The movement went on without much attention being paid to it until the spring of this year, and in April the right hon. Gentleman found it necessary to try and crush the Union. He found, I suppose, that it was making too much headway. He pretended, in the first place, that he was anxious to relax rules which interfered with the open and free action of the men, and he gave out more than once in this House, and elsewhere, that he was so anxious to give fair-play to the men that he would allow them to meet when and where they liked, and would allow them to form themselves into a Union. But the right hon. Gentleman was careful to establish certain new regulations which he would have us believe in no respect restricted the freedom of action of the men. They were told that notice should be given of the time and place of any meeting held by the men, and no strangers were to be admitted to the meetings, and that an official reporter, representing the right hon. Gentleman, should be present. I believe the second of these regulations was directly intended to strike at the root of the existence of the Postmen's Union altogether. It is idle to say that one of the postmen could undertake the multifarious and burdensome duties of General Secretary. The time of a postman is so taken up by his duties that he has practically no spare time. Therefore, the men rightly resented this restriction, and said truly that it rendered absolutely nugatory the supposed new concession on the part of the Postmaster General. Mr. Mahon was appointed to the post of General Secretary by a ballot of the Union. It is not true that he forced himself into it against their will, and it is not true that he has no title to represent the men. It may be very convenient for the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General to decline to recognise the right of the men to appoint whom they please as their General Secretary. But if he recognises the principle of Trades Unionism at all he should recognise that this man was appointed by the ballot of the Trades Unionists. The man has offered to resign his position, but has been forced to continue in it, for the reason that the postmen cannot put in one of themselves, every man fearing the result of taking such a prominent position.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): How much does he get?

Mr. Conybeare

MR. CONYBEARE: The position of this officer, as well as that of every officer connected with the Postmen's Union, is set forth in the rules I hold in my hand. I shall be happy to present a copy to the hon. Member for Northampton, and he can examine it at his leisure. There is nothing to conceal in this matter. With regard to the official reporters, I have used an expression at times which may be taken to be offensive. I have described them as spies. But that is a word we have been accustomed to use in describing official reporters in Ireland, and I do not see why the phrase should be any more offensive when used on this side of the water. I do not propose to use that language now, though I think that, in view of the facts, I should be justified in doing so. The right hon. Gentleman would have us believe that the presence of these official reporters at postmen's meetings is for nothing more against the interests of the men than merely to obtain an accurate record of what passes for the information of the Postmaster General, who is interested, as well as the men, in the welfare of the Service. Well, it is true that he and they are equally interested in the welfare and prosperity of the Service. So are we all. But the right hon. Gentleman's methods of improving that prosperity and general welfare will not in history redound to his credit. Instead of seeking that prosperity and general welfare by encouraging contentment amongst the men, he has done everything in his power to produce the maximum of discontent and friction between the different officers of the Post Office and the employés. The only object of sending these reporters to the meetings of the men is to enable the officials to bring the men up for punishment. At a meeting of postmen held in Hyde Park, a certain official reporter was coerced into acting as a spy, by being told that he would be turned out of his place if he did not, and, in consequence, men were identified, and a number of postmen in the E.C. District were reduced and suspended. The disturbance which occurred at the meeting when this man was recognised has been greatly exaggerated in the Press. There is ample justification, if justification were wanted, to prove the injustice of the rule relating to the employment of these official reporters. All this has been done by the right hon. Gentleman in his determination to crush the movement which the men have, in their own interests, thought necessary. I, myself, although I have had no official connection with the movement, at the request of the men, attended more than one meeting, and I can say that the men did not recklessly rush into a strike, in order to advance impossible claims and dislocate the whole Postal Service, but that they acted with the greatest reasonableness and moderation. It is entirely untrue that the Executive of the Union incited or intimidated the men into this movement, and there is no ground for the monstrous insinuation to that effect made by the hon. Baronet the Member for the City of London (Sir R. Fowler). There is no ground for such an unmanly and cowardly suggestion (though I do not apply those phrases to anyone in the House) against men who are as worthy of respect and consideration as the hon. Baronet himself. There was no attempt on the part of the Executive, or anyone outside the Union, to intimidate the men, or get them to join the Union. All the intimidation and coercion came from the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General, as I am in a position to prove. The meeting which I attended at the Holborn Town Hall, was attended by something like 1,500 postmen, and the whole object of the meeting, at which Mr. G. Shipton was present, was to take the decision of the postmen themselves as to what should be their course, and what instruction they should issue to their Executive Committee in view of the crisis which had then arisen. The attitude of the men was determined and enthusiastic, and the advice given by Mr. Mahon, as representing the Executive Committee, was not in any sense in the direction of inciting the men; the whole tendency of it was to find out the gravity of the situation and the risk they ran. For my own part, I only advised them that if they had to strike, they should not do so unless they could bring out all their men, and it was owing to the neglect of that advice that the movement, unfortunately, failed. [Laughter.] You may laugh, but even right hon. and hon. Gentlemen on the opposite side of the House are occasionally known to make mistakes. Even the Ministry have been known to make mistakes, and not so very long ago either. At this meeting, Mr. George Shipton, representing the London Trades Council, made a speech, and, as is well known, the whole object of his presence at the meeting was to bring about some conciliatory method of ending the dispute, and a resolution was formulated and enthusiastically passed by the men to the effect that they should hold their hands until the result was known of communication with the Postmaster General, in consequence of the intervention of the London Trades Council. The truce was to last 12 days, provided that the right hon. Gentleman did not force more active measures upon the men in the interval, by endeavouring to coerce them by a large introduction of supernumerary labour. That same evening, I reported what had taken place at the meeting to the right hon. Gentleman, and all I got was that I was assailed with what I must call abuse from that Bench. Abuse does not affect me, as I know it is only indulged in by Ministers of the Crown when their case is so wretchedly weak that they have not a single good argument to advance for the defence. The way the conciliatory and reasonable attitude of the men was met by the right hon. Gentleman was this. He at once proceeded to draft into all the offices a number of supernumeraries and outsiders whom we call blacklegs, which name the right hon. Gentleman objects to, but the phrase is only like such phrases as "boycott," "emergency men," or "Government spies," which have found their way into modern politics. Therefore, I shall continue to use the expression if I find it necessary. These words were introduced not for the purpose of overtaking the work which the dismissal or suspension of regular hands made it imperative to overtake, but there were more supernumerary hands taken on in the different post offices than the number of men dismissed or suspended. There was no excuse for the employment of these blacklegs. The object of the right hon. Gentleman was fitly shadowed forth by the declaration which Sir Stevenson Blackwood attempted to get the men to sign in the E.C. district—a declaration to the effect that they would not strike, and binding them against the assertion of their rights if it became necessary by the only means in their power. Sir S. Blackwood wanted to make this declaration general, but afterwards he was induced to limit it to the 21st July, that being the last day of the truce decided on at the Holborn meeting, as the last day on which to expect some result from the intervention of Mr. George Shipton and the London Trades Council. The men naturally refused to bind themselves by any such idiotic declaration. They said they would do so if the number of supernumeraries was not increased up to that date, and if the additional men who had been employed were dismissed. That was a very reasonable proviso, because what the Postmaster General was seeking to do was to introduce as many men as possible from outside, whom he could train in the elementary work that was to be done, and whom he could put in the places of the regular hands at the moment which seemed most fitting. That was not fair fighting. In the case of a great dispute between employer and employed, when there was a recognised issue between the two, care should have been taken to avoid all mean underhanded methods, for, after all, the men, however misguided they may have been, were not criminals. At the best it must be admitted that these men are very poorly paid, that they have inordinately long hours, that they have grievances which they have sought by the only means in their power to get rectified. It was not the Executive of the Union that forced this strike on the men. The men themselves declared for it by overwhelming majorities. If they did not succeed I will not say it was not to some extent their fault, and circumstances also may have been against them. At any rate, they were not coerced into it. What the Executive did was to carry out the instructions given by a practically unanimous vote, and it would have been practically impossible for the Executive to have acted otherwise than they did. The right hon. Gentleman has chosen to draw a distinction between members of the Civil Service and others who may be employed in any work outside. The right hon. Gentleman says he would not favour the formation of the men into a Union under him. Judging from the experience we have had of his iron régime, I should say that if unionism is justifiable under a private employer it is infinitely more so under the employment of a great State Department. May I just advert for a moment to the incidents of the great strike week, to show how the right hon. Gentleman exercised the irresistible power of the State for the purpose of crushing down these unfortunate men? On the day when he apprehended a strike the Post Office was crammed with policemen to protect the non-union men and to intimidate those who were union men. There was no necessity for the presence of these policemen, as there was no violence on this occasion at St. Martin's-le-Grand. I maintain that civil servants ought to be allowed to exercise the ordinary rights of citizens, and to form themselves into Unions. I believe it is far more imperative for them to combine for mutual protection than for the servants of a private firm to do so. The statement of the right hon. Gentleman, that he has always preferred to listen to the representations made by the men themselves, but that he will listen to no representations made by others on their behalf, whether in this House or elsewhere, is a new doctrine, which I feel it my duty to protest against. I say that the men in the Post Office, or in any other Government Service, have a perfect right to apply to their Representatives in Parliament, if they choose to do so, to bring their case before the Government, either in this House or elsewhere. We know that it is almost impossible for men in Public Departments to get their grievances redressed except through the advocacy of those who occupy superior positions, whether as Members of this House or otherwise, and I say the men are perfectly justified, especially when they know that representations made by themselves never reach the fountain head, but are stopped by subordinate officials, in putting their cases before the Members of this House, and obtaining the services of those Members if they can do so. (242.)

(3.3.) MR. ISAACSON: I was in hopes that the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General, in making his statement to the Committee, would have told us that those postmen who went out on strike a few days ago had been reinstated. They presented a Petition to the right hon. Gentleman, pointing out how they were induced to go out, in fact forced to go out, by intimidation.

There is no doubt they were intimidated, and in many instances were in fear of their lives if they did not join the strike. What is their present position? It is scarcely possible that these men, having to support their families, can have saved much from their wages, and the result must be that they, their wives, and families must be in extreme straits from want of the weekly wage. The position of these men is, no doubt, brought about by the influence of paid agitators, who had nothing to do with Post Office work. What would be said by any employer of labour, say the managers of a bank, if they found their clerks employing paid agitators to represent their cause, if they were dissatisfied, to their employers, and using intimidation? Certainly, such interference in such a movement would be at once repudiated, and I do not see that any less stringent measures can be adopted in an important Public Department like the Post office. Anxious as we all may be to do what we can for these officials, we cannot but look with severity on the conduct of those who, for a very slight cause, conspired to stop the Postal Service of this vast Metropolis. There is no difficulty in obtaining men for the Service, and there are far more applications than there are posts to fill, and though the wages may appear low, there is the advantage of a pension at the end of their working career. I certainly was amazed to hear the hon. Baronet the Member for Cardiff speak of dissatisfaction among the postmen engaged at Cardiff. Probably I know as much of Cardiff and Newport as most Members in this House, and certainly I have always thought the Postal Service in those towns was very satisfactory. Postmen undoubtedly have, in some instances, long hours, and the lower grades are not remarkably well paid, but there is this to be said, that the work is continuous—they are not thrown out of employment, as is the case in many other occupations, from depression of trade. The Committee should remember that the present Postmaster General has had more difficulties to contend with, through the introduction of Post Office reforms, than any previous head of the Department. The Parcel Post has been introduced during his time, and this, I know, caused a great derangement of business.

THE CHAIRMAN: The Motion before the Committee is one for the reduction of the Postmaster's salary, and the hon. Member's observations are travelling very wide of that.

MR. ISAACSON: I was endeavouring to show that the increase and development of post office business has been such that difficulties would only be too likely to occur. But, under all the circumstances, I cannot see that the right hon. Gentleman has been at all to blame. To this I was coming, though possibly I have wandered somewhat from the direct way. The whole question in connection with the proposed reduction has been so thoroughly thrashed out that I find nothing to add. I will only add the appeal with which I began, that I think that a little clemency might be shown to those men who, under pressure, were induced to join the strike, and who having repented, might be allowed to return, though I hope the right hon. Gentleman will adhere to the position he has taken with regard to meetings and the active promoters of the late agitation.

(3.11.) MR. LABOUCHERE: I altogether disagree with the doctrine that the postmen should be prohibited from meeting, or subjected to such conditions that meeting is practically impossible. I really think the right hon. Gentleman is making a great mistake in making this dead set against postmen joining a Trades Union or holding meetings. This kind of thing is often a safety valve, and it can do no harm, for you are not obliged to accept the views expressed in resolutions at these meetings, though you might allow the expression. As to the view of the hon. Member for Camborne that a wrong was inflicted on the London postmen because the Postmaster General refused to recognise their secretary, that I confess I cannot agree with. I think a Postmaster General ought to allow his men to have an Association—call it a Trades Union if you like—and to meet as much as they desire without restriction or punishment, direct or indirect; but the Postmaster General should deal with the men as his subordinates and not as members of a Trades Union. He is not to blame if he refuses to receive as a representative of his men some secretary who has no connection with the Post Office. When the hon. Member for Camborne was speaking about the secretary, Mr. Mahon, I interpolated the remark, "What does he get for it?" and when the hon. Member spoke of the men crying with one voice, "Let us have Mr. Mahon," it occurred to me that we had never heard of this gentleman before, and I think most people connected with the Post Office had never heard of him, and I imagined there was some reason why he put himself forward; and that in serving them he was serving himself. When I had an opportunity of looking at the book of rules and regulations, I found that among those rules, made, I suppose, by Mr. Mahon, there was a rule providing that the secretary to the Union should receive from 30s. to 50s. a week. Here is the explanation of the whole matter. But I have only risen to say that, while I support the Amendment and shall vote for it if it is carried to a Division, because I think that the Postmaster General ought to leave more independence to the men to meet, to associate and express their views, at the same time, I am entirely opposed to the view that public servants are wise to join Trades Unions. There is a distinction in their position from that of persons in the employ of private firms. I recognise that Trades Unions have done much to improve the condition of the working and artisan class in enabling the men to fight their own cause against employers, against whose decision in trade disputes there is no appeal. But in the case of public servants, there is an appeal to this House. We are the arbiters in matters where we think officials have made out a good claim for redress of grievances. There is not, then, the necessity for a Trades Union among public servants. I do not know whether Members of the Committee noticed as I did that in reference to the attempt to enlist the sympathy of other Unions in the postmen's movement Mr. Mahon said—I saw it in the Press, but I do not know how far it is accurate—

"He was happy to say the dock labourers would treat with violence any postman who did not join in the strike, should he come to deliver letters among them."

Well, I certainly do not think we can complain of the refusal of the Postmaster General to receive as a representative of the men a paid advocate who makes a statement of that kind.

*(3.17.) SIR R. FOWLER (London): As representing a constituency which is very much interested in the regularity of the postal service, it is only right I should thank the Postmaster General for the course he has pursued with regard to recent events. It was a matter of the most vital importance that the strike should be put down, and the course which my right hon. Friend has taken has redounded to his honour and to the honour of those who are associated with him, Sir A. Blackwood and the other permanent officials who so loyally assisted him. The hon. Gentleman who has just sat down has referred to Mr. Mahon, and certainly I think it is a very great abuse that the business of the Government and the public should be thrown into confusion by one of those adventurers who, for the sake of putting a small sum into his pocket, comes forward and induces men to violate their duty and to pursue a line of conduct which has been reprobated by all right-thinking men. I have no doubt there are grievances among the employés of the Post Office; that there are some men connected with the Post Office who are more hardly worked and worse paid than almost any men I know. I remember a good many years ago mentioning an instance to Lord Granville of a driver in the service of the Department, who, every day, Sundays included, had to drive from Salisbury Plain through Devizes to Chippenham, winter and summer, in all weathers. This man drove 52 miles every day, Sundays included, and received, I think, 12s., certainly not more than 14s., a week. My right hon. Friend may say that that is the market price, and so long as men undertake to do the work at that rate, he would not be justified in giving more. ["No, no!"] I would remind hon. Members who say "no" that this is a system which has been pursued by right hon. Gentlemen on either side. I mentioned this particular instance to Lord Granville, who was at the time not directly connected with the Department, but he was a leading Member of the then Government. The hon. Member for Camborne has defended the employment of Mr. Mahon as the paid advocate of the postmen; but I venture humbly to represent to him that the arguments he has used might be used against him with very inconvenient results should he, as possibly he may, being a distinguished Member of the Party opposite, find reward for his services in appointment as Secretary to the Treasury or Postmaster General.

*(3.21.) SIR WALTER FOSTER (Derby, Ilkeston): I agree with the hon. Member for Northampton that Government employés should be allowed to combine and hold meetings for the discussion of their own interests; but as to the remark that they have in this House a Court of Appeal for the redress of their grievances, I think, seeing what has occurred this Session, they cannot have much confidence in this House as a means of redress. Certainly, the men should have our sympathy as a large class of public servants performing most responsible and heavy duties for comparatively poor pay. When these men combine and appoint a secretary at the munificent salary of some £2 a week! I do not see in that any occasion for the remarks of my hon. Friend. I do not think it is the rule to find Gentlemen in this House giving their services, except political services, for nothing, and if the secretary does his work well, why should he not receive a salary? It is essential that he should be paid. He is the mouthpiece of the men, to formulate their grievances, and to give expression to their representations in matters in which they are concerned. It is manifest that this could not be done by individuals connected with the Post Office; no one of them would take on himself the responsibility of standing forward and addressing his chief as the mouthpiece of his fellows, because if he did he would be a marked man. Therefore, in self-defence, the men are bound to employ a man from outside. I am sorry that the sneer on this action of the men should have come from this side of the House. There is another matter to which I should like to refer, not so much connected with the particular question before the House as with the general administration of the Department. I think a great Department like this, making large profits, ought to provide increasing facilities and conveniences to the public as occasion arises. But as towns grow in size and importance, postal conveniences do not keep pace with the progress. I could mention several instances in which large and growing centres of population have less postal conveniences and advantages than smaller and unprogressive localities.

THE CHAIRMAN: The point the hon. Member is raising is not relevant to the present discussion.

*SIR WALTER FOSTER: Then I will refer to it later on.

(3.26.) MR. J. LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet): It does not come within my province to interpose between the hon. Member for Northampton and the hon. Gentleman who has just spoken; but I may observe that the remarks of the hon. Member for Northampton met with the approval of the great mass of the Committee. That persons who have nothing to do with the Post Office should put themselves forward for, relatively speaking, a handsome salary, and instigate public servants to neglect their public duty, is a very discreditable proceeding, and I am sorry there should have been in the House any show of giving countenance to it. The Postmaster General has received a great deal of advice from both sides of the House. I am not prepared to take upon myself the rôle of Mentor of the right hon. Gentleman, who, I think, has managed his Department extremely well and has displayed a forbearance and practical knowledge of affairs which shows that he is capable of doing his work by himself. If my right hon. Friend listens to some advice tendered from both sides of the House, and holds out any hope that the men primarily responsible for these unfortunate proceedings will be reinstated, he will strike a blow at the very roots of departmental discipline which will re-act throughout other branches of the Public Service. Of course, I do not undertake to say there may not be particular cases as to which consideration should be given to the evidence upon which men were included in the category; but I am sure the House of Commons would be discharging no useful function to the body politic if it induced a Minister to hold out any clemency to those who instigated disaffection among employés and disorganisation of an important Public Service. We see the lamentable effects of the encouragement given to those who promoted the dock strike in the spread of the movement among all classes of industry and even into the Public Service. The practice of allowing persons not themselves connected with the work to put themselves forward as representatives of the men, who may or may not have grievances of their own, cannot be too strongly condemned. Whether they are paid, as in the case of Mahon, or seek political notoriety as in other cases in putting themselves forward, they should be told to mind their own business, and that no communication will be held with them. I desire once more to express my thanks to the right hon. Gentleman for the course which he has taken. The thanks of the whole community are due to him for the firmness he has displayed throughout the dispute.

*(3.29.) Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): Hitherto I have abstained from putting questions to the right hon. Gentleman, for I felt the difficulties of his position, and did not wish to aggravate them. The Postmaster General is in the position of being the employer of many thousands of workmen, and is, perhaps, responsible for the management of the largest staff in the country. His administration covers a large class, who are enabled to make their wishes known through Members of this House, and he has not absolutely a free hand, because he is restricted by the action of the Treasury. I realise the difficulties of his position, and, therefore, I shall speak with reserve. The main question discussed to-night is whether the right hon. Gentleman was justified in refusing to deal with outsiders in his communications with the men employed in his own Department. On that point I agree to a great extent with what has been said by the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere). Post Office men are not in the position of ordinary labourers. They have their votes; they are largely represented in this House; and it is customary for hon. Members to put questions in this House on their behalf. Even in the case of ordinary workmen, I believe Trades Unions recognise that only those men employed in the trade should be mixed up with communications with employers. But whatever may be the case with regard to Trades Unions generally, I submit there is a difference between ordinary workmen and men employed in the Public Service. It is not worth while, perhaps, now to go at length into the dispute itself. I am not able to say that the men in the Post Office are badly paid, and I cannot regard their position as other than satisfactory. When one looks at the salaries they received, at the fact that they are entitled to pensions, and that they have many other advantages, such as sick pay, uniforms, and Christmas-boxes, one cannot say that they are badly paid. But there is one class employed of whom I cannot speak in the same terms, namely, the supernumerary postmen.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order! The question now before the Committee is the Postmaster General's salary and his policy. The question of the adequacy or inadequacy of the pay of the men does not arise on this question.

*Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE: It is rather difficult to deal with the whole question without adverting to the condition of the men in respect to whom the dispute arose. When the proper time comes, however, I shall be prepared to show that there is something to be said for a class of men who are not establishment men, but who are doing work identical with that of the class above them. I am rather inclined to think the Postmaster General would have done wisely if he had entered into their case at an earlier period, but, on the whole, I am prepared to support the Postmaster General in the action he has taken, and I cannot join in the attacks made upon him.

*(3.35.) Mr. JOHN WILSON (Durham, Mid): I should not have risen to take part in this discussion, especially as I have only just come into the House of Commons, had it not been for some remarks that have been made from both sides of the House. The discussion has broadened since it commenced and has drifted into the operation of Trades Unions; and an attempt has been made on both sides to show the inadvisability of men taking part in Trade Union matters who are not connected by trade with the class of men for whom they act. I think that idea arises, if I may be allowed to say so, from ignorance on the part of hon. and right hon. Gentlemen who are not sufficiently conversant with the Trades Unions of this country. I could quote numbers of cases where men who are now secretaries of Trades Unions have not served their time to the trades which the Unions represent, but who have been called in by the members of the particular Trade Union because they are men of ability in whom the members have confidence. The statement has been made and frequently repeated in the course of the discussion that Mr. Mahon, who was acting for the Post Office employés, had put himself forward for the purpose, as the Member for Northampton has suggested, of getting 30s. or 50s. a week. Now, there is no purer democracy anywhere than the Trades Unions. No man can foist himself on a Trade Union and say, "I will be your secretary." He must be elected, and the men must know him and have confidence in him. I am the treasurer of a Trade Union; but it would be impossible for me to go to the members of the Union and say, "I will be your treasurer." There are Members of the House who are the secretaries of Trade Unions—my hon. Friend the Member for Morpeth (Mr. Burt), for instance, is secretary to the Miners' Union in Northumberland. He was called from the mine to become their secretary by a vote of the Members. Without saying a word in favour of Mr. Mahon, or of his capacity to lead a Trade Union, I assert that that gentleman could no more put himself into the secretaryship of the Postmen's Union than he could into membership of the House of Commons. If there is one reason more than another why the postmen should have an independent man to represent them it has been supplied by the Postmaster General himself. Supposing that the postmen had thought fit to form a Trade Union, and had elected one of their own number to be their secretary, if the right hon. Gentleman was consistent in his course of conduct he would have discharged that man on the very first opportunity simply because he was the secretary of the Union. I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman intends to turn a willing ear or a deaf ear to the appeals for mercy that have been made from both sides of the House on behalf of the men whom he has discharged; but he knows in his heart the reason why these men brought in an outsider;

he knows that if one of the postmen had been appointed secretary, there would always have been hanging over his head the dread of summary dismissal if he took upon himself to act on behalf of the men. I hope the House will not agree with one of the statements made by the hon. Baronet the Member for the City of London (Sir R. Fowler). The hon. Baronet spoke of the low wages the postmen are receiving, namely, 12s. or 14s. a week, as the market price. There may be private firms in this country that trade upon men's necessities; but is it to be understood that gentlemen who pretend to represent, and who do legally represent, the constituencies of this country are to preach a political economy like that, and argue that, because there are a number of men waiting for employment, the State is to offer starvation wages? I trust the hon. Baronet is the only man in the House in whose mind that idea rests. My own view is that even if there are a hundred or a thousand men ready to take a given place, the man chosen should be paid such a price as will enable him to maintain himself and his family. Because there are two men seeking work, we ought not to offer them 10s. or 12s. a week, if their necessities require 18s. or 20s. I apologise for trespassing on the attention of the House, but I thought it necessary that I or someone else connected with the Trades Unions of the country should speak on this matter. I cannot help thinking that there has been manifested in the Debate an ignorance that is unbecoming in gentlemen who pretend to represent industrial constituencies; and if I may do so, I advise hon. Gentlemen to make themselves acquainted with the operations of Trades Unions, because Trades Unions are now a power in the land.

*(3.45.) MR. RAIKES: I have already enlarged upon the position I thought it right to take up with regard to the movement, and the Committee will hardly expect me to repeat what I have said. The hon. Member for Cardiff (Sir E. Reed) will forgive me if I pass by his observations, because, although he was careful not to introduce an express reference to the telegraphists in his speech, the whole of his speech was exclusively directed to a matter which can only be conveniently dealt with later. The hon. Member for the Camborne Division (Mr. Conybeare) gave us the history of the Postmen's Union, —might he not also have composed its epitaph?—and said that I was mistaken if I thought that the discontent in the Service was wholly due to professional agitators. I am not under that impression. I think the discontent has been very largely fanned and developed to somewhat alarming proportions by the action of professional agitators. But I do not suppose they would have been able to effect anything unless there had been a tendency in the direction of discontent before they began to work. I believe there is no doubt that the movement in the Post Office had its origin in the dock strike. The hon. Member for Camborne referred to Tom Dredge, and he wished the Committee to believe that there is a great deal of dissatisfaction in the Post Office at the present time in consequence of the dismissal of Tom Dredge. I do not know what dissatisfaction there may be amongst other persons in the Post Office, but it is not shared by Tom Dredge himself, because, having been reinstated in the office, he has studiously kept aloof from this movement. The hon. Member had mixed up the question of shorthand writers and what he calls an official reporter. The two unoffending members of the Postal Service who were assaulted in Hyde Park were certainly not shorthand writers. [Mr. CONYBEARE: I never said they were.] If the hon. Member looks back at his remarks, he will see he used the words "official reporter," and then slipped out the word "spy." He endeavoured to show how wrong it would be on my part to ask the men to receive a shorthand writer. I do not want to go back to the scandalous scene which occurred in the Mount Pleasant Office, but I am bound to say something with regard to the hon. Member's remarks as to intimidation. I am constantly receiving communications to the effect that in what the men did they yielded wholly to intimidation. There has been something said by the hon. Member as to the course alleged to have been taken by Sir A. Blackwood in trying to induce the men to sign a declaration not to strike before the 21st of July. Sir A. Blackwood was in no way responsible for this suggestion. I refer to that mainly in order that I may pay a tribute—in which I think the Committee will join me—to the great spirit and energy, courage and readiness displayed by Sir A. Blackwood at the most critical juncture of these proceedings. I wish to add my testimony to the invaluable service he has rendered on this and other occasions to the Department with which he has been so long connected. But Sir A. Blackwood had nothing to do with the proposal that the men should sign a declaration that they would not strike before the 21st of July. I believe the declaration was propounded by some of the subordinate officials of the Post Office merely as a suggestion to the men that if they disliked the presence of extra hands, the best way of freeing themselves from their presence would be to give an assurance that by no act of theirs would they make their presence necessary; at all events within a certain period of time. As they declined to give such an assurance, I think I should have been wanting in my duty if I had not taken immediate steps to reinforce all the services at St. Martin's-le-Grand by bringing in all the hands I could to supply any vacancies that might arise. The hon. Member referred to the presence of the police at St. Martin's-le-Grand on the morning of Thursday, when the strike took place. I think the Committee will agree that prevention is better than cure; and if the presence of the police in any way contributed to what the hon. Member called the unfortunate failure, I am inclined to think the presence of the police was advisable. The hon. Member behind me (Mr. Isaacson) has appealed to me to reinstate the men dismissed. It is premature for me to announce any decision on the subject. Naturally, I should be very glad if I felt it compatible with the public interest to reinstate as many of them as I could; but the Public Service must, of course, be the first consideration, together with the question of maintaining the discipline of the Service. All I can say at present is that every application for reinstatement will be carefully considered by myself after the Reports from the district postmasters have been received. There can be no doubt, I think, that the established postmen in London are a very fairly-paid body of men, and they constitute the enormous majority of the Service in London. Nobody, I believe, has questioned the fact that the London established Post Service is one which men of that class benefit themselves by entering. There is, however, a great deal of force in what has been urged with regard to the case of the unestablished postmen. So strongly have I felt this, indeed, that I submitted proposals to the Treasury with the view of improving the position of this class just before the postmen unfortunately rushed into hostilities, without giving me any opportunity whatever of explaining my views. Therefore, I at any rate cannot accept any blame for the wages at the present moment paid to unestablished postmen, and I still hope that the proposals now before the Treasury may receive favourable consideration, and put the men in a better position. The hon. Member for Mid Durham (Mr. J. Wilson) spoke of wages, such as 12s. or 14s. a week. There is no full postman, established or unestablished, in London, who receives less than 18s. a week. There are, however, a certain number of auxiliary postmen who do not give their full time to the Department. In fact, it is a condition of the engagement of an auxiliary postmen that he is able to show that he is earning at least 12s. a week from some other employment. I do not say that the wages are on the most magnificent scale, but they are earned by men who already follow some other calling as their main source of income. If the State is called upon to pay a little more than the market rate, then the servants of the State ought always to be prepared to give a little more than the normal requirements of duty demand. I hope, at all events, that the Committee have heard enough about me, and that, if we are to discuss the other items of the Vote, some of which are of much interest, we may now be allowed to proceed to a Division.

* (4.1.) MR. BROADHURST (Nottingham, W.): Sir, I would like to join in the appeal to the Postmaster General that he will, as early as possible, consider the re-admission to employment of the men who have been discharged. I cannot think that the State should take the position of displaying anger and resentment at its servants taking part in what, I have no doubt, they believed at the time to be a perfectly justifiable movement for the bettering of their condition. The history of this agitation is very like that of 20 years ago, which, as in the present instance, resulted in the creation of a great number of victims. I sincerely hope that the Postmaster General will deal liberally and handsomely with the men who are now placed in a similarly unhappy position. I think the State is altogether mistaken in its objection to the right of combination among the postmen. I think they should be permitted to combine for the purposes of mutual assistance and counsel as to what is best and not best for the promotion of their interests, and as a Trade Union enjoying to the fullest extent the right of combination permitted to their fellow-workers in the country. We shall never be inclined to rest satisfied until that is conceded. Sir, there has been rather an unhappy difference of opinion expressed between my hon. Friend the Member for East Bradford and the hon. Member for Mid Durham. No doubt both are right to some extent. My right hon. Friend the Member for East Bradford declared that it was the policy of Trades Unions to appoint to their chief offices men of their respective trades. That is perfectly true. There is no great Trades Union in Great Britain but what is officered by men of that particular trade. Yet my hon. Friend the Member for Mid Durham is correct so far as some exceptions are concerned. There are Trades Unions or Labour Associations that are not officered by men who have worked in the particular branch of industry which is combined. There is a great Association in North Yorkshire which has a secretary—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! I did not interrupt the hon. Member for Mid Durham in his second maiden speech, but this is wide of the question. The point is, the attitude of the Postmaster General with regard to the Postmen's Union.

*MR. BROADHURST: I am much obliged for the correction, Sir. I was following in reply something which proceeded from the hon. Member for Mid Durham, but I bow loyally to your ruling. May I, then, say that the whole policy of Trades Unionism has been that those who direct its policy, or who advise its action in labour and in industrial matters, shall be men who themselves will share in the failure or success of that policy, and not men who, whatever the result, shall in no way suffer from the consequences.

(4.7.) MR. ATKINSON (Boston): It is not accepted, I wish to say, in reply to the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, that Trades Unions are always useful. I could give many instances in which they have been mischievous instead of useful. But that is not the point we have before us. I wish to say that I shall support the payment of the salary of my right hon. Friend upon this ground: that none could have managed this business better than the Postmaster General. We particularly feel grateful to him that he has not let these busybodies, or secretaries of Trades Unions, or Members of Parliament posing for election two years hence, or men who have no interest whatever in the business, dictate to him; and we are very glad, indeed, that we have a Postmaster General with such a backbone, and we only wish—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

MR. ATKINSON: I have expressed what I wish, and I am quite ready to be called to order. I have voted against the salary of the Postmaster General on one point. I am now going to vote for it on another. In that I am perfectly consistent, because I am going to vote against the hon. Member for Camborne, who has been trying to show us that the right hon. Gentleman has mismanaged these affairs. He gave us a digest of the strike, but it would have been quite sufficient had we taken the Times or any other newspaper to read on each day that it mentioned the Post Office strike, and in that way we would have avoided the waste of an hour and a half of our time. I protest against that sort of mismanagement, and I support to the utmost of my ability the talented and right management of the strike by my right hon. Friend.

*(4.10.) MR. WINTERBOTHAM (Gloucester, Cirencester): I think a word or two is necessary to put the principle of this Vote in a clear light. I apprehend that those who vote for the proposed reduction will do so as an expression of their opinion to the country that the Postmaster General has shown a want of tact and a sad lack of sympathy in dealing with a large body of public servants. ["No!"] You who disagree will have an opportunity of expressing your opinion in the Lobby shortly. This matter has been discussed to-night in the House of Commons; but it has yet to be discussed by the working classes, and I would remind the House that from the Postmaster General down to the postboy at 4s. or 5s. a week the public will not stand any difference of treatment in principle between the higher-paid officials at £3,000 or £4,000 a year and the smaller-paid officials. The Postmaster General said that it was only the fringe of a big question. He never said anything truer than that. The great question of the Relations of Capital and Labour cropped up in the speeches of hon. Members opposite, hardly one of whom could help alluding to the dock strike. That was, in their view, a sadly unfortunate strike in which labour won; this is, on the other hand, a happy strike in which, by what the last speaker called the backbone of the right hon. Gentleman, labour has been beaten. They were hardly able to contain their satisfaction at so delightful a result. The question is, whether these postmen who have been dealt with by the Postmaster General are, in common with the working classes generally, by their growing intelligence and culture, entitled to those full rights of combination which their fellows demand and will continue to demand. The Postmaster General has made certain small concessions which I fear will not satisfy the mass of the working classes of this country. The men are to have some right of combination acknowledged, but subject to three conditions. The first is that notice of their intention to meet shall in every case be given to their employers. These questions will have to be met with tact (I speak as a large employer myself), and I believe the people will demand that the business of the Public Departments shall be carried on in the spirit in which all right-minded employers seek to avoid disputes and strikes by timely consideration and fair play. Are these three conditions on which practically this Division is to be taken conditions which large employers of labour would seek to force on their employees?

I say they are not. Take the, first that notice of all meetings which the Post Office employés intend to hold, for the purpose of discussing matters affecting their own interests, shall be sent to the head of the Department. I say that that is not fair or reasonable. The second condition is that no secretary, not being himself an employé of the Post Office, shall be recognised by the Department. Fancy large employers of labour outside the Government treating their employés in this way. Let the Committee imagine the case of large coal proprietors refusing to recognise such a man as the hon. Member for Morpeth (Mr. Burt) as a spokesman appointed by miners to represent them in a trade dispute! Men employed for long hours, and with but little time at their own disposal, ought, surely, to be allowed to employ and pay anyone to attend to their interests in an executive capacity. I do not think that this second condition is one of which public opinion will approve. Well, what is the third condition? It strikes me as being the most hateful of all. It is that a Government shorthand writer must be present at each of the men's meetings! These three conditions of the Postmaster General are really the question now before the Committee—a question which the Government may, and doubtless will, carry by a majority to-day; but I say it is the duty of everybody who sympathises with working men in their endeavour to improve their condition to protest against these unfair conditions which it is sought to impose—which are dragoon-ing conditions, such as no ordinary employers of labour would for a moment seek to enforce on their workmen, and the enforcement of which on Government employés by Government officials the working classes will assuredly disapprove.

*(4.18.) MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK (Whitehaven): I am sorry to interpose between the Committee and the impending Division, and I should not have done so but for the speech just delivered by the hon. Gentleman opposite, which is in thorough accordance with the manner he has adopted since he changed his colours, because now he always endeavours in the speeches he makes in this House to set class against class. I hold in my hand evidence which will, I think, convince the Committee that the hon. Member is wrong when he speaks of the movement against the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General being a spontaneous one. There can be no doubt that the movement was got up by outsiders, and I have here sufficient proof of this. I do not suppose the hon. Member for Gloucester has seen the evening papers of to-day, or there would have come under his notice a report of a meeting held last night, at which it was stated that there are only £30 to be divided among the dismissed men, and therefore these dismissed postmen were urged to obtain employment outside the Post Office as soon as they could. It was also stated that attendance was no longer compulsory, and that the waiting room would be closed. This notice was signed by Mr. Mahon. This is all I wish to bring under the notice of the House, and I think it very pertinent to the matter under discussion.

(4.20.) MR. CONYBEARE: Before a Division is taken, I wish to ask a question of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Raikes), though, in the first instance, I should like to take notice of the attack the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) has made upon the Postmen's Union. He has quoted from an evening paper a statement under the name of the General Secretary of the Union, to the effect that only £30 remains to be divided among the dismissed officials. For my part, I am surprised that there is so much to be divided. [Laughter.] Hon. Members may laugh, but I would point out that these poor men are not in receipt of the incomes enjoyed by hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite. The facts connected with the Union are these. It was only established less than eight months ago. The men have been contributing 2d. and 4d. a week since that time, and have no large reserve fund to fall back upon, while for the last two or three weeks they have been paying large sums for the support of the men dismissed by the right hon. Gentleman. Therefore, I think it greatly to the credit of this young Union, that it should have as large a balance as £30, having had to maintain 400 men, and their wives and their children, for two or three weeks. I cannot see why the right hon.

Gentleman the Member for Whitehaven should be so enthusiastic against these unfortunate men. I should like to see the right hon. Gentleman trying to live upon 18s. a week. In that case I think he would have a better understanding of the men's position. As I have been challenged upon this subject by the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), I will tell the Committee what the Secretary of the Union has to do for his wages. [Cries of "Question."] This is a question on which I have been distinctly challenged. I hold in my hand the Rules of the Union, and under the circumstances I feel bound to refer to the rule which defines the Secretary's duties. The Secretary was elected by the postmen under a general Ballot, Rule 6, and his duties are that he should attend all meetings, receive all monies on behalf of the Union, prepare a balance sheet, issue cards of membership, keep a register of members, and an account of all subscriptions, and perform other duties, which are detailed, attending generally to the business of the Union. For this he is to be paid not less than 30s., nor more than 50s. a week, and he is entitled, in addition to the legal holidays, to two weeks holiday per annum. I should like to ask whether the Chief Secretary for Ireland or any other Minister would be content to discharge one tithe of these duties for less than £5,000 a year.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Gentleman has been allowed to read those Rules in answer to what has been said before, but his answer ought to be confined to that point.

MR. CONYBEARE: Very well, Sir. Then I will simply put this question to the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General, whether in respect of the men whom he has reinstated, or intends to reinstate, he requires or suggests that they should make a declaration or statement that they joined the Union through intimidation or terrorism on the part of their fellows. I put this question because it will be remembered that the right hon. Gentleman just now told us he was constantly receiving letters from postmen, asking for reinstatement on the ground that they had been intimidated. I now state, as a deliberate fact, that intimidation or terrorism was never used to induce men to join the Union, though I am not going to say that when the blacklegs were introduced some violence was not used. If the right hon. Gentleman intends to rely on that violence as a reason for the sweeping accusation made against the Union, that they intimidated and terrorised their fellows, I say that that is not sufficient to traverse my statement that no intimidation was used to induce men to join their Union.

*(4.29.) MR. RAIKES: I can only repeat, in answer to the question of the hon. Member, who says that no intimidation was practised, that I have received letters from some of the men stating that they left their employment because they were intimidated. With regard to the question put as to what men I may feel it right to reinstate in their former employment, I have to say that I have laid down no express or particular conditions to be observed with regard to such reinstatement, but that I shall be guided entirely by the particular circumstance of each case.

*(4.30.) MR. FENWICK (Northumberland, Wansbeck): It seems to be supposed that the failure of the movement of the Post Office servants was due to want of sympathy for them on the part of employés in other trades. That is not so, and if anything could increase the sympathy of other workmen it would be the unyielding attitude taken up on the subject of combination by the Postmaster General in his unfortunate speech this afternoon. I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he can point to a single instance of a large employer of labour demanding from his workmen such conditions as those laid down in his speech this afternoon. Why, then, should the employés of the State be saddled with responsibilities that are not thrown upon other workmen in the country? I regard his second demand as highly objectionable, namely, that they shall not appoint any outside person to represent them on all questions which they desire to have placed before the heads of the Department. It seems to me that the best employers in the country rather desire, than otherwise, the appointment of officials who have the confidence of the workmen, and would rather deal with them than with the whole of the workmen, either in a body or by separate individuals. I wish the Postmaster General would re-consider his position in these matters. I think there would be less friction between him and the employés of the Post Office if he would. I sincerely trust also that he will re-consider his position with regard to his desire to have an official reporter present at every meeting. Nothing could be more hateful to any body of workmen than to have an official reporter imposed upon them when considering any question affecting their social condition. If the right hon. Gentleman insists on this condition we must conclude that there will be no Postmen's Union, because, in my opinion, the men would rather continue to go on without one than submit to such a hateful condition. We know there is a tendency among some large employers of labour to try and get to know who the men are who bring forward grievances, and those men are known as marked men, and are singled out for punishment. The Postmaster General has already singled out certain individuals, and dismissed them, for taking part in a movement which, according to his own statement, they were not responsible for. The day has gone by when any responsible Minister or any Government can veto the right of free and open combination. It is perfectly true that civil servants are in a different position from the great body of the workmen of the country. It is said they have their representatives in this House, but I wish to know who specially represents them. No one does, and that is all the more reason why the interests of these men should be more generously and liberally considered than those of the great bulk of the workmen in the country are. I sincerely trust that the right hon. Gentleman will re-consider the position he has taken up on the question.'

*(4.39.) MR. CUNINGHAM GRAMHAM (Lanark, N.W.): I deeply deplore the disputes that have taken place in the Post Office, and for many reasons. I have looked upon the Post Office as the means by which many of the industries now in the hands of employers may come into the hands of the State, and I am exceedingly sorry that recent events have occurred at the Post Office which go some distance towards shattering my ideal. I should like to make a few remarks on the conditions the Post master General has imposed relative to the formation of a Trades Union among these men. I understand that one is that no meeting is to be held without previous notice having been given to the authorities. Personally, I think every man, whether a soldier or sailor, or in whatever capacity he may be, is extremely foolish who places himself under discipline whereby he forfeits his rights as a citizen, but I have yet to learn that the postmen are placed under such stringent discipline as enables their elementary rights as citizens to be taken away from them. With soldiers and sailors it is a different matter, but hitherto I have not understood that a man by accepting employment of the State as a postman lays himself open to such discipline as that I have referred to, and I should like a definite explanation from the Postmaster General as to whether a man, by entering the Service of the State as a postman, lays himself open to what is practically military discipline, forfeits the right, which is not denied to any other workman, of freely assembling in public meeting to ventilate his grievances. I know that as to public meetings the Postmaster General has in some respects relaxed the rules. I believe the rules were framed when another Government was in power, and, therefore, I hope we shall have some assurance from the Front Opposition Bench that when that Party returns to power they intend to relax the rules still further. With reference to the shorthand writer whom the Postmaster General insists shall be present at the various meetings of the postmen, I utterly fail to see why, when the Press is admitted—and I believe that most of these meetings have in that sense been public—it is necessary to have an official shorthand writer present. When the daily Press is represented, I suppose that all the facts that are most valuable for the Postmaster General to have at his command, in order to carry on the discipline and routine of his office, are set forth in the various newspaper reports. Therefore, as I conceive the Postmaster General does not wish in any respect to cause a feeling of irritation in the Service, but very much the contrary, I would venture respectfully to suggest to him that he should see fit to waive this question, in view of the expression of opinion we have had from working-class Representatives from this part of the House on the subject. The third point I would touch upon is in reference to the Secretary to the Union. The Postmaster General said no outsider or stranger should be employed in this capacity. I fail to understand his reason for that, because, if we look at the other Trades Unions in the country, we find that in almost every case the Secretary to the Union is not a man actively engaged in daily labour. To fulfil the position of Secretary efficiently, it is almost impossible for a man to gain his livelihood by Party labour, and at the same time give his time to the work of a Trades Union. I dare say the Postmaster General is acquainted with the working of a Trades Union. He must know that there is a great deal of routine work to be done in the way of keeping minutes, writing Reports, and so on, and that it must be impossible for a working postman to discharge that duty, as well as the duty of delivering letters during the day. On this matter also we have had a decided opinion from practical Trades Unionists—from two gentlemen who have filled the post of Secretary to their trades. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will take this into consideration, and, as it seems impossible to form a Union at all without having recourse to someone who has not to earn his daily bread, I hope the right hon. Gentleman will waive this point also. A great many men have been dismissed owing to the part they took in the recent agitation. These men are unprovided for. The Postmaster General may say they are reaping the fruits of what they have sown. That may or may not be so, but the fact is that these men are in the main dependent on their daily labour, and are absolutely without employment of any kind, being dependent on the funds of the Union for the very small support they are receiving; and as, undoubtedly, at the present moment, the Postmaster General is in the position of the greatest strength, I make this appeal ad misericordiam to him. I ask if it is possible to overlook the errors that were, perhaps, merely errors of judgment on the part of these men and reinstate as many of them as possible. It appears to me that many of the utterances of the right hon. Gentleman have been, perhaps, utterances that he would not have given vent to if it had not been for recent occurrences having intensified bitter feelings, which it is to be hoped will now lapse on both sides.

(4.48.) MR. PRITCHARD MORGAN (Merthyr Tydvil): I would ask the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General if he will consent to receive the Secretary or the Hon. Secretary or a representative of the postmen in that capacity, and hear from him any grievances he may have to ventilate without his being subjected to any pains or penalties for appearing as the representative of the men. I quite understand the right hon. Gentleman assumes that he will not allow any outsider to interfere in any way, but as he admits that the men have a right to form themselves into a Union will he receive one of their number to represent them?

*(4.49.) MR. RAIKES: The best answer I can give the hon. Member is to inform him that I have arranged to-morrow to receive a deputation of postmen from each of the London Districts.

(4.50.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 111; Noes 195.—(Div. List, No. 199.)

Original Question again proposed.

*(5.2.) MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman a question in regard to telegraphic messages sent by Railway Companies free of cost to them, and, therefore, at the public charge. We had evidence before the Select Committee in 1887 indicating the growing number of these messages, and we were told that they are ten times as numerous as they originally were. What I want to ask the right hon. Gentleman is whether he proposes to take any steps in some form or other to put an end to a bargain which has turned out to be an extremely bad one for the public, in a way that was never contemplated when it was made?

*(5.3.) MR. RAIKES: I have watched with the greatest anxiety the growth in the number of these messages. The situation appears to me to have very largely altered since the arrangement was made with the Railway Companies; but there is a question still awaiting judicial decision which must be settled before any action can be taken.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): Does this cover telegraphic service?

THE CHAIRMAN: No.

*(5.4.) SIR WALTER FOSTER (Derby, Ilkeston): I would ask the right hon. Gentleman's attention to the general question of providing postal facilities adequate to public requirements as towns increase in size and importance. There are many instances I could point to, where the postal arrangements in a large industrial centre are no more than are provided for a village of 500 or 600 inhabitants. We have not, for instance, a head office at Ilkeston. There, as in many places, postal business is conducted in a tradesman's shop, where there is neither space, nor convenience, nor the privacy required. Yet while this is the case there are, on the other hand, towns in the county of Derby of far less commercial importance having each a head post office, with a postmaster giving his undivided attention to postal business. Then, again, there is much room for improvement in the accommodation that is afforded to the public in post offices, both in London and in the country. I think that a lucrative Department like the Post Office, handing over to the Treasury millions annually, might lay itself out to consult the convenience of the public somewhat. In continental post offices you will find every convenience for writing a letter, but so far is this from being the case in this country, that even in some offices there are notices prohibiting the public from using a desk for writing a letter or post card. In this direction I think the Department is conducted in a very narrow spirit. I believe that if greater facilities were given to the public in post offices for transacting their business it would redound to the popularity of the Department, and produce an increase of business.

*(5.8.) MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK: There is a point of some importance not to be left out of view in regard to the late disputes between postmen and the authorities. Comments have been made on the low rate of pay, and the hon. Baronet the Member for the City of London mentioned an instance of hard work and low pay, in the case of a driver at Devizes, but is it not the fact that postmen, in addition to their wages, receive from the public a very considerable sum in the way of gratuities at Christmas time? I have heard that in many cases this results in the men being extremely well paid. I would ask my right hon. Friend if the Post Office have any means of estimating the amount received by the postmen of London by this means? I remember the question being raised some years ago, when it was contended by some Members that the postmen ought not to receive these gratuities, but I am opposed to that view. I think the men are fully entitled to any gratuities the liberality of the public may offer. I know in my immediate neighbourhood in London the sums thus given make a very handsome addition to the incomes of the letter carriers on that walk. But I think it is rather unfair that letter carriers only should participate in these gratuities, sorters and drivers being, in my opinion, entitled to share. I should like to know whether that question has been considered in the Post Office with a view to making some more equal distribution of the money so collected. I have been told that in some parts of London individual postmen have realised sums of from £50 to £70 a year from this source. Certainly, I am not one of those who would wish to deprive a respectable and obliging body of men of any advantage of this kind. But there is an inequality in the distribution of our favours, just as there is in our "tips," when we visit a country house. Only the servants who are seen receive gratuities, and those who bear the burden and heat of the kitchen are unseen and receive nothing. It is very much the same with our postal servants. Could not some means be provided by which all gratuities should go into a fund and be distributed pro rata among employees? I know in Italy and in France there is some arrangement of the kind. I do not know whether the attention of my right hon. Friend has been turned in this direction. In Mr. Fawcett's time I remember there was a discussion on these gratuities, and I believe an order was issued forbidding postmen to ask for Christmas boxes, though they were allowed to receive them. I think that the fact that postmen's wages are very considerably increased in this way disposes of the suggestion that the men are very badly paid.

*(5.15.) MR. RAIKES: I think the Committee will agree that we might now be allowed to take the Vote, and time will not permit to do more than simply notice the points raised. The hon. Member for Ilkeston (Sir Walter Foster) has called attention to what he regards as imperfect service, in the fact that manufacturing towns such as that in the constituency he represents, have not the rank of a head office. As to this, I may say that I shall be very glad to look into any specific case of the kind, such as he has mentioned, but I may add that districts ask for a head office often rather as a matter of sentiment than anything else, for it often happens that the creation of a head office does not confer any postal advantages in postal business to the district where it is situated. As to the conveniences the hon. Member suggests might be offered to the public in Post Offices in London and elsewhere, I should be very glad if anything could be done in that direction: but it must be obvious that though to be enabled to write a letter in a Post Office might be a convenience to some members of the public, to others it might be inconvenient, as further crowding the space, very often limited, for the transaction of the various branches of the business of the Department. My right hon. Friend has asked a question on the subject of Christmas boxes, but this is a matter on which I have no official information. In common with the rest of the public, I have been informed that very large sums sometimes fall to the lot of lucky postmen, and I have heard the average estimated at not less than £15 a year, rising in some exceptional cases to £75 a year; the gratuities are in many cases personal to the recipient, and it is a matter in which it has been held the Department would not be justified in interfering. And now I would ask the Committee to pass the Vote. I know the hon. Member for Donegal (Mr. A. O'Connor) intends to raise another question, but I would ask him to carry out his intention on the Report stage.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck

(5.18) MR. A. O'CONNOR: It would not be possible for me to do justice to the subject I desire to raise within the few minutes now at our disposal. It is a question that affects the whole administration of the Department, the infraction of an important Civil Service Rule by heads of the Department. I do not think it is reasonable that I should bring it on on the Report stage, but as I could not now do justice to the subject, I will not trouble the Committee.

*(5.19.) MR. BOWEN ROWLANDS (Cardiganshire): As I may not be here when the Report stage is taken, may I now call the right hon. Gentleman's attention to a very serious defect of administration in the way in which mails are conveyed to and from the town of Aberystwith. They are conveyed by goods train, to the great inconvenience of the inhabitants of that town and neighbourhood, and the incoming and outgoing arrangements are such that serious delay in correspondence is inevitable. The town is an important one, and the district in every way worthy of being considered by the Post Office Authorities. The defects, I understand, could be remedied by the additional outlay of £1,000, and I do not think that this should be in the mind of the right hon. Gentleman a sufficient reason for disregarding the representations that have been made to him. It is said that the present state of things arises out of a difficulty with the Railway Company, who demand a sum which the Post Office Authorities think they are not justified in giving. Now, I have authority for saying that the company are quite willing to refer the dispute to arbitration, and, for my own part, if the result should be an additional expenditure of £1,000, that would not be too much to expend in removing an inconvenience which is very severely felt by the inhabitants. I am anxious to get an answer from the right hon. Gentleman within the time when the present discussion must necessarily come to an end, and so I have somewhat inconveniently summarised my observations, which otherwise I should have presented more fully and in greater detail. However, the right hon. Gentleman is aware of the inconvenience, as it has been represented to him by persons of authority and influence in the district, and I hope he will undertake to provide a remedy as, I may remind him, he did when a somewhat similar instance of public inconvenience was brought to his notice in connection with the conveyance of mails in the West of Ireland.

*(5.25.) MR. RAIKES: I have seen more than one deputation, and have received many communications on the subject, but I am afraid I cannot see my way to meeting the wishes of the hon. Gentleman's constituents by the expenditure to which the hon. Member, in a spirit of generous liberality, alludes as only £1,500, for it must be remembered that there are many places with equally good claims which are more or less in the same position as Aberystwith. The advantage to be gained by conveyance by passenger train would not be more than three-quarters of an hour, and I do not feel that I should be justified in recommending such expenditure to the Treasury.

*MR. BOWEN ROWLANDS: Let me explain that I did not mean to assent to or to fix any sum. I said the company are willing to refer the amount to arbitration, and I cannot see why the Government should not assent to that course being adopted.

*MR. RAIKES: I do not myself think there is any special reason to refer the matter to arbitration. I will, however, not lose sight of the matter, and I shall be glad if some steps may be taken to the advantage of the locality.

(5.26.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I had intended to raise an important question in relation to the financial relations between the Department and the Treasury, but it is impossible to do that now.

*(5.26.) SIR JOHN SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield): I wish to bring the whole financial position of the Post Office under view. Here we have a large Revenue annually handed over to the Treasury, which otherwise would have to be raised by the Chancellor of the Exchequer by taxation. I would, if I were in order, move a reduction in the salary of the First Lord of the Treasury, for the purpose of calling attention to the want of public accommodation provided by telegraph offices at railway stations and in other ways; for I know from experience that these matters are really regulated by the Treasury. I object to the Post Office receipts being treated as a matter of Revenue by the Treasury, instead of the money being spent in developing the postal and telegraphic business all over the country.

It being half an hour after Five of the clock, the Chairman left the Chair to make his report to the House.

Committee report Progress; to sit again to-morrow.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: What Estimates will be next proceeded with?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): Committee will be set down for to-morrow, and, if there is time, Post Office Votes will be taken. As to Friday, I cannot say.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: And afterwards?

MR. JACKSON: Inland Revenue.

*SIR J. SWINBURNE: After what hour will the Post Office Votes not be taken?

MR. JACKSON: Not after 12 o'clock.

MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): Can the right hon. Gentleman say when Class III. will be taken?

MR. JACKSON: When the other Votes are finished I can tell the hon. Member.

SUPPLY [22ND JULY]—REPORT.

Resolution reported.

ARMY ESTIMATES.

(5.35.) MR. HANBURY (Preston): Perhaps the House will allow me to make only one or two remarks. I learn that yesterday evening, after I left the House, an hon. and gallant Gentleman made a personal attack upon me in regard to something which I had said with reference to a regiment with which that hon. and gallant Gentleman is connected. It is quite impossible for me now to go into any lengthened reply to the hon. and gallant Gentleman I have only two remarks to make. In the first place, I think if the hon. and gallant Member had heard my speech, he would not have made the remarks he did. The observations which aroused the hon. and gallant Gentleman's criticism were confined to two points. I stated that I had seen officers of the Guards omit to return the salutes of their men, and to that statement I adhere, and no amount of declamation can overcome it. I also referred to the special privilege enjoyed by officers of the Guards of not living in barracks, and I expressed the opinion that the Guards ought not to be treated differently in this respect from the officers of any other regiment. I expressed that opinion, and I do so still, and upon the Barrack Vote I shall take a Division upon the point. These are the only two points raised in my speech so far as this regiment is concerned, and though there was a good deal of fervid eloquence besides in the hon. and gallant Gentleman's speech, it does not touch other points mentioned by me. As to the omission to return salutes, I have seen this with my own eyes, as I have passed Wellington Barracks on my way to and from this House; and to that statement I adhere. With regard to the other point, in reference to Guards' officers living in barracks, I not only repeat the statement, but I will take the opportunity on the Barrack Vote of testing the opinion of the House on the point.

(5.37.) MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee): The observations made by the hon. Member now and the observations made on the subject last night prove the great disadvantage under which this House labours in attempting to discuss events like these upon no information at all, or, at the best, on hearsay information. The statement of the hon. and gallant Gentleman last night, however impressive from its earnestness, was nothing more than hearsay to the Committee, and the hon. Member for Preston does not pretend to give evidence to the House. This is my justification for renewing on this opportunity the point I ventured to raise last night, and to impress upon the Secretary for War that this House is entitled to have laid before it full and accurate Reports of proceedings at Courts Martial. I am not going now to express any opinion on these unfortunate events, much less to say that the right hon. Gentleman was not right in enforcing to the full all the powers he possesses for suppressing insubordination in the Army. My point is to impress upon the right hon. Gentleman the fact that it has not been the practice for Governments to refuse to give these Reports of Courts Martial. Let me invite attention to one or two entries in the General Index of Proceedings of the House of Commons. Taking one volume at random, I find the following instances of records of proceedings at Court Martials being laid on the Table. In 1863 a Report of the proceedings at a Court Martial held at Aldershot upon Colonel Crawley; in 1862 an account of the proceedings against Paymaster Smales; and again, in 1866, I believe the Report of proceedings at Simla upon Colonel Trotter was laid. These are cases from a volume of the Index taken at random, and I ask the right hon. Gentleman to say how these cases differentiate from the case now under discussion. I say it has been the practice to lay these proceedings. We must not entrust to any Government the duty of making Constitutional Law; we must defend our own privileges. I again invite the right hon. Gentleman to say upon what rule he founds his refusal, or how the proceedings in reference to the Guards differ from those other cases I have mentioned.

(5.40.) COLONEL KENYON-SLANEY (Shropshire, Newport): I had hoped that the only reference I need make to the hon. Member's speech again would have been to accept, as I would willingly do, some expression of regret for words he used last night, which did not recommend themselves to his conscience this morning. The hon. Member says he only alluded to two points, and I, Sir, only alluded to those two points, and I am glad to see from the Report of the hon. Member's speech this morning, that my quotation from his speech was perfectly accurate. Therefore, I do not see my way to withdraw one word or syllable I may have used last night. The point I did not discuss or allude to was that of officers of the Guards residing in barracks, and on that I agree that there would be considerable advantage in those officers thus being brought into close association with the men. I do not take exception to the hon. Member's remarks on this account; what I do take exception to is the expression of the hon. Member, that officers of the Guards, by their behaviour towards their men, had acted in a manner unworthy of officers and gentlemen.

MR. HANBURY: If the hon. and gallant Member will allow me, what I said was that, in coming down to the House time after time, I have seen officers of the Guards entering the barracks and not returning the salute of the men. This I said I have seen, and I must adhere to the statement.

COLONEL KENYON-SLANEY: I find no fault with the hon. Member's statement of what he has seen, but I take strong exception to the opinion he founded upon that, that it was conduct unbecoming officers and gentlemen. He was proceeding to speak upon that when he was called to order. The hon. Member is not conversant with military affairs, and he is not aware, probably, that many officers enter and leave the barracks who are not officers of the Guards. It is possible he may have been mistaken in supposing the officer belonged to the regiment, or it is possible that an officer might, by inadvertence, have forgotten to return a salute. I repeat I do not find fault with the hon. Gentleman for making that statement, but I do take exception to his going on to state that in so omitting to return a salute the officer was guilty of conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman. This is only a trivial point, and an officer who omits to return the salute of his men is guilty of much the same offence as an hon. Gentleman who omits to return the salute of a policeman at the door. I am informed that the hon. Gentleman himself left this House last night without returning the salute of certain policemen. Would it not be monstrous to say that he has, therefore, been guilty of conduct unbecoming a legislator and a gentleman? As a matter of fact, there is in the Guards the most scrupulous observance of this point as to the returning of salutes. It is to be hoped that when next the hon. Gentleman indulges in military criticism he will be more happy in the subjects he chooses to animadvert upon.

*(5.45.) THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (MR. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): I think that the House will regret that my two hon. Friends were not both present in the House at the same time yesterday. I am bound to say that when my hon. and gallant Friend got up to protest against the language which had been used earlier in the evening, hon. Members must have recognised that the hon. and gallant Gentleman, speaking on behalf of a gallant regiment, was entitled to make those observations. There appears, however, to be on one point no great difference between the two hon. Gentlemen. It is the wish of the Government to provide for the officers of the Guards accommodation they have hitherto not had—namely, rooms in the barracks. With regard to what the hon. Member for Preston has said about salutes, it may be true that he has seen officers of the Guards neglect to return the salute of their men, and, of course, he has the right to state it, but when he went so far as to say that, whether the omission was inadvertent or not, they had acted in a manner not becoming officers and gentlemen, the hon. and gallant Member for Shropshire was fully justified in protesting against it. In answer to the hon. Member for Dundee as to whether I will lay the proceedings of the Court Martial on the Table of the House, I venture to say that, in the interests of the Army and the Public Service, it is not expedient that the matter should be discussed by the House, and certainly, so far as I myself am concerned, I am not prepared to produce any Papers of that description.

(5.47.) MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK (Whitehaven): I saw in the Times report this morning of the embarkation of the Guards on board the Tamar that the soldiers had been deprived of their ration of porter. It is stated that the Bluejackets and Marines on board the same vessel would be served with the ration, though the soldiers would not, and that considerable dissatisfaction had been caused in consequence. I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether this statement in the Times is correct?

*Mr. E. STANHOPE: I sympathise with my right hon. Friend; I should be sorry myself to be deprived of a ration of that description. I am not acquainted with the facts, however, and will make inquiry.

(5.48.) Mr. HANBURY: I beg permission to say a word or two of personal explanation. In the statement I made I did not mean to say, with regard to these particular officers, that their omitting to return the salute was conduct unbecoming officers and gentlemen. What I said was this—that I had seen some of the officers neglect to return the salute, and I am free to admit that it may have been due to inadvertence. But I certainly followed up this statement by the general remark to which I adhere—that if, as a rule, officers do not return the salute of their men, it is conduct not becoming officers and gentlemen.

BILL.—(No. 205.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

LORD HOUGHTON : In asking your Lordships to give this Bill a Second Reading, I need not detain you at any length. This Bill has come to your Lordships from the other House, where it was backed by Members of all Parties, and where it met with no opposition of any kind at any stage. It was slightly amended in one or two particulars, as I shall explain to your Lordships in a few moments. I think at this time of day it is quite unnecessary to enter into any elaborate defence of the system of Public Libraries paid for out of the rates. I think your Lordships will all agree they have been of great benefit to the districts which have adopted them. The only charge I have ever heard brought against Public Libraries is that too many novels are read at them. But when you consider that the persons who use these Libraries are naturally obliged to use them more for the purpose of recreation than of study, I do not think that charge can be regarded as a very serious one. Just to show your Lordships how the matter stands, I will explain shortly what the previous legislation on the subject has been. The first Act under which Public Libraries were formed was passed in the year 1850, and the first Public Library was opened at Manchester two years later. Since then the Act has been amended' in the years 1855, 1877, and 1887, and last year. For some time after the passing of the first Act the formation of Public Libraries did not make any very great progress; but the statistics of later years show a much more satisfactory result. In 1879 there were only 87 Public Libraries open; in 1886 there were 133, and at this moment there are 209, being an increase of 76 in the last four years. At the same time, it would be a mistake to suppose that districts are always ready to adopt Public Libraries. On the contrary, there have been as many as 12 refusals in one year after the matter had been submitted to the ratepayers. Some supporters of this movement go as far as to say that the time has now arrived when a poll might be dispensed with altogether, and when Public Libraries might be formed on the motion of the Local Authority only. This Bill which I have the honour to present to your Lordships does not go so far as that, though I am bound to say that if such a proposition was made, I should, for my own part, not be prepared to oppose it. There is no doubt that the cost of the poll, which in some cases amounts to hundreds of pounds, is regarded by the ratepayers as a serious obstacle to having a Public Library at all. As regards the Bill itself, its object is, I think, clearly stated in the Memorandum annexed to it. Clause 1 substitutes for the very broad electorate which now votes on this matter, in boroughs the burgesses of the borough, and in counties the county electors registered in respect of their qualifications in the district. The object of that is to carry out what is supposed to have been the intention of Parliament in consolidating all the local franchises into one, and also to give a clear and authoritative list of the persons who would be entitled to vote for this object. Upon Clause 2 the Memorandum is not exactly accurate. It was originally proposed that in places having a population of less than 5,000 the proceedings should be, if it is so desired, by public meeting and not by voting papers. An Amendment was, however, introduced in the other House on the ground that public meetings cause a good deal of needless trouble and expense to the ratepayers, and that Amendment was accepted by the promoters of the Bill. Therefore, as the Bill now stands, the proceedings will be in every case by voting papers. Clause 3 enables voters to state, if they so desire, and if a request has previously been made accordingly, that they wish to have a halfpenny or three-farthings rate instead of the statutory penny rate. Clause 5 prevents the question, when once it has been settled by a vote, being re-opened for a year from the time that the poll was taken. Clause 7, which is, I think, one of some importance, enables Ecclesiastical, Parochial, and Charitable Bodies to convey their property, under proper restrictions, for purposes connected with Public Libraries. Clause 13 states that the Bill does not extend to Scotland or Ireland; and, as far as Scotland is concerned, the reason is a very good one—that Scotland has already a very good Public Libraries Act, which was passed in 1887, and from which, in fact, many of the provisions in this Bill are borrowed. With this short explanation I appeal with confidence to your Lordships to read the Bill a second time, and to allow it to pass in the shape in which it has come from the other House.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."
—(The Lord Houghton.)

*THE EARL OF MEATH: My Lords, this Bill appears to be a very desirable one, but there is one clause in it which was inserted at the very last moment when it passed the other House. I refer to Clause 8. I do not think the other House or the noble Lord who has addressed your Lordships intended that this clause should have the effect which it undoubtedly will have in regard to open spaces. By this clause any land which is left, we will say, as an open space for ever, for the benefit of the citizens of this Metropolis, or of any other large town, might be alienated from that purpose. It might be either given away or sold or exchanged for a Public Library; and I know one piece of ground in a very densely-populated part of London which, under this clause, might be built upon which would involve a very great loss to the people. It would be possible for the Trustees, if they liked, to sell that open space for the purpose of building upon it a Public Library. I do not imagine that the noble Lord desires that this Bill should have that effect, and I therefore propose in Committee to move the addition to Clause 8 of the following words:—

"Provided also that land held on trust to be possessed as an open space or on trusts which prohibit building thereon shall not be granted or conveyed for the purposes of this Act."

*THE PAYMASTER GENERAL (The Earl of Jersey): My Lords, I think it will be hardly necessary for me to say anything upon this Bill. Though it is not a Government measure, yet it had the assent of the Government in the other House of Parliament and I do not suppose it will meet with much opposition in this House. It there should be any Amendment to be made, it can, of course, be made in Committee.

LORD HOUGHTON: As far as I am concerned, I cannot conceive that there could be any objection to accepting the Amendment proposed by the noble Lord provided it does not go further than he has stated.

On Question, agreed to,

Bill read 2^a (according to order), and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

REMOVAL TERMS (SCOTLAND) ACT (1886) AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 206.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR SCOTLAND (The Marquess of Lothian): In asking your Lordships to give a Second Reading to this Bill, perhaps you will allow me to say a very few words to explain what the object of it is. In Scotland, as your Lordships are probably aware, it is the practice for a great many persons both in regard to the occupation of houses and also in service to change their houses and their service at the respective terms 15th May and 11th November. But a practice has grown up in Scotland under which it has been customary for people to remove from their houses or to exchange their service not at the exact dates of these terms, but to be allowed a few days' longer before the actual removal from their houses or the transference of service takes place, the time being generally about a fortnight. It has been found that this time varies very much in the counties and in the burghs, and the natural consequences has been that great inconvenience has been caused to those so removing, because sometimes they have to remove from one occupancy or service before they are entitled to enter upon another occupancy or service. To remedy this inconvenience an Act was passed in 1881 called the Removal Terms (Scotland) Burghs Act, which fixed the terms for removal as being the 28th of May and 28th of November respectively. But it was found afterwards that that Act, which referred only to burghs, did not do away with the inconvenience as regarded counties, and a subsequent Act was passed in 1886 which applied that Act to counties as well as to burghs, fixing the terms both as to counties and burghs as the 28th of May and the 28th of November. But that has not done away with the whole difficulty, because those two Acts did not refer to terms of service, and it has now been found that as the terms of service may vary from the usual terms of removal very great inconvenience, and in some cases even hardship, has followed from the present practice. The object of this Bill is to make the terms of removal of service identical with those in respect of houses. I think your Lordships will see that it may sometimes happen, especially among agricultural servants, that a servant may be obliged to leave one service before he is entitled under the present Acts to take up another, and he may be without shelter for a few days. The whole object of the Bill is to make the terms of service in agreement with the two Acts of 1881 and 1886. I may tell your Lordships that this proposal has met, as far as I know, with universal acceptance in Scotland, where this state of things is prevalent. I have myself received many applications on the subject; and I am sure that, under the circumstances, your Lordships will see it is very desirable to get rid of what is, though perhaps, a small hardship, is one which it is extremely desirable should be remedied. I hope, therefore, your Lordships will give a Second Reading to the Bill.

Bill read 2^a (according to order), and committed to the Standing Committee for General Bills.

SETTLED LAND BILL.--(No. 185.)

Amendments reported (according to order); further amendments made; and Bill to be read 3^a on Tuesday next.

BANKRUPTCY BILL--(No. 188.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

*LORD MACNAGHTEN: I have to ask your Lordships to give a Second Reading to this Bill which comes from the House of Commons. As your Lordships know, this matter has attracted a good deal of attention in various quarters. In the House of Commons, both in Grand Committee and in the House itself, the Bill has been very fully discussed in all its stages. It has been before all the Chambers of Commerce in the United Kingdom, and it has been approved by them all. I hold in my hand a Petition from the Association of Chambers of Commerce of the United Kingdom, a body which I believe includes all the Chambers of Commerce in the United Kingdom except the London Chamber, praying your Lordships to pass the Bill during this Session, and I am informed that the London Chamber of Commerce is prepared to present a Petition to the same effect. Under these circumstances, I think the Bill comes before your Lordships with a strong claim to the favourable consideration of the House. It cannot be denied, and certainly I am not concerned to deny, that the Act of 1883 has worked fairly well, quite as well in almost every respect, and in some respects certainly better than any one of its numerous and short-lived predecessors. But the Act has now been in operation for six years and a half, and it is not surprising if, in the course of that period, many points have been discovered in which, at any rate, it is reasonable to think that the Act is susceptible of improvement. The Amendments which this Bill proposes are many and various. There are slips in the Act of 1883 which require to be corrected. Here and there in the construction of the Act there have been a view taken or a decision, as it is nounced which is, I judge by the House, erroneous, but which advantage to pass a been unfortunate, sent in one of the fancy, in accordance. I therefore move tentions of the framers of the Act. Perhaps I may give your Lordships one instance by way of illustration. The Board of Trade has power to remove a Trustee for misconduct. That is a very useful and a very wholesome power, and, as far as I know, the Board of Trade have always exercised it with discretion and firmness. But I am told that this has happened: A man is Trustee of several estates; in one he is found to have misconducted himself, and the Board of Trade promptly remove him; but having done that, the Board of Trade, as I understand, are advised they can do no more, and that they cannot remove him from the Trusts of the other estates in which, it may be, he has not yet had an opportunity of misconducting himself or in which his misconduct has not yet been discovered. I cannot think that is satisfactory. I think it is almost scandalous that a man who has committed a breach of trust in regard to one estate should not be immediately removed from other similar Trusts which he holds. On that point I think your Lordships will have no difficulty in agreeing to the Amendment proposed. I only give that instance by way of illustration. There are many other Amendments which are important, no doubt, but yet which do not involve any question of principle. For instance, the Bill deals with the much-vexed question of proxies. It cannot, I think, be disputed that creditors who are unable to attend in person at meetings of creditors ought to be allowed to have an opportunity of expressing their opinions by proxy in as full and ample a manner as is consistent with the due and safe administration of the estate. On the other hand, there is nothing so mischievous as trafficking in proxies. There is nothing, according to my experience, which so much conduces to the discredit which attached to the Act of 1869 as the trafficking in proxies to which that Act gave rise. The consequence of that discredit was that with regard to proxies the Act of 1883 is very severe. Many people think it is unduly strict, and accordingly the Bill deals with that matter. Your Lordships will find there is a greater latitude allowed with regard to proxies, but yet there are restrictions which I should hope would prevent the recurrence of any such abuses as were rife under the Act of 1869. Then, my Lords, there is another point. Your Lordships will find elaborate provisions are made with regard to compositions and arrangements, the object being to make the procedure in compositions and arrangements more expeditious and more in harmony with proceedings in bankruptcy under the Act of 1883. Those are all matters of detail or administration, and it would not be right that I should detain your Lordships now by dwelling upon them; but there are, as it seems to me, some matters which are matters of principle, and perhaps I may be allowed very shortly to refer to two or three of them before I sit down." The most important provision in this Bill, and the one which, it seems to me, will be the most far-reaching, and I should hope the most beneficial in its effect, is a provision with regard to the discharge of the bankrupt. Your Lordships may perhaps remember that, under the Act of 1869, it was made a condition of the bankrupt obtaining his discharge either that he had paid 10s. in the £1, or that the creditors—and I ask your Lordships to note that the power was by that Act given to the creditors—should pass a special Resolution stating that, in their opinion, the bankruptcy or the failure to pay 10s. in the £1 was due to circumstances for which the bankrupt was not justly responsible, and that they were desirous that the bankrupt should obtain his order of discharge. At first sight that seems a very reasonable provision, and, one would think, not specially open to abuse. But, unfortunately, there are creditors who care more for their pockets than for an abstract idea of commercial morality; and it was found that when the creditors had obtained all they could get in the bankruptcy, they were supremely indifferent as to what became of the bankrupt—whether he got his discharge or not. That led to various abuses. It led to bribery. Many a bankrupt obtained his discharge by means of bribery, and sometimes by fictitious votes, who, if the matter had rested with the Court or with an official body, such as the Board of Trade, would have been severely dealt with. The consequence of those abuses was that there is no similar provision to be found in the Act of 1883.

Under the Act of 1883 a bankrupt is in precisely the same position with regard to obtaining his discharge, other matters being equal, whether his estate pays a dividend of 6d. or 15s. in the £1. That, again, has led to abuses. A trader in a bankrupt condition, hoping against hope, goes on long after there is any possibility of retrieving his position, and the consequence is that, under the present Act, dividends are miserably small. On this point there is a very strong feeling among the commercial community. They think a man ought to know the state of his affairs, and they think he is bound to stop as soon as he finds it is impossible for him to retrieve his position. They think he is not justified in going on and wasting money, which, in reality and in truth, is not his own, but which belongs to his creditors, either in keeping up appearances or in a hopeless adventure. The Bill, therefore, proposes in this matter to return to the principle of the Act of 1869; but with this important difference: that the power which, in the Act of 1869, was rashly confided to the creditors is placed in the hands of the Court. Under this Bill the fact that a bankrupt estate has not paid 10s. in the £1 is one of the facts on proof of which the Court has power either to refuse the discharge or to suspend the discharge, or to grant the discharge under certain conditions. I trust that that alteration, which is a very important one, will commend itself to your Lordships' judgment. Then there are two other provisions which, in some respects, certainly touch on a question of principle, to which I will very shortly refer. There is one which deals with so much of the debts provable in bankruptcy as consists of interest. That provision is directed against a class of persons who have very few friends. I do not think that even the Liberty and Property Defence League will take up the cudgels on their behalf. It is directed against the class of money-lenders. Money-lenders trade, of course, upon the necessities of mankind, and they protect themselves in this way: as regards the principal, they advance in cash as little as they can; and as regards interest, they demand a rate which is certainly liberal, if not exorbitant. Now, the Bill proposes to deal with that matter in this way: It proposes that, as regards debts provable in a bankruptcy, so much as consists of interest should be calculated as between the creditors and in the administration of the estate at a rate not exceeding 5 per cent., leaving the money-lender as regards any balance to look to the estate after all the other creditors have been paid in full. I think, under all the circumstances, that is not an unjust provision. The only objection that one feels to it is that it seems rather like paying money-lenders in their own coin, in holding out to them the somewhat illusory hope that, after all, the bankrupt estate will prove to be solvent. There is just one other provision, and I mention it with some diffidence, because I have heard it said that this House will not fairly consider it—I do not in the least degree believe that—and that is the provision with regard to distress. Your Lordships will find the power of distress, which, under the Act of 1883, was available for the recovery of 12 months' arrears of rent, is, under this Bill, to be available for six months' arrears only. No doubt that is an important change, and some people think it an unwise one. But I am sure your Lordships will consider it fairly. Your Lordships will bear in mind that it only applies to cases of distress levied after the commencement of the bankruptcy. You will also remember that the Act of 1883, as originally introduced, proposed to do away with the right of distress altogether; and perhaps this is a case in which your Lordships may think it better, in view of the present current of legislation, to secure one-half instead of standing out for the whole. My Lords, with these observations I leave the Bill in your hands, and I beg to move the Second Reading.

Bill read 2^a (according to order).

LORD MACNAGHTEN: With regard to the Committee to which the Bill should be referred, perhaps your Lordships may think it right that it should be referred to a Committee of the House. The time of year is getting very late, and there are only one or two matters of principle which must, as it seems to me, be decided by the House, and it would be no advantage to pass a preliminary judgment in one of the Standing Committees. I therefore move that it be referred to a Committee of the whole House.

Moved, "That the Bill be committed to a Committee of the Whole House."—(The Lord Macnaghten.)

LORD HERSCHELL: If my noble and learned Friend will tell me that he has considered all the details of the Bill so as to be able to vouch for it, then I should not oppose the Motion; but, judging from other measures which we have had before us, although they have come up after consideration by the other House, they have not been without the necessity of careful revision.

*LORD MACNAGHTEN: I think this Bill stands in rather a different position. I may say that I have gone carefully through it, and I think it is one which your Lordships might deal with in Committee of the whole House.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): I hope the House will think twice before it makes so great a breach in its custom of referring such Bills to a Committee. Of course, we all place the greatest possible confidence in the assurance of the noble and learned Lord, but if it is to be a rule that simply upon the assertion or upon an assurance on the part of a noble Earl who brings in a Bill that it is of no use for the Bill to go to a Standing Committee, then I think the use and value of Standing Committees will be greatly diminished.

*LORD MACNAGHTEN: I need not say that I was not in the least claiming anything of the sort for myself. It was only in consequence of the late period of the Session that I ventured to suggest it.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: We have still got a good three weeks, I think.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I would only point out that this Bill involves important questions upon the Bankruptcy Law, and I think if a Bill dealing with somewhat delicate and difficult subjects of that nature is not to go to a Standing Committee it would be very difficult to say what Bills ought to be so referred.

LORD BRABOURNE: In regard to referring the Bill to a Committee I think this is one of the instances in which a very important Bill would be practically withdrawn from the cognisance of the House by being referred to one or other of the Committees. This practice, I think, is really becoming exceedingly unpleasant. We never know to which Committee a Bill is going to be referred; and if such a Bill as this, at the present period of the Session, is to be referred to a Select Committee, the practical effect will be that it will not receive the consideration of the House, and I do not think really that a Bill of so much importance ought to be withdrawn from your Lordships' cognisance.

LORD HERSCHELL: I cannot at all agree with the noble Lord who has just sat down. The House is just as much cognisant of the details of the Bill after it has gone, and in spite of its having gone, to Committee, as before. And, more than that, I will venture to say that I can prove that Bills after they have gone through Committee, have been more discussed in this House than, according to former precedent, they would ever have been before.

LORD BRABOURNE: What I meant was that they are withdrawn from the cognisance of the public by being withdrawn from the consideration of the House. They have not the public eye upon them, as they would have if discussed before the Committee of the House.

EARL BEAUCHAMP: I must say, in a matter like this, affecting the interests of the great commercial community throughout the country, that a Bill of such importance should not be referred to a hole-and-corner Committee upstairs. It is very important indeed that the public should know not only what is actually done by this House, but also the grounds of our decision; and though our Debates may not be as fully and perfectly reported in the public journals as we may desire, I would point out to your Lordships that there is still a complete record of our Debates in the imperishable pages of Hansard. There, at least, a Report of whatever may have been said in this House will be found. Small Bills, like the Public Libraries Act, may, no doubt, be very properly and effectually discussed in Committee, but when we are dealing with great interests affecting the whole commercial community, I think it is very desirable that the deliberations upon them should not be withdrawn from the cognisance of the public, as they certainly are when such deliberations take place in a small Committee upstairs, and not in full Committee of this House.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I would point out to the noble Lord that this "hole-and-corner" system, as he describes it, was adopted by the other House in reference to this very Bill, and I apprehend that there must be there at least as many Members as in this House who have regard to the commercial interests of the country. I think, therefore, we shall be at least pursuing a course which has a very good precedent in what has been done elsewhere.

EARL BEAUCHAMP: I am very glad to find that the noble Lord is so fond of precedent.

*LORD MACNAGHTEN: I propose, then, that the Bill should be referred to Committee of the Whole House.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: My Lords, I beg to move, as an Amendment, that it be referred to the Grand Committee on Law.

Amendment moved, to leave out the words ("a Committee of the Whole House") and insert ("the Standing Committee for Bills relating to Law, &c.")—(The Earl of Camperdown.)

On Question, whether the words proposed to be left out shall stand part of the Motion?

The House divided:—Contents 22; Not-Contents 46.

Resolved in the negative. Bill committed to the Standing Committee for Bills relating to Law, &c., accordingly.

METROPOLIS MANAGEMENT AMENDMENT ACT (1862) AMENDMENT
BILL.—(No. 213.)

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee (on Re-commitment), read and discharged.

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE (PROCEDURE) BILL

BILL.—(No. 215.)

House in Committee (on Re-commitment) (according to order).

Clause 3.

A verbal Amendment made.

Clause 5.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: There was one point with regard to Clause 5 to which I had desired to call the attention of my noble and learned Friend; but it is too late now, I think, before the final stage of the Bill is reached. This is an Act to amend the Judicature Act of England, and I am unable to see what possible benefit can be gained by applying it to Scotland or Ireland.

LORD HERSCHELL: It is to amend the Supreme Courts of Judicature Acts. There is nothing in the body of it confining the Bill to England, and it might be held to apply to Ireland but for those words.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: It certainly could not be held to apply to Scotland.

LORD HERSCHELL: Perhaps if you say Scotland you say Ireland too.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 6.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: The clause I now propose to move, if my noble and learned Friend has no objection, is with regard to the question which was raised the other night with reference to another Bill concerning costs being granted under the Judicature Act; but it appears to me this is not a fitting opportunity to settle any doubt upon that point, and I will, therefore, not move it if my noble and learned Friend will allow a little time for considering it. What I propose is that, subject to the rules of the Judicature Act, the costs of and incident to all proceedings in the Supreme Court, including the administration of estates and trusts, shall be in the discretion of the Court or Judge, and that the Court or Judge shall have full power to determine by whom and to what extent such costs shall be paid.

LORD HERSCHELL: If my noble and learned Friend will allow me, I should like to see that in print before I say anything with regard to it.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: By all means; then, I will move it now.

Amendment moved, after Clause 4, to insert as new clause—

"Subject to the Supreme Court of Judicature Acts, and the rules of court made thereunder, and to the express provisions of any Statute, whether passed before or after the commencement of this Act, the costs of and incident to all proceedings in the Supreme Court, including the administration of estates and trusts, shall be in the discretion of the court or judge, and the court or judge shall have full power to determine by whom and to what extent such costs are to be paid."—(The Lord Chancellor.)

Agreed to.

House in Committee (on Re-commitment) (according to Order): Bill reported without amendment; and to be read 3^d to-morrow.

SHERIFFS (ASSIZES EXPENSES) BILL.
(No. 218.)

Amendments reported (according to order).

LORD HERSCHELL: My Lords, upon this Motion I desire to say a word or two with regard to what took place when this Bill was in Committee. I am not going at all to revert to the subject which was then discussed, namely, the question of adding another person whose concurrence shall be necessary before the regulations which shall be made by the County Councils with regard to the reception and accommodation of the Judges are sanctioned. It is merely with reference to the operation of that clause that I desire to say a few words. It seems to me that its effect has not really received sufficient consideration. I do not propose to move the Amendment now, but what I would venture to throw out for your Lordships' consideration is that it would be really much better that the rules referring to these matters should be made by the Secretary of State for the Home Department than that they should be made by the County Councils, with the concurrence of the Lord Chancellor. I will point out in a moment my reasons for saying so. The proposal in the Bill might obviously in particular cases lead to a deadlock of a very disagreeable character, and one which, I think, would not tend to the dignity of the Judges in the administration of justice, or to the advantage of the country. The Bill proposes that these rules for the reception of the Judges and their accommodation should be made by the County Councils; but the rules would be absolutely ineffectual unless the Lord Chancellor concurred in them. No doubt that was put in as a safeguard in order to secure that arrangements which would be suitable in the administration of justice on circuit should be made, or, at all events, that no others should be made. But let me ask your Lordships to consider for a moment what would happen. Supposing County Councils made rules which the Lord Chancellor did not think fit to concur in; he would refuse to sanction them, and the consequence would be that in that particular county there would be no rules at all. Matters then would, I presume, go on as at present, and the Judge would be left to determine upon the mode of conducting the arrangements as between himself and the Sheriff. He would still have the power which he has now of enforcing his views, and the Sheriff would have to submit to them. Therefore, the result of the Lord Chancellor not concurring in the regulations proposed by the County Councils, would be that things would be brought to a deadlock and the Sheriff would be left under his present liabilities. I cannot help thinking that, in a case where the Lord Chancellor did not concur, disputes would be engendered between the Lord Chancellor and the County Councils, and that the kind of discussion which would take place as to what was sufficient accommodation for the Judges, or what sort of lodgings would do for them, or what other provisions should be made for their reception, would not be likely to be of a very edifying character, or be calculated to be of much advantage in the administration of justice. It seems to me it puts the Lord Chancellor in a very undesirable position, because there would be a possibility of his being thus brought into collision, or into something like conflict, with any of the various County Councils, because each one of them has to form its own regulations, and to carry out its own conception of what is proper accommodation and a proper mode of receiving the Judges. It seems to me, having regard to the fact that the administration of justice is a matter of general concern for the whole community, although the administration of justice may be carried out by the Judges going to each county, that the country at large is interested in the proper administration of justice and in ensuring that everywhere proper rules shall be carried out relating to the accommodation and reception of the Judges. But there is this further reason; if the whole of these expenses fall upon the county then I quite understand the feelings that the County Council ought absolutely to determine what the extent of those expenses should be. But many of these expenses do not fall entirely on the county. That part of them which relates to the accommodation of the Judges falls almost exclusively on the Treasury, and in many counties exclusively. I do not understand that my noble Friend who introduces this Bill intends that the County Councils should pay any expenses which they do not at present pay. The provision is that the regulations should be made by the County Councils, and that, of course, relates to the accommodation of the Judges. I have looked at the evidence which was given before the Committee, and it comes to this, that in many counties a very large portion of the money is found by the county for the accommodation of the Judges. The view is that they should find that money, and the only question is as to the amount to be found. Then, as regards the other expenses. When a third Assize is necessitated the Sheriff assisted in bearing the expense of that Assize. The Sheriff largely contributed to the expense of that third Assize. That, of course, would continue. Therefore, as regards the third Assize the money will be found largely by the Treasury, while the County Council is given expressly jurisdiction over the rules relating to the expenditure of that money. Of course, I am not suggesting that in every case, or in many cases, you would be likely to have these questions arising as to how the Judges should be received, or what accommodation is sufficient for them. But I can conceive County Councils existing in the future, though not, perhaps, at the present day, where there might be discussion of a very undesirable kind regarding the administration of justice, arising out of circumstances which might have taken place owing to the manner in which justice had been administered.

Now, that seems to me to be a result which it is very desirable to avoid. But, my Lords, I have this further reason, that in the view which may be adopted hereafter, when this matter is more thoroughly dealt with, I apprehend the counties will not have to bear any part of this expense. There are counties now which I believe bear practically none of these expenses. An arrangement is made with the Under-Sheriff, by which the fees that are raised are taken by him, and he bears the necessary expense of the shrievalty, so that in those cases no burden would fall on the county; and I know that is the case in a very large county which I have in my mind. At the same time you would relieve the counties of matters of Imperial interest where the burden should not fall upon them. Of course, that state of things is not brought about by this Bill, but I hope that will ultimately be the case everywhere. It is very undesirable to bring the County Councils into a matter of this description, and for them to make the rules now, when, if you have, say next year, a complete measure dealing with this matter, they will be parties really not interested in making the rules at all, because they will not have to bear the burden of the expense. I would submit under those circumstances, whether, if this be a temporary measure it would not be better to leave the determination of these matters to the Home Secretary, in which case you could not have any of these difficulties and differences of opinion, probably resulting in a deadlock, which you might have if these proposals were carried out. I do not think it is conceivable that any injustice would in that way be done to anybody, and I think that it would be better for the matter to be carried out uniformly over the whole country, than that each County Council should act according to its own ideas in reference to the rules under which the administration of justice shall be carried out.

*THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: My Lords, the proposal of my noble Friend, as shadowed out by him, is rather a large one to make at this stage of the Bill, and until we see the Amendment drawn out in terms, I should prefer to reserve such remarks as I may have to make to

it. But there are one or two things which I should like to say to your Lordships which strike me at this moment. In the first place, this question of substituting the Home Secretary for the County Councils and the Lord Chancellor had not escaped my attention, in the first instance, and I have taken steps to try to ascertain whether such an arrangement was likely to be approved of. I am bound to say I did not find that that arrangement was likely to meet with approval in certain influential quarters. But, leaving that point, there is another one which I think the noble and learned Lord has almost entirely passed over, and that is that the County Councils will have to find the money. The noble and learned Lord says the County Councils will not have to find the money, because ultimately the Under Sheriffs will become the officials of the County Councils, the fees which are received by the Under Sheriffs will go to the County Councils, and the County Councils will be able to make such arrangements as to make the sum which is received in fees reconp them for all the expenses which have been incurred in respect of the duties of the High Sheriff. That may, or may not, be the case; we do not know how that will be until it is proved; but, at all events, even if it happens, as the noble and learned Lord supposes, that the County Councils will have the control of the Under Sheriffs, the Under Sheriffs will be the officers of the County Councils, and the money will therefore pass through the hands of the County Councils. So that, to that extent at all events, the County Councils will have to find the money. Now, with regard to the Judges' lodgings, I must remind your Lordships that the Judges' lodgings is only one of the matters concerned, and that the other point, the protection of the Judges, was left unnoticed altogether. But is it true, as a matter of fact, that the Treasury do find the money at present, and are they prepared to find it in the future? I know that in certain cases the Treasury do find a very substantial part of the money, if not the whole of it; but there are a great many other cases in which they do not, and I think the Treasury would be very reluctant to take upon themselves any additional burden. Of course, if the Treas-

sury will come forward and say that they will take upon themselves the whole expense of lodging the Judges, and if they are also prepared to take upon themselves the whole expense of protecting them and managing the business of the Assizes, then I quite admit the argument is a very good one, and that we may hand over the making of these regulations to the Home Secretary, or to any other official whom the House may choose. But we have to deal with the state of things which at present exists, and here I must point out that the High Sheriffs' expenses are not limited to finding accommodation and lodgings for the Judges, but that the High Sheriff has also to find the javelin men, or else to arrange for the attendance of police who are to protect the Judge. Those police are to be paid for by the county; and when it is also proposed by this Bill to throw upon the county any other expenses of that kind which may be incurred, I think the county will be very reluctant to say that they are prepared to pay whatever expenses the Home Secretary may choose to throw upon them. The reason why the Bill at present proposes to enable the County Councils to make these regulations is because it expects the County Councils to pay, and I do not know why we should not trust the County Councils in the matter. I apprehend the whole principle of our local legislation is to trust the County Councils as far as we can in these matters. Of course, it is possible there may be certain cases where the regulations made by County Councils may not be approved. The Lord Chancellor may not approve of the regulations which are made by the County Councils. If such case occurred, what would happen? Why, you will have to fall back upon the present practice, and if the present practice would be discreditable then it is discreditable now, and it is the more discreditable because it is universal. That is the reason why this Bill is introduced. My Lords, I shall not offer any further remarks until I see the Amendment, but I think, at the same time, it is a very large Amendment to make at this stage of the Bill.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I cannot help thinking that the noble Earl has not quite sufficiently answered the objection which has been pointed out by the noble and learned Lord (Lord Herschell.) He says you will revert to the old practice if the Lord Chancellor and the County Councils disagree. I do not find that in the Bill, and I very much doubt whether that is a true construction. It seems to me things would then come to a deadlock, and I do not find any provision as to what is to be done in that event. I can only say that I cannot find it in the Bill.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: If I may be allowed to give an answer, I think what would happen would be this: If a deadlock arose the Judge would settle the matter with the High Sheriff by telling him if he did not do so-and-so, he, the Judge, would fine him, just the same as at present.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I very much doubt whether that is the true construction of the Bill. It seems to me to deprive the Judge altogether of any such power as he now possesses. Of course, I do not acquiesce that he does possess any. As the Bill is framed, it seems to me to leave the particular cases pointed out by my noble and learned Friend unprovided for. I point that out to the noble Earl, because, if that is so, and that is my present impression, he will probably think it right to meet that in the event of the Bill going further. I can only say for myself that so long as I keep my present office I shall be heartily grateful to anybody who will transfer this function to any other member of the Government. I do not feel at all anxious to exercise the jurisdiction which this Bill puts upon me, and I am not quite certain that arrangements might not be made by the Home Secretary with the County Councils which probably would satisfy everybody. I will take this opportunity of referring to the statement of the noble Earl who spoke the other night of a Judge threatening a High Sheriff for not wearing a particular coat, and I said I had no knowledge of such an occurrence; but I must mention that I have received a letter from a gentleman who says that he remembers the circumstance well, and he goes on to give the name of the persons concerned in the incident. This only shows how such things can be exaggerated. I do not name the persons to the transaction, because some of the actors in it are alive, and it might give pain to do so. It was a matter which occurred long ago, and so far from its having any relation to the dress worn by the High Sheriff, the fact is that the High Sheriff had been guilty of the greatest possible impropriety and defiance of the Queen's Representative, and it was for that that he was fined £500. It had no more relation to Court dress, or to the coat the High Sheriff was dressed in at the time, than it has to do with this Bill.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: There is just one point to which I would refer with regard to the compulsion upon the County Councils to pay. I apprehend as the Bill stands, whether they make regulations or not the construction which has been put upon the Bill is correct, that they will have to pay. It would be a considerable punishment to them that they would still have to pay all the expenses; but I really do not think we need be so very distrustful of these County Councils. We have constituted them, and our whole wish is to make them useful and responsible bodies. In most of the counties they consist of persons of considerable position in the county, and they are the principal body now in the county itself. I cannot think, therefore, that it is at all necessary we should show the distrust of them which is apparently shown by my noble Friend behind me. I have no doubt they will feel, as we all feel, that the dignity of the Judges should be consulted, and that everything which is proper to be done for the purpose of showing respect for whatever is connected with the administration of justice will be done. If it should happen, unfortunately, that any County Councils should fail in their duty, it may probably be necessary to deal with them in another way; but I quite agree with my noble and learned Friend behind me, that if the regulations are to be imposed upon the County Councils by an authority from without, then it is only reasonable that the Treasury, that is to say the Secretary of State, should act in the matter, and I do not suppose my noble and learned Friend would make any great objection to that arrangement.

Bill to be read 3^d on Monday next.

BIRSTALL WESLEYAN CHAPEL TRUST SCHEME CONFIRMATION BILL.—
(No. 204.)

House in Committee (according to order); Bill reported without amendment; and to be read 3^a to-morrow.

ALDERSHOT ROADS BILL.—(No. 210.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (EARL BROWNLOW): My Lords, the object of this Bill is so to re-construct and re-organise the roads and tracks in the neighbourhood of Pirbright and Bisley Common that a sufficient track may be found for rifle practice with the long range rifles without any undue danger to the public. The Bill has passed through the other House, and I trust your Lordships will give it a Second Reading. I propose that the Bill should be referred to a Committee of the whole House.

Bill read 2^a (according to order), and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday next.

COMMITTEE OF SELECTION FOR STANDING COMMITTEES.

Report from, That the Committee have added to the Standing Committee for General Bills the Lord Chaworth (E. Meath) for the consideration of the Pharmacy Act (Ireland) (1875) Amendment Bill, and the Lord Watson and the Lord Macnaghten for the consideration of the Marriages in British Embassies, &c. Bill. Read, and ordered to lie on the Table.

BANKRUPTCY BILL.—(No. 188.)

PENAL SERVITUDE.

QUESTIONS—OBSERVATIONS.

*LORD NORTON: In rising to ask the Lord Chancellor whether the Government intend to introduce a Bill next Session on the subject of the length of terms of penal servitude, said: This is a repetition of the question which I put to the Lord Chancellor at the end of last Session, and I need not repeat the reasons for the question, which I gave at full length then. The answer that I got from the noble and learned Lord was, that he was aware that the subject was under the notice of the Home Secretary, but that it had not been considered by the Government. I understand now that a Bill is ready drafted, and I hope that the noble and learned Lord will be able to tell your Lordships that it has been approved. What I want to know is, now that the commencement of the next Session is so very near, if the noble and learned Lord can tell us whether the Government have made up their minds to introduce this Bill early next Session. I can only say it is a far more important Bill than it seems from the size of the Bill, the proposition being simply to restore among the terms of penal servitude a minimum term of three years which was omitted in the Act of 1879. In a very interesting little pamphlet, published by Sir Edmund Du Cane, in 1885, he pointed out two things: first, that a very great mistake was made by Parliament in 1854, when penal servitude was substituted for the exhausted and no longer practicable punishment of transportation. I served upon the Committees which considered this subject myself, and I protested then, as Sir Edmund Du Cane says, against the mistake of assigning periods of penal servitude in proportion to the previous terms of transportation, which was a punishment, as your Lordships know, of no similitude whatever to the substituted punishment of penal servitude. It was also a mistake, that not only were the maximum terms a great deal too long, but by the omission of the minimum term, the term which comes between the maximum term of imprisonment and the minimum term of penal servitude in the Act of 1879, there is a want of sequence in the scale of punishments which is very detrimental to their efficacy. As Sir Edmund Du Cane puts it, the two punishments of imprisonment and penal servitude are absolutely similar. They are, indeed, only two kinds of the same category of punishment, the latter being the longer and ending in service on public works. But the two ingradations would make a complete scale of punishments. The longer terms of penal servitude had lost much of their deterrent effect by their length, which is the principal object of all punishment; but this minimum term which has been omitted would be found to be most useful, and, by its omission, leaves a gap in the centre of the scale, and I am perfectly convinced myself that the simple restoration of that minimum term of three years, which is the whole object of the Bill which I understand the Home Secretary has ready drafted for introduction, would make the punishment of imprisonment a much more useful weapon in the hands of the Judges and Magistrates of this country. They ask for that restoration, and I believe we should not have the number of re-committals to prison, which is a painful subject of comment by all visitors of prisons at this moment. It is at this moment, I believe, the only thing which arrests the steady decrease of crime in this country which has been brought about by our improved system of education, Reformatories, and Discharged Prisoners' Aid Societies. I therefore hope the Government will be able to assure your Lordships that they intend to introduce a Bill for that purpose early next Session.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I am afraid I am unable to give my noble Friend anything very satisfactory, because what I was about to state he appears already to know, that is to say, that [the Bill he mentions has been drafted, and has been approved of. It contains in it the clauses to which he refers, that is to say clauses for the introduction of a minimum term of penal servitude of three years. With regard to the other point which he asks about, I am unable to give him any information as to the time when Her Majesty's Government will introduce the Bill, as its introduction will depend on the state of public business.

MARRIAGES IN MALTA.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

*THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY, in rising to ask Her Majesty's Government—(1) Whether any regulations now proposed to be made, under an ordinance to be submitted to the Council of Government in Malta, to regulate the civil effects of marriages celebrated heretofore, or which will in future be celebrated in that island, will in any way invalidate, or cast any doubt upon the validity of, any mixed marriages heretofore celebrated in bona fide with the sanction of the constituted authorities of the island; (2) on what ground of law it is proposed to be declared that any marriages so celebrated will be invalid in the future, said: My Lords, the questions of which I have given notice, and which are upon the Paper, arise out of certain statements which appear in the Correspondence connected with Sir Lintorn Simmons's Special Mission to the Vatican with regard to religious questions in the Island of Malta, and I must say that the statements as they stand have given rise to a great deal of disquietude. I need scarcely assure your Lordships that I shall not introduce any religious exasperation into the discussion of questions like these, although they are very important from a religious point of view. I shall import no odium theologicum into the question, but I will just read, in the first instance, two paragraphs from a letter of Sir Lintorn Simmons to Cardinal Rampolla, and when I have done so I think you will agree with me that it was not wonderful that they have occasioned disquietude. The first paragraph is this—

"The undersigned (that is, Sir L. Simmons), has to inform your Eminence that Her Britannic Majesty's Government will cause a project of law to be introduced in the Council of Government of Malta in accordance with its declarations."

The first declaration—being a declaration of the Pope, having for its object to regulate the civil effects of marriages celebrated heretofore, or which will in future be celebrated—is this—

"That marriages celebrated in Malta by all those who profess the Catholic religion, whether both contracting parties be Catholics, or whether one of them be a Catholic and the other a non-Catholic, are not, and shall not be, valid if they are not celebrated according to the form established by the Council of Trent."

And a second declaration of His Holiness was—

"That persons professing any other religion may validly celebrate their marriage without the necessity of going through the form established by the Council of Trent."

Well, a vast amount of, I do not hesitate to say, alarm and anxiety has been created by the statement that what are called mixed marriages between Roman Catholics and persons of other religions are not at the present moment, and shall not be in future, valid unless they are celebrated according to the regulations of the Council of Trent. There have been a very great number of marriages during the last 90 years, since we first entered upon the occupation of the island, which have not been celebrated in that manner, and, therefore, the Pope's declaration goes to show that all those marriages are invalid, that all marriages so celebrated will, in future, be invalid. That declaration affects all ranks of persons in our own Church, as well as Presbyterians, Methodists, and others, in great numbers, who have been married upon the faith of a licence from the Bishop of Gibraltar, or upon licence issued by the Governor of Malta. All those marriages, according to this declaration, are at the present moment invalid, and it is declared that no valid marriage can be celebrated in future except in the particular manner described. Of course, also a great deal of property, a great deal of character, and a great deal of position, depends upon this declaration. The British Government intend, as we were informed by a letter which appeared in the Press, by direction of the noble Marquess, on the 18th of this month, to remove the doubts which have arisen by legislation in cases in which neither party is a Roman Catholic. It is desirable to remove those doubts by legislation, and in order to secure that legislation it has been found necessary to consult the Vatican. Well, there is no doubt as to what the answer from the Vatican is. Of course, marriages in which neither of the parties is a Roman Catholic will be considered from this time as valid. But the question of mixed marriages remains. That is a very serious question, and in Malta a very large one, if the Pope's declaration is to be our law. Very serious civil effects will be created by the declaration that they are not valid unless celebrated according to the decrees of the Council of Trent, which require that where either party is a Roman Catholic the marriage shall be celebrated before a Roman Catholic priest, and the custom has grown up in modern times of a refusal on the part of

The Archbishop of Canterbury

Roman Catholic priests to celebrate such marriages at all unless there is a promise that the children shall be brought up as Roman Catholics. That is the first point. There is another promise, though of less importance, that the marriage shall not be celebrated again by a minister of any other religious body. The action to be taken of declaring Protestant marriages, as we speak of them, to be valid in future, would seem to make those mixed marriages which have not been celebrated with Roman Catholic rites more doubtful than they can be regarded as being at present, and would make them impossible in future. It would certainly leave a wretched inheritance. There is no question whatever as to the force of the language. It speaks of marriages which have been celebrated "heretofore," and the state of matters which I have described will greatly curtail the liberty of English people in the future. We contend that such marriages are valid already, and that they do not want validity at all. We do not admit that they want to be made valid. The whole view of those who desire to introduce this legislation, that is to say, to adopt the declaration of the Pope (those persons not being, of course, our own Government, except as a matter of necessity or policy), is that these marriages are now legally invalid, and to be treated as invalid in future. But that most serious issue rests upon a single assertion. That single assertion is this, that the Canon Law is in Malta the Civil Law in respect of marriage. It is asserted that the Civil Law in Malta is, and always has been, as regards marriage, the Canon Law of the Roman Church. That is stated by Sir Lintorn Simmons perfectly distinctly in a Memorandum with which he himself, upon the advice of the Law Officers in Malta, furnished the Court of the Vatican. He says—

"The law of Malta in regard to the forms necessary to the validity of a marriage even as to the contract is the Canon Law, and in that respect the Canon Law is also the Civil Law of Malta."

Now, my Lords, what does that mean? Does it not present itself as a very singular thing, in the first instance, that Canon Law should be the Law in Malta as regards the marriages of all persons? I need not refer to the fact that the Canon Law rules as regards ecclesiastical benefices, advowsons, and matters of that kind. Of course, it does. But we are told that a single fragment of the Canon Law exists in Malta for all persons for this one purpose. My own idea is that neither this nor any other part of the Canon Law has been the Civil Law in Malta. I should like, parenthetically, to insert a single consideration here, namely, that it is not the Canon Law which is named in the Declaration of the Pope, but the decrees of the Council of Trent. Now I wish to observe, in passing, that it is admitted on all hands that the decrees of the Council of Trent are not ipso facto part of the Canon Law; they only become part of the Canon Law if there is some special law or Order of State by which they are inserted, importing the provisions of the Council of Trent into the Canon Law. That is a matter on which I do not wish to speak further now, and I pass it by for the present, because the point now rests upon the assertion that the Canon Law is the Civil Law of Malta. But how is it shown that the Canon Law is the law of Malta? We have had lately a Report from the Crown Advocate of Malta on this subject which the Right Hon. Mr. W. H. Smith read the other evening in another place, and with your Lordships' permission I will quote it. In his answer to a question put to him on the subject the Right Hon. Mr. W. H. Smith said—

"The Crown Advocate at Malta has reported that the matters which in Malta are governed by the Canon Law are marriages, ecclesiastical benefices and advowsons. The Canon Law of these matters was introduced into these islands by usage long before the British occupation, and has remained in force to the present day."

Now, I particularly call your Lordships' attention to what immediately follows in the right hon. Gentleman's statement.

"This is the whole of the Report."

There are no grounds of law alleged at all upon which that is laid down. The whole of the statement is that—

"The Canon Law on these matters was introduced into the island by usage long before the British occupation and has so remained."

But, my Lords, usage is never quoted in matters of this kind, and things have never been settled upon usage when there is an enactment to be produced, and clearly there is no enactment to be produced in that sense. But, on the other hand, we have an enactment to produce on our side. There was an enactment made in the contrary sense, and I say the onus rests upon the Crown Advocate and other Law Officers of Malta to show us when and how the enactment was superseded, which I shall lay before your Lordships, and that it is not sufficient merely to make a statement of that kind. I will take, then, this as the text, that the existing law as regards marriages is the Canon Law, and that that was the usage in the island before the time of the British occupation. Now, it is mere matter of history that the law under which the island was governed at the time of the British occupation was a very distinct Code, called the Code Rohan. Rohan as your Lordships know, was Grand Master of the Knights of Malta, and by the year 1782 the Code Rohan was fully established. A provision in the Code Rohan orders that—

"If a marriage shall have been contracted between a foreigner and a Maltese woman, or between a Maltese man and a foreign woman, in default of written compacts and agreements, it shall be considered as having been contracted in accordance with the practice and usage of the country."

That is to say, unless there is some written contract or compact, or agreement to the contrary, a marriage contracted (it does not say how, there are no limitations) shall be considered to have been celebrated according to the practice and usage of the country. Therefore, of course, in the supposed case, it was not contracted according to the decrees of the Council of Trent, since an article in the Code Rohan has to state that it was to be considered as if it had been contracted in that way. So that under the Knights of Malta the Code Rohan was in force containing a provision to the contrary of what was said to be the provision of the Canon Law; and it had been so for a long time before that, because there is a book called Appeals from Malta, published in 1811, where it is pointed out that the Code Rohan (I should tell your Lordships that these appeals are put forward by the nobility, gentry, and people of Malta to the English people) differs very little from the Code which was in existence in the year 1721. Then came the occupation by the French Republic, and it is quite certain that the French did not introduce the Canon

Law. But we find in the history of Malta that one of the chief objections of the Maltese people to the dominion of the French arose from the feeling on the part of "The clergy, who not only saw themselves despoiled of their resources, but withdrawn from the influence of the Court of Rome."

It is very clear, therefore, that the island had a distinct Code, and that in that Code there was an article which touched the question of mixed marriages, and ratified them, without providing that the supposed foreigner must be a Roman Catholic. Then, in the next place, I suppose, it will not be contended that the English introduced the Canon Law. In the year 1811 was published this book of Appeals of the Nobility, Gentry, and People of Malta to the consideration of the British Government, and there we read a complaint on this very account that the British Government had adopted and recognised this very Code Rohan. It is stated there that the Code of Rohan and the Decrees of Hompesch, who succeeded Rohan, were in force. Those were the only rules of justice and the lex scripta actually in force; and this book is actually a tirade against the British Government for governing the country still under the Code Rohan. I have seen the terms of the Proclamation of 1801 quoted on the other side. That declares that

"The King's Majesty of England will protect your country, your holy religion, your persons, and your property."

It is a promise to protect their country, religion, and rights, and not to introduce the Canon Law. That it was in force is refuted by the bold tirade against our Government which runs through this book of 1811, complaining that the Code Rohan has been adopted by the English. Throughout the whole book there is not the slightest mention made of, or request for, the Canon Law. I pass over a number of other passages, as I do not wish to weary your Lordships. But we have abundant proof there, that the Canon Law was not recognised as the law. Then there is a well-known book, or materials for a book, on the history of Malta, published in 1811, which gives us the condition of Maltese law. It states—

"In the present practice of Malta, whenever difficulties arise, not only precedents are sought for of cases formerly decided in the Island, but the Roman Law and the decisions of the Italian Doctors are referred to."

Then came the Proclamation of the year 1813, which is in its terms very like the Proclamation issued in the year 1801. I need not detain your Lordships with that. But let us see if any of the learned persons who have investigated the question on the spot have ever found, or even heard, that the Canon Law was the Civil Law in Malta. There is not a trace of it. Take the Report of Mr. Austin and Sir George Cornwall Lewis in 1839. That bears out all that we have seen already. This was an inquiry into the law of Malta, and it says—

"The law of Malta is mainly derived medially or immediately from the Roman Law; its technical language for the most part is the language of the Roman Law, and it is the boast of the people that they have the Roman Law."

Again, Sir George Cornwall Lewis and Mr. Austin say—

"Most of the Maltese Law is derived directly from the Roman Law; and there have been new principles introduced into the Roman Law from the Law of England," but not from the Canon Law. They say that many of the principles of the law of England have been introduced into it. There is not a mention of the Canon Law having any part in determining the destinies or affecting the property or persons of the people of Malta. Then, again, it is stated that

"The members of other Churches; that is, other than the Roman Catholic Church, have complete protection in their public worship."

I apprehend that would not have been the case if a member of any Protestant denomination was obliged as a solemn act to be married only before a Roman Catholic priest; so that if he is not married before a Roman priest, he is to lose his civil rights as a married man, and that his children shall lose their rights; or if he had been bound, upon the celebration of his marriage by a Roman priest, to make a promise as to the bringing up of his children, and also that he would not go into his own church to be married by licence of his own Bishop in accordance with the rites of his own Church. There is no indication of anything in the least like that; and the Article of the Code Rohan was established as the law of the island on this point. But, besides that, we have had a perfectly continuous current of authority upon the matter from time to time. We have had the interpretation of 90 years. During the whole of those 90 years licences have been granted by the English clergy, and Civil Authorities in the island, whether the Bishop or Governor; marriages have been celebrated by our clergy, and by the ministers of other denominations there, and the certificates of those marriages have been, I am assured, received in Probate and Divorce proceedings, both in our own country and in the Courts of Malta, as establishing the validity of such marriages. My contention is, that the marriages are valid; and I say the last thing we want is that they should be now made valid by an enactment. My Lords, it would introduce a state of things in which, by our own law, every child of a mixed marriage in Malta would have to be brought up to be a Roman Catholic. There is no such state of things anywhere else in our dominions. We have other places quite as Roman Catholic as Malta—Quebec and the Mauritius, for example—and in both of those places people can be married by their own rites, and mixed marriages can be carried out without any difficulty. Such is, and should be, the case in Malta. The Canon Law is not the Civil Law of Malta, and to make it such would be to introduce the decrees of the Council of Trent for the first time as the Law of Marriage in the island. The Canon Law has had its power over all Catholic countries at one time or another; but what I particularly contend is that all I have said shows that in Malta, in regard to this particular point, it long ago came to an end there as elsewhere. It is not our marriages that need vindication; but so strange an assertion as that in this day in respect of civil marriages—the Canon Law is the law of Malta. This would fix the yoke of the Canon Law and the Decrees of the Council of Trent together upon marriage for the first time. As I have said, the Decrees of the Council of Trent did not, and do not, become part of the Canon Law or Civil Law in any country unless by special intervention of the State. My Lords, there is a very strong feeling on this matter both among Nonconformists and Church people. This very week the great Wesleyan Conference is debating this matter, and I would urge that law and justice should be done in this matter. We desire to be fair and just to Roman Catholics, and to recognise the rights of Roman Catholics, but justice to Roman Catholics in this case does not certainly involve or require the sacrifice of the rights or the violation of the consciences of our own people. I am convinced that the desire of the Government is to be just on all sides, but it would not be acting justly to our own people that these arrangements of Sir Lintorn Simmons should verbatim et literatim be carried out. I have very little doubt that the Government will be able to give an answer that will allay the great disquietude that exists on this matter—an uneasiness that is increasing from day to day; and, in these circumstances, I have thought it right to ask the Government whether they intend to do anything which will cast doubt upon the mixed marriages which have hitherto been considered valid when celebrated bond fide under the authorities of the island, and also on what ground of law it is proposed to declare that marriages so celebrated will be invalid in the future?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Lord KNUTSFORD): My Lords, in reply to the most rev. Prelate, I have to state that the ordinance which has been referred to in his question has only been sent over in draft for the consideration of Her Majesty's Government. It does not in itself invalidate any marriages which have been heretofore celebrated. It is proposed in the Ordinance to validate marriages as to the validity of which doubts have been entertained. Those doubts have not been, and are not, created by the ordinance itself, but they have existed for many years. In the year 1865 the question was raised and laid before the Law Officer of Malta, and before the Law Officers of this country, and, after full consideration of all those opinions, Mr. Cardwell, then Secretary of State for the Colonies, advised that the doubts should be removed, and that validity should be given to marriages contracted by formalities which the parties themselves believed to be binding. He suggested that for this purpose a local ordinance should be passed under the powers given to the Local Legislature to pass Acts validating past marriages. Such powers were given by the Imperial Act 28 & 29 Viet., cap 64. It does not appear, however, that anything was done at that time. There is no question as to the validity of mixed marriages celebrated in Malta by Roman Catholic priests, but doubts have arisen as to the validity of mixed marriages which have not been celebrated before a Roman Catholic priest. The highest Legal Authorities in Malta, including the present Chief Justice and the present Crown Advocate, have all advised us that marriages in Malta are governed by the Canon Law, of which the Decrees of Trent form an integral part. My answer, therefore, to a great part of the most rev. Prelate's argument is that the Law Officers have advised that the Canon Law is the law of Malta, and that the Decrees of the Council of Trent are part of that law. It may be contended that the Decrees of the Council of Trent have no force in the island unless it is proved that the Council was duly promulgated; but the Legal Authorities in Malta have advised that it was duly promulgated there; that it was accepted by the Civil Authorities; and that it has ever since continued to be the Civil Law of the island. Upon this assumption, the same Legal Authorities have advised that the celebration of mixed marriages before a Roman Catholic priest has always been deemed indispensable in order to give validity to such marriages. I understand now, from the argument which has been brought forward by the most rev. Prelate, that he disputes the opinion which is held by these Maltese Legal Authorities — namely, that marriages in Malta are governed by the Canon Law. It would, of course, be quite out of place now for me to argue in defence of the opinion which has been formed by the highest Legal Authorities in Malta, but I should like to refer very briefly to one or two points brought forward by the most rev. Prelate. In the first place, he has referred to Quebec and Mauritius. Those colonies were in a very different position from Malta, inasmuch as both were conquered, and the Canon Law was not in operation there before they were conquered. In Quebec the law is founded on the old French Code Civile, known as the Coutumes de Paris. In Mauritius no question could have arisen, as there is a civil marriage under the Civil Code known as the Code Napoleon and the Civil status ordinance of 1801. As regards the Code Rohan, which has also been referred to by the most rev. Prelate, I can only say I do not profess to give a legal opinion on the clause he has mentioned, but I put a very different construction upon it. The word used in it is "forestieri," strangers, foreigners, and it provides for the case of a foreigner marrying a native, but there is nothing in that particular article to show that they may not both be Roman Catholics. All it says is that if a foreigner, a "stranger," marries a Maltese the marriage should be conducted according to the laws of that country.

*THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY: The words are "shall be considered to have been" performed according to the laws.

*LORD KNUTSFORD: That is, for the purposes and in regard of the partition of property. The whole of that chapter, from beginning to end, refers to the partition of property arising out of a marriage, nor, as far as I am aware, is there any provision as to the mode or formalities of celebrating marriages. However, I do not wish to argue the question. I can only say that the construction of it, as I am advised in the matter, is entirely different from the construction placed upon it by the most rev. Prelate. The Report of Sir G. C. Lewis and Mr. Austin refers to certain parts of the law of Malta which have no bearing upon marriage, and the very words quoted by the most rev. Prelate show that the Commissioners were not dealing with the whole question. I think I may say that there is, in truth, no allusion to the Marriage Law of Malta in the whole of that Report. Her Majesty's Government will, of course, carefully consider and will submit to the Law Officers of the Crown any legal opinions or arguments which may be given on this question in opposition to the view which we have been advised is correct, namely, that the Canon Law is the Civil Law of Malta. We have certainly proceeded on the assumption, which we believe to be correct, that marriages in Malta have been, and are, governed by the Canon Law. This is not the place to hold a legal argument, especially between the most

rev. Prelate and myself, who do not speak with authority upon the legal views of this question: and I have only to add that Her Majesty's Government fully recognise the importance of the subject, and that no decision will be arrived at until all the points have been carefully and fully considered.

LORD HERSCHELL: My Lords, I should like to ask one question upon a point which arises out of this discussion and the answer which has just been given by the noble Lord. I understand his position to be that certain high Legal Authorities now express the view that the Canon Law at present governs the law of Malta. What I should like to know is this: Whether this has been the view acted upon by the most rev. Prelate, that these mixed marriages, which, according to that view, would be illegal, have taken place over a long series of years and have been recognised as valid marriages not only in the Courts of this country, but in the Courts of Malta. I think it is an important matter to know whether that is the case, and whether during the many years that these marriages have been taking place, they have been held judicially in Malta to be invalid, or, on the contrary, have been held to be valid, and the children of them to be legitimate and entitled to the ordinary rights of legitimate children.

LORD KNUTSFORD: I understand the noble and learned Lord to refer to mixed marriages which have not been performed before a Roman Catholic priest?

LORD HERSCHELL: Yes.

LORD KNUTSFORD: We are not aware of a single case which has been brought before the Court of that kind. There have been cases in Malta where the parties have been married before a Roman Catholic priest and have been some time afterwards married before a Protestant minister, but we are not aware of any case in which that question has been raised before the Maltese Courts. That is why I am not prepared to argue the question now. I think it is quite probable that where the Governor has given a licence, and a certificate has been granted, it may be recognised in the Courts here, but I am not aware of any decision in the Courts of Malta.

LORD KINNAIRD: May I ask whether it is proposed that any power which the Governor of Malta has hitherto exercised should be taken away under the new project of law?

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): The noble Lord is asking a question in regard to the future. As my noble Friend has stated, the proposals of the Maltese Legislature in draft are now before Her Majesty's Government, and will be subjected to the most careful consideration. Therefore, it will not be possible for us to say in the present state of affairs what future legislation there may be.

LORD KINNAIRD: May I ask whether the matter will be brought before this House before it is finally ratified?

[No answer was given.]

TITHE RENT-CHARGE.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

LORD BRABOURNE, in rising to ask the Prime Minister whether, before the re-introduction of any Bill upon the subject of tithes, he will cause to be laid before Parliament statistics as to the varying incidence of the tithe rent-charge in English counties, the proportion in which the same is now paid by owners and by occupiers not being owners, and the number of distraints for tithe rent-charge which have been levied in English counties during the last three years, said: My Lords, the question I have put upon the Paper will only require a few sentences on my part to explain it, but it can hardly be denied that the matter is an important one. During the existence of the present Government several measures have been introduced upon the subject of tithes, all of which have from the force of circumstances been withdrawn; but, as far as I am aware, no statistics whatever have been placed on the Table of either House with regard to the important question with which those Bills have dealt. I think it has very often been said with regard to these measures by supporters of the Government that they really do not reopen the settlement of 1875; but how that can be said when proposals are made to alter the conditions in the country with regard to it it is rather difficult to imagine. When it is said that that will be the effect that will be produced by legislation, it is desirable we should know the facts not only with regard to the difficulty which tithe owners will have in collecting their tithes, but also the present number of tithe rent-charges in the different English counties. I have seen it stated that four or five English counties pay more than half the entire rent-charge. This, I think, is a matter on which we should obtain information before we legislate on the matter. But there are other points which I think press even more severely upon us; that is to say, it is more necessary they should be elucidated, because various Governments have dealt with them. It is believed in this country that what the Government have intended to do, and will, no doubt, wish to do, is to make the owners pay some impost: and it is desirable to ascertain whether there are any owners who do not pay the charge, and whose occupiers pay the rate instead. Again, it is desirable we should know whether there is a large number of owners who do pay, what the position of the tithe-payers has been, and how the whole question will be affected. Then there is another question, and that is the number of distrains for tithes rent-charge which have been levied in the English counties during the last three years. I think it is desirable, before any legislation is proposed, that we should know something upon these points, and for this reason. We are told in many quarters that the whole legislation proposed has been in consequence of the opposition made in parts of Wales to the collection of tithes, but as far as I can understand this has not been at all in connection with the collection of tithes, but in consequence of the incidence of the tithes themselves. Of course, if the Welsh people choose to disobey the law, as long as it is the law, it is the duty of the Government to put the law in force; and why there should be legislation unless you show that there is some necessity for it upon the basis of statistical information rather passes my comprehension. The importance of this question can, I think, hardly be denied. I do not know whether the Government are aware of the gathering feeling, especially in the southern counties, with respect to the legislation that has been already proposed upon this question, but that it is gaining strength I cannot doubt. I have recently seen a letter written by a very near relative of the noble Marquess the Prime Minister, of which I will only say it shows that sons do not always take the same view as their fathers take; and, therefore, I do not wish to suggest for a moment that the noble Marquess is bound by the opinion of his relative, but the writer of the letter presses for this kind of legislation, because he considers that we are upon the eve of a struggle for the endowments of the Established Church. Without passing any opinion upon this judgment, I am quite satisfied that if we are upon the eve of such a struggle, the sooner there is full inquiry made as to the endowments likely to be attacked, and they are placed on a sound footing, the better will it be for those who have to defend them. Therefore, I merely put the matter before your Lordships, that as we are threatened with a re-introduction of a Bill on this important subject, it is most desirable that statistics should be laid before Parliament which will enable Parliament to come to a just conclusion in regard to the actual position of the question.

*THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I will follow the good example of my noble Friend by avoiding all contestable matter in reference to this subject, and will simply address myself to answering the question he has addressed to me. I am afraid, in the first place, I cannot make the re-introduction of the Bill of the Government subject to the completion of the statistics for which the noble Lord asks, because, even if the statistics were to be easily obtained between this and November, considering that that period includes the habitual holidays of all sorts of persons employed in public offices, I do not think there would be sufficient time to enable the statistics to be collected with the care and accuracy necessary to give them such value that they could be used with confidence and certainty. But, even with that deduction, I am afraid I can hardly give an unqualified affirmative to the question of my noble Friend. He asks me to lay before Parliament statistics as to "the varying incidents of the tithe rent-charge in English counties," and I should have been very glad if my noble Friend had appended a gloss which would have indicated the precise meaning which that phrase would bear when submitted to the officer who would have to make up the Return. What is "the varying incidence of the tithe rent-charge?" The tithe rent-charge was imposed by the provision and machinery of the Act of 1836, and I do not think there is any general incidence for any particular county or locality. There is simply laid down by agreement what is thought to be a fair rent-charge under the provisions of the Act of 1836, and that is returned to the Tithe Commissioners. I do not believe there is any such general principle either over large or small areas as the question of my noble Friend assumes. As to "the proportion in which the same is now paid by owners and by occupiers not being owners," there is no authority that has the slightest cognisance of the facts.

LORD BRABOURNE: There is the incumbent.

*THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: There is no public office which has cognisance of the state of facts. It would involve the question in each case whether the man who paid the rent-charge was of a particular bit of land the occupier or the owner. Very often a man is the occupier of a certain number of fields, and the owner of a certain number of adjoining fields; he might pay the tithe for the whole of this land, and the incumbent would have no power of distinguishing between that which was owned and that which was occupied. A Return, the value of which would depend upon its accuracy, and which must contain many very complicated figures to be obtained from 20,000 clergymen all over England—well, I will not say more of it than that it would not be completed by next November. I am not sufficiently acquainted with legal practice to know whether it is possible to obtain a Return of "the number of distrains for tithe rent-charge which have been levied in English counties during the last three years," or whether materials for that Return exist. Of course, where there have been distrains ordered by any Court they would not be difficult to ascertain; but those restraints are not ordered by the Court, and, therefore, I am at a loss to know where to obtain the necessary materials; but if it is possible there will not be any objection to the Return being produced.

LORD BRABOURNE: What I mean by "varying incidence" is the amount of the tithe in relation to the letting or rateable value of the land; in some counties the proportion is very high, and in others it is very low.

*THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: That, I think, is quite impossible as regards entire counties, for I know by my own experience that of two fields lying next each other the amount of the tithe in relation to the value of the land or the rent it bears will vary as much as possible, and to get at these variations you would have almost to take each particular field from one end of the country to the other.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I suppose there would be no difficulty in giving the total amount of tithe paid in each county? It varies, no doubt, in a most remarkable manner; but I think it might be obtained.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: It is already before the House.

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: Lord Beauchamp moved for the Return two years ago.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I believe that showed that the tithe rent varied very greatly in different parts of England. I am not moving now for the Return.

LORD BRABOURNE: My noble Friend will see that Lord Beauchamp's Return gives it for each county, the total amount in each parish, and the amount of appropriation between the lay impropriators, the ecclesiastical establishments, and the schools.

House adjourned at twenty minutes before Seven o'clock, till To-morrow, a quarter past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Thursday, 24th July, 1890.

QUESTIONS.

CHELSEA PENSIONERS.

MR. WHITMORE (Chelsea): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, considering the smallness of the money allowance received by the pensioners of the Royal Hospital, Chelsea, he can see his way to arrange with the Commissioners of the Hospital for the free distribution amongst the pensioners of some portion of the tobacco seized as contraband, and which is now destroyed?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I am afraid I cannot add anything to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Salisbury in March in a similar case, that I could not see my way to distribute the contraband tobacco as suggested.

AGRICULTURAL INSTRUCTION.

SIR RICHARD PAGET (Somerset, Wells): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether his attention has been drawn to a paragraph in the last Report of the Science and Art Department, signed T. H. Huxley, Dean, in which it is recommended that—

"The Courses of Agricultural Instruction at the Normal School should be made more widely known by advertisements in the agricultural newspapers"; and whether, in view of the extreme difficulty of extricating from the "Directory with Regulations," published by the Department of Science and Art, and the Annual Report of the same Department, information respecting the advantages and opportunities offered by the Department to teachers and others desirous of receiving instruction in agriculture, or of the results of the examinations in agriculture, or of expenses incurred in connection therewith, he will cause a summary to be prepared, for general circulation among the managers and teachers of Rural Elementary Schools, setting out shortly all necessary information with respect to the important matter above referred to?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (SIR W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): I freely acknowledge the importance of the subject-matter of this question, and I promise to see what can be done to make the advantages offered by the Science and Art Department more widely known. But it is, perhaps, as well that I should point out to my hon. Friend that one of the courses in agriculture at the Normal School of Science is not adapted to teachers of Elementary Schools, and that as regards the other—the short summer course—there are, I fear, already more applicants than can be admitted under existing circumstances.

THE RIVER CLWYD.

MR. ROBERTS (Flint, &c.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that Major Rowley Conway, who is a member of the Board of Conservators of the Rivers Clwyd and Elwy, has caused large stones to be placed in that part of the River Clwyd known as the Junction Pool, which is admittedly tidal and navigable, so as to prevent the netting of it by licensed fishermen: whether he is aware that criminal proceedings have twice been taken by him against the fishermen for netting, and that on both occasions the Justices considered their jurisdiction to be ousted by a bona fide claim of right; and whether the Board of Trade will, in the interests of the navigation of the river and of the fishermen, take steps to cause these stones to be removed?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (SIR M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): I am informed that at Junction Pool the river is not either navigable or tidal, and the Board of Trade have, therefore, no power to interfere. I am also informed that the matter in dispute is before the Superior Courts.

THE LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL.

MR. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board when he means to introduce the Bill to amend those provisions of "The Local Government Act, 1888," which relate to the procedure of the London County Council?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): A Bill has been prepared dealing with certain questions relating to the financial arrangements of the London County Council, but I regret that there is no prospect of its becoming law this Session. We intend to introduce the Bill early next Session.

LOCAL MARINE BOARD AT CARDIFF.

Mr. GOURLEY (Sunderland): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he has agreed to establish a Local Marine Board at Cardiff; if so, if it is his intention to appoint representative sailors as members of the Board?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: It is intended to establish a Local Marine Board at Cardiff, and I contemplate the appointment upon it of one or more members of the class of able seamen.

OCCUPATION OF ZEILA.

Mr. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he can inform the House whether it is the intention of the Government to concede to the French the right to occupy Zeila?

*THE UNDERSECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSON, Manchester, N.E.): No, Sir; there is no such intention.

MERCHANT SEAMEN'S FUND.

Mr. LYELL (Orkney and Shetland): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether it is the case that the Government have confiscated the payments made by George Tulloch, a Shetland seaman, to the Merchant Seamen's Fund without any equivalent return; whether these payments were compulsory deductions from his wages; and whether the Government will rectify the mistake, by ordering the repayment of the same to be made to George Tulloch?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: Before the year 1851 the Merchant Seamen's Fund was managed by Trustees, who received and disbursed the compulsory contributions of seamen. In the year 1851, the Fund being insolvent, an Act was passed to wind it up, and relief was limited to those seamen only who voluntarily continued to contribute. George Tulloch ceased to contribute when the payments became voluntary. He is consequently, by this omission, disqualified for the grant of a pension. The contributions of George Tulloch were not received by the Board of Trade, and no mistake has been made by the Board, who have no authority to return any contributions he may have made.

EDINBURGH TELEGRAPHISTS.

Mr. WALLACE (Edinburgh, E.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether it is the fact that his new Regulations as to the sick pay of telegraphists were not officially announced to the telegraphists in the Edinburgh Office until the 15th July, being more than a month after their announcement elsewhere; and, if so, whether he is willing to state the reason for this; and whether the recent Regulations as to increased pay of telegraphists were announced in Edinburgh a day later than elsewhere; and, if so, will he explain the cause?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): The new Regulations as to sick pay were communicated to surveyors on the 19th of May last, and effect was given to them in Edinburgh from the 1st of June, the date when they came into operation. They were not announced on the 15th of July, and there is no occasion for any official announcement, but I referred to them in this House on the 13th of June. The other Regulations referred to were despatched from London to Edinburgh at the same time as to other towns, but did not arrive in time to be announced on the 14th of July, and so were announced on the 15th. The point is of no importance, and they took effect from the same date in all towns. It is not always possible to insure that all Regulations, even when despatched at the same time, shall be announced simultaneously in every office.

FLASHING SIGNALS.

Mr. BALLANTINE (Coventry): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether Admiral Colomb's system of flashing signals was submitted to the Admiralty for trial in 1861, and formally adopted in 1867; whether the Admiralty during this period refused all pecuniary aid to Admiral Colomb for carrying out the experiments; whether the proposals of Redl, an Austrian, for the improvement of Naval signals, were submitted to the Admiralty in 1852, and finally rejected in 1859; and what money was paid to Redl by the Admiralty during this period for carrying out his experiments, beyond the sum of £1,500 shown in the Estimates?

*MR. WINTERBOTHAM (Gloucester, Cirencester): Before the noble Lord answers the question, may I ask whether he will re-consider his determination, and submit to the House all the correspondence which has passed between the Admiralty and all those who have at various times brought the subject of "flashing signals" before them, so that before coming to a vote we may ascertain who is really entitled to be rewarded for this invention?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): I believe that the correspondence, so far as is necessary, will be published. In reply to the question of the hon. Member for Coventry (Mr. Ballantine), I have to say that Admiral Colomb's system of flashing signals was submitted to the Admiralty in 1861, and adopted for the Naval Service in 1867. The Admiralty did not give Admiral Colomb, during this period, any direct pecuniary aid in perfecting his inventions, but he was, from time to time, put on a Committee, and so drew full pay while he was prosecuting certain inquiries and investigations. Mr. Redl's cone system of signals was first brought to the notice of the Admiralty before 1852. The invention was purchased in 1858, but it was never brought into general use in the Navy. No money was paid to Mr. Redl by the Admiralty beyond the £1,500 referred to, of which £1,200 was charged to Navy funds, and £300 to Army funds.

POSTAL COMMUNICATION IN THE WEST OF ENGLAND.

MR. HOBHOUSE (Somerset, E.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether any arrangements have now been made for improving the postal communication from Somerset and the West of England to towns in Hampshire and Dorset?

Mr. Ballantine

*MR. RAIKES: In reply to the hon. Member, I have to state that considerable improvements have been made in the postal communication from Somerset and the West of England to towns in Hampshire and Dorset. At Southampton, the delivery of letters by day mail is now effected at 9 a.m. instead of 11.45 a.m. At Bournemouth the gain in time has been 1 hour 30 minutes, and in towns in Hampshire or Dorset generally the delivery has been materially accelerated.

THE SLAVE TRADE.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether any Papers on the Slave Trade will be laid before Parliament prior to the close of the Session?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: We do not propose to present any Papers respecting the Slave Trade, except the Brussels Act, during the present Session. As the Brussels General Act will entirely alter the conditions of the suppression of the trade, it is proposed to discontinue the presentation of Papers annually in the form of the old Slave Trade Papers, and instead to lie on the Table from time to time collections of Papers which may be of special interest.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs when the General Act of the Brussels Conference on the Slave Trade will be in the hands of Members?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The translations are being made; and as it has been found impossible to complete them as far as the voluminous Protocols are concerned before the close of the Session, the Act will be laid on the Table separately at an early date?

THE ABERDEEN MAILS.

MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he can say when the acceleration of mails to Aberdeen, rendered possible by the new train arrangements, will begin, and what the saving of time will be at both Aberdeen and London in regard to posting and delivery?

*MR. RAIKES: I shall be in a position to give an answer to the hon. Member's question as soon as the communications now passing between my Department and the Treasury respecting the main route to the North are completed.

SAMUEL HUNTER.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lancaster, N.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has received a Petition for the release of Samuel Hunter, represented to be from "Magistrates, members of Town Council, and inhabitants of county borough of Salford"; and if he can grant the prayer of said Petition?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): Yes, Sir; I received such a Petition in August of last year, and I replied that it was not a case in which I could advise any interference.

RATE OF EXCHANGE IN INDIA.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the Secretary of State for India will, at the close of the financial year, grant a Return showing the amount of profit accruing during the year to the Indian Government from paying its servants their family remittances, furlough, and pensions at the rate of 1s. 5d., while the current rate of exchange is much higher, being to-day 1s. 7½d?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): The Secretary of States wishes to be allowed to defer his answer to this question until the close of the financial year. He cannot tell until then whether any profit will accrue or not.

SIR R. LETHBRIDGE (Kensington, N.): Arising out of the answer of the right hon. Gentleman, may I ask him if we are to assume that Indian Civil Service pensions are really to be reduced from £200 to £135 by the loss in the exchange, so that these officers are unable to provide adequately for the feeding, clothing, and education of their children, while a profit continues to be made by the Government from the same transaction?

SIR J. GORST: I must remind the hon. Gentleman that at this moment there is a Committee sitting upstairs which is engaged in considering the matter, and it would be very disrespectful to that Committee if I were to express any opinion.

MR. C. WRIGHT (Lancashire, S.W., Leigh): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India if his attention has been drawn to a statement in the Daily News of the 23rd instant, as follows:—

"Indian Government expenditure in England is over 200 million rupees per annum. If the rupee exchanges for 1s. 7d., instead of 1s. 5d., the difference of 2d. per rupee to the Indian Exchequer is £1,750,000;"

and, if so, is it true that a rise of 2d. in the rate of exchange is a clear gain to the Indian Government of £1,750,000?

SIR J. GORST: Yes, Sir; but, so far, the average rate actually realised has been only 1s. 5½d.

WEST INDIAN MAILS.

MR. WATT (Glasgow, Camlachie): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that, owing to the alterations under the new contract for the carriage of mails to the West Indies, &c., great inconvenience is being caused to merchants consequent upon the change of arrangements, both here and abroad, whereby the connections have been so altered that mails are frequently short-shipped and delivered here so late as to afford inadequate time for reply by the outgoing mail; and whether, having regard to the loss and inconvenience caused to merchants and others, he can see his way to make a representation to the Royal Mail Company to shorten the period now occupied in the passage of their steamers, so as to give greater facilities, pending the introduction of the arrangements concluded under the new contract?

MR. RAIKES: With the exception of a letter which I have just received from the hon. Member, no complaints on the points named have reached me; but I was naturally aware that, in fitting the new West India Service, with its earlier day of departure, to the old, some slight inconvenience must arise. For example, on two occasions the interval between the arrival of the homeward mails at Plymouth, and the departure of the outward mails from Southampton, was abridged, the interval still being over five days in one case and four days in the other. Even this slight inconvenience may now be considered as ended, seeing that the next homeward mail is due at Plymouth on the 31st of July, and the next despatch from Southampton is fixed for the 6th of August. The whole of the Service will then be performed under the new arrangements.

CASE OF JAMES N. CORNWELL.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he can state the grounds on which he has recently dismissed a second class sorter of 13 years' standing, named James Nowers Cornwell, and without giving him an opportunity of making himself acquainted with the nature of the actual charge against him and replying thereto; whether, although articles of jewellery were taken from his house, they were subsequently returned to him without comment, he having accounted for the same; whether Cornwell was asked to assist in the detection, and did assist in the detection, of dishonest employés, and worked generally under the supervision of the Confidential Inquiry Branch for many years, and whether, at the time of such request, Cornwell was suspected of tampering with or purloining a parcel so long ago as September 1888; whether evidence was taken from a person who was reduced in rank through an inquiry instituted in consequence of a report made by Cornwell; and whether he will permit an inquiry into the facts, and allow Cornwell to be present to answer any charge against him, and produce evidence, documentary or otherwise, as he is confident he can establish his innocence if permitted to do so?

MR. RAIKES: The sorter Cornwell was dismissed upon evidence which showed him, in my opinion, to be unfit for employment in the Public Service. In the course of the investigation he was asked to account for his possession of certain articles of jewellery, and, at its close, these articles were returned to him. Cornwell had occasionally assisted the Confidential Inquiry Branch, and it was not until a comparatively recent date that suspicion fell upon him. The person referred to by the hon. Member was only one of many who gave evidence, and his testimony received corroboration from independent sources. The investigation was a very complete one, and Cornwell was given the fullest opportunity of explaining and rebutting, both verbally and in writing, all the facts which told against him. Since his dismissal, Cornwell has been informed that any fresh facts which he might bring forward would receive proper consideration. He has failed to adduce any new matter, and I must decline, therefore, to re-open the inquiry.

POST OFFICE WORK.

MR. JAMES ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether any action has been taken to give effect to the recommendations of the Departmental Committee, appointed in February last to inquire into the duties in the General Post Office and London districts in respect of paying for work according to its quality; and whether any recommendations have been made to the Treasury with reference to the Memorial from the London sorting force?

MR. RAIKES: I am now in communication with the Treasury upon the subject of adjusting the scales of pay of the sorters in London. As regards the adjustment of numbers on the several classes, this will take rather longer, but no time shall be lost in coming to a decision on the subject.

SUPPLY OF ARMS TO THE ARMY AND NAVY.

ADMIRAL FIELD (Sussex, Eastbourne): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether his attention has been called to the last (fourth) Report from Committee on Public Accounts, page 5, on Naval Armaments; and whether, in view of the above Report, and the recommendation of Royal Commission on Naval and Military Administration that a separate Ordnance Department should be created for the supply of all arms to Navy and Army, he will confer with Secretary of State for War, and endeavour to find a remedy for a system which is condemned by the Public Accounts Committee?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.): Is it the fact that the Royal Commission on Naval and Military Administration made any such recommendation as that which is imputed to them in the question?

ADMIRAL FIELD: May I supplement the question with another, whether the Commission did not comment very strongly upon these Services?

LORD G. HAMILTON: The Commission expressed no opinion as to the expediency of providing for a new Department. In reply to the question on the Paper, I have to say that an Inter-Departmental Committee, under the presidency of the Financial Secretary of the Admiralty, and consisting of the Financial Secretary of the War Office, the Accountants General of the Army and the Navy, Mr. Richard Mills and Mr. Edwin Waterhouse, has for some time been inquiring into the existing arrangements connected with the supply and accounting, &c., of warlike stores for the Navy. Their recommendations will, I believe, meet the objections of the Committee on Public Accounts, and give the Admiralty more responsibility and control over the provision and custody of Ordnance stores required for the Naval Service.

LOCAL TAXATION (CUSTOMS AND EXCISE) DUTIES BILL.

MR. ROWNTREE (Scarborough): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer in what way it is proposed that the non-county boroughs, and especially the Court of Record boroughs, shall receive any share in aid of their local taxation under the Local Taxation (Customs and Excise) Bill, as proposed to be amended, beyond any sums allotted for police superannuation?

MR. GOSCHEN: The non-county boroughs, inclusive of the Quarter Sessions boroughs, will receive a share of the money in question. The sum received by the county will either be devoted to the payment of charges to which the whole county, including the boroughs within the county, contribute rateably or be credited to the boroughs in common with other local areas in proportion to their rateable value.

MR. STOREY (Sunderland): What will be done with the money in those counties where there is no rate, as is the case in several counties at the present time?

MR. GOSCHEN: The money will then be distributed amongst all local areas in their counties.

COLONEL MAITLAND.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I had intended to ask the Secretary of State for War if he has observed that Colonel Maitland, of the Grenadier Guards, wrote to the papers to say that he had not resigned; if Colonel Maitland has nevertheless been treated as having resigned, and is retired on half-pay; and, if that step is the result of an inquiry showing that Colonel Maitland is so much in fault as to justify his removal, or is it a mere temporary removal, leaving the officer eligible for future employment? I will, however, postpone the question until to-morrow.

ENGLAND AND ITALY IN AFRICA.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he will explain what is the boundary alluded to in the Report of the British East Africa Company as having been settled between themselves and the Italians, and depicted in a map; whether a general boundary between the British and Italian sphere of influence in Africa has been settled; and, if so, if he will place in the Library a map showing that boundary?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: The British East Africa Company are making an arrangement with the Italian Government which includes an engagement as to their respective spheres of operations. It is understood that it is not finally concluded, as negotiations are still in progress on points of detail. This is the only boundary arrangement affecting States in that quarter.

THE GUARDS.

SIR GEORGE TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton): I had intended to ask the Secretary of State for War whether it is the intention of the Government that the Guards shall henceforward take their turn of foreign service with the rest of the Army, but at the request of the right hon. Gentleman I will postpone the question.

THE CENTRAL TELEGRAPH OFFICE.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I beg to ask the Postmaster General why clerks employed in the Central Telegraph Office performing duty from 7 a.m. to 3 p.m., and who had volunteered for overtime from 3 to 5 p.m., were not given the same, whereas clerks performing duty from 5 p.m. to 2 a.m. were given overtime from 12 noon to 5 p.m., or a total of 14 consecutive hours' duty; and whether he will state why the former are debarred in favour of the latter?

*MR. RAIKES: In reply to the hon. Member, I have to point out that the telegraphists performing regular duty from 7 a.m. to 3 p.m. are not available for the overtime which may be found necessary at noon. It is, therefore, necessary to bring on other telegraphists at noon, and when once these officers are at their posts they prefer to work continuously rather than be released at 3.0 p.m. in order to be recalled to duty at 5.0. The two hours between 3 and 5 would be of no use to them for their private affairs, and it is at their own wish that they are allowed to do the whole spell of extra duty from noon to 5. I may add, however, that I am making inquiry with a view to ascertain whether some other arrangement is not practicable.

THE PROBATE DUTY GRANT.

MR. THOMAS ELLIS (Merionethshire): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he will direct a statement to be prepared and published, similar to the statement on the distribution of the Probate Duty Grant (Parliamentary Paper, C. 5475, Session 1888), showing approximately what share of the residue of Local Taxation (Customs and Excise) Duties will accrue to the county funds and county borough funds of the various counties of England, and of Wales and Monmouth?

*MR. RITCHIE: If the hon. Gentleman would be satisfied to take a statement showing the amount to be received by each county, inclusive of the county boroughs, I shall be happy to prepare and distribute it. It is not possible, until the final adjustments have been made between counties and county boroughs, to say what will be the distribution as between them.

LOCAL CONTRIBUTIONS, IRELAND.

MR. CAREW (Kildare, N.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer why Ireland did not get in 1889 the benefit of the contribution of £40,000, the amount she now receives in lieu of local taxation licences; whether this contribution is on a par with the Probate Duty Grant, and therefore should have been paid simultaneously with it; and whether the Government will make provision for paying Ireland this sum of £40,000, which was withheld from her in 1889, while England and Scotland received the benefit of grants under this head from the date of the passing of the County Councils Act?

*MR. GOSCHEN: No, Sir; this contribution is not on a par with the Probate Duty Grant, and therefore need not have been paid simultaneously with it. As regards the latter part of the question, I should remind the hon. Member that this is the first year in which the transfer of the local licences became generally operative in Great Britain.

THE NORTH SEA FISHERIES.

MR. HEATH (Lincoln, Louth): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade when will the North Sea Fisheries District Order, which has been laid upon the Table since 10th July, be circulated for the information of the House?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The matter really rests with the printers, but I see that the paper to which my hon. Friend refers has been circulated to-day.

THE SCOTCH VOTES IN SUPPLY.

MR. PHILIPPS (Lanark, Mid): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he will take the Scotch Votes in Class III. at an early date next week, in view of the fact that they were taken at the very end of the last Session when many Scotch Members had been obliged to leave town?

MR. SINCLAIR (Falkirk, &c.): I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman if he is yet able to fix a date for the consideration of the Scottish Estimates; and if, considering the changes introduced by the Educational Clauses of the Local Government (Scotland) Bill, and the very great interest felt (not alone in Scotland but throughout the entire United Kingdom) in the experiment whereby school fees in the compulsory standards have been almost entirely abolished, he will undertake to put down Vote 9 in Class IV. at such an hour that reasonable time may be allowed for adequate consideration of the many important questions which arise on this, the Educational Vote for Scotland?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): So soon as the House has dealt with, and practically disposed of, the Anglo-German Agreement, the Local Taxation, and the Police Bills, it is the intention of the Government to take up Supply; and when the Post Office Estimates are voted we propose to take the Scotch Education Vote and other Scotch Estimates.

RECEIVER GENERAL OF INLAND REVENUE.

Mr. LAWSON: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in view of the evidence taken before the Royal Commission on Civil Establishments, it is proposed to continue the office of Receiver General of Inland Revenue?

*Mr. W. H. SMITH: The subject is one that is now under the consideration of the Government, with a view to seeing how the duties performed by the late Receiver General may best be discharged with efficiency and economy.

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL (MONEY) BILL.

Mr. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury why it was that the London County Council (Money) Bill, involving the expenditure of some millions, the Second Reading of which was pressed at 12 o'clock midnight of the 22nd July, was issued in a revised form only on the morning of the 23rd July; and whether, in future, Members may have such complicated Money Bills not less than a day before the Second Reading is moved?

Mr. LAWSON: May I ask whether any new powers are given in the Bill, and whether the measure was not carefully considered by the Treasury upon the representations of the London County Council?

*THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): That is rather a subject for discussion, and if the hon. Member desires an answer to the question he had better give notice. The London County Council (Money Bill) was issued on the morning of Monday, July 21st. Some clerical errors were discovered in it, and it was found that a small Amendment would be necessary, and I thought it would save time to reprint the Bill. Large numbers of this reprint were at the Vote Office on the afternoon of Tuesday, July 22nd, some hours before the Motion for the Second Reading came on.

*Mr. BARTLEY: Is it not a fact that the revised copy circulated after the House had been pressed to read the Bill a second time differed in certain particulars from the original Bill. Was that owing to the mistake of the London County Council?

*Mr. JACKSON: I cannot say that it was.

Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON: Is the Bill to be taken to-night?

*Mr. JACKSON: No, Sir.

*Mr. BARTLEY: Will there be any further alteration in the Bill?

*Mr. JACKSON: The hon. Member will see that when he gets the Bill.

MALTA.

Mr. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Government will consider the advisability of framing and submitting to the Council of Government in Malta a project of Law recognising civil marriage as valid, and allowing the parties to a civil marriage to add thereto such ecclesiastical forms as they may prefer?

*Mr. W. H. SMITH: This important question is receiving the careful consideration of Her Majesty's Government.

Mr. SUMMERS: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, in virtue of what authority is the Government of Malta empowered to grant licences to Protestant ministers to celebrate marriages in that island?

*Mr. W. H. SMITH: We are not aware of any written authority for the grant by the Government of Malta of licences to Protestant ministers to celebrate marriages in that island. The practice appears to rest on custom.

THE ESTIMATES NEXT SESSION.

Mr. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he will enable the House to perform one of its primary duties, namely, that of controlling the expenditure of public money, by arranging that next Session the Estimates shall be laid before it as soon as is possible after the Address is voted, and on regular days?

*Mr. W. H. SMITH: The hon. Member attributes to me greater power than I possess. I am in general agreement with him in the desire he expresses that Estimates should be considered and voted as soon as possible, but it rests with hon. Members to afford the opportunity by imposing upon themselves reasonable limitation of discussion on the legislative proposals which it may be the duty of the Government to lay before Parliament.

MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): May I ask whether the right hon. Gentleman wishes to depart from his former statement that it is desirable to take Supply early in the Session?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: No, Sir, certainly not; but I must ask for the assistance of the House generally.

IRELAND—MR. CHRISTOPHER KEYS.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he will state why Mr. Christopher Keys, who was schoolmaster of Edenavagh National School for 28 years, was dismissed from his position lately; has he been granted a pension or gratuity after his long service; if not, can he explain why; who is the manager of the school; and whether any answers have been returned to the Memorials sent to the Board of National School Commissioners?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The Commissioners of National Education report that the teacher mentioned was dismissed on a charge of deliberate and persistent falsification of his school accounts. He was not granted a pension or gratuity, both because of the gravity of his offence and also because the Teachers' Superannuation Department, to which, in consequence of a Memorial, his case was referred, declared him ineligible. The Manager of the School is the Rev. P. Wilson. Two Memorials were received by the Commissioners in the matter. They were both replied to.

POSTMEN'S HOLIDAYS.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether a Circular has been issued within the past month to postmasters in Ireland notifying them that the Circular of the 14th June, 1889, relative to the earlier return of rural postmen on bank holidays, does not apply to Ireland, on the ground that bank holidays are not generally observed in Ireland; and, if so, whether it is intended that some allowance, either in the shape of extra pay for bank holidays, or relief from duty on some other days, will be allowed to rural postmen in Ireland, to place them on an equality with rural postmen in England?

*MR. RAIKES: Yes, Sir; I find that such a Circular was issued in the North of Ireland, owing to the regulation in force in England having been acted upon in error at an Irish office, and having given rise to public complaint. The regulations on the subject follow the public observance of bank holidays. Neither in Ireland nor in Scotland are bank holidays kept by the community, and I am, therefore, not prepared to withhold postal accommodation from the public on those days. As regards the suggestion of the hon. Member, I do not at present see my way to giving extra pay to postmen in Ireland in lieu of relief on a bank holiday, as that course would put them in a better position than postmen in England and Wales, and so create that inequality which the hon. Member is anxious to obviate.

LAND COMMISSION—TEMPLECROME.

MR. DALTON (Donegal, W.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland if he can state how many tenants on the estate of Messrs. Twigg and Peebles, parish of Templecrome, barony of Boyleagh, County Donegal, served originating notices on or before 1st November, 1887, and how many of the cases are yet unheard?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN, Dublin University): The Land Commissioners report that on the estate referred to 152 originating notices were received in their office between the passing of the Land Law Act in 1881 and the 1st November, 1887, and of this number 42 applications, which were received on 31st October, 1887, have not yet been heard. It is not possible, the Commissioners state, to give the exact date upon which a Sub-Commission will sit to hear these cases; but they are using every dispatch to dispose of outstanding cases as rapidly as possible.

POSTAL ARRANGEMENTS AT CLONTARF.

MR. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General

whether his attention has been drawn to the necessity for improved postal arrangements in the township of Clontarf, Dublin, where, although the population has very largely increased within the last decade, few or no improvements have been effected in that time in the postal arrangements of the district; whether he is aware that the only post office in Clontarf is situated at one extremity of the township, the result of which is that the delivery of letters posted in Dublin is greatly delayed, that parcels intended for the post have in some cases to be carried nearly two miles, and that an extra charge for delivery of telegrams is made in several parts of the township; and whether, if all this is so, he will consider the advisability of immediately establishing a post, telegraph, and savings bank office in some central part of Clontarf, in addition to the office already in existence there?

MR. RAIKES: An additional post office at which money order and savings bank business will be carried on at Whitehall Terrace, Clontarf, has recently been sanctioned, and it will be opened as soon as possible. When the question was last considered, the amount of the business at Clontarf was not sufficient to warrant the expense of a second telegraph office there, but I am causing renewed inquiry to be made on this point, and I will let the hon. Member know the result. There are at present two daily deliveries at Clontarf, one of these deliveries, namely, that beginning at 12.45 p.m., is limited in area, and an application for its extension to other parts of the district is now under consideration.

BALLYSHANNON WORKHOUSE.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the Local Government Board Inspector reported the master of Ballyshannon Workhouse for negligence in the discharge of his duties, including also in his censure Mrs. Sarah Kelly, the matron of that institution, as being in a general way jointly responsible with the master for the state of irregularity prevalent in the workhouse; whether, on the Local Government Board calling for the resignation of both the master and matron, the Guardians requested the master to resign, but made the strongest representations in favour of the matron; whether, on the Local Government Board insisting on the resignation of the matron, that resignation was tendered, but, on no candidate presenting herself for the vacant office, Mrs. Kelly was re-elected by the Guardians, whereupon the Local Government Board refused to sanction her appointment; and whether, having regard to the fact that Mrs. Kelly has for nine years discharged the duties of matron to the Ballyshannon Workhouse with efficiency, having testimonials from the Protestant and Catholic Chaplains and medical officers of the institution, and that the Board of Guardians, at their meeting on the 19th July, have passed a resolution supporting her application for a sworn inquiry into her conduct, he will satisfy the popular demand by directing the Local Government Board to institute such inquiry?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The facts are substantially as stated in the first three paragraphs. It is not, however, a fact that Mrs. Kelly has for nine years discharged her duties as matron efficiently. On the contrary, in July 1889, she was severely reprimanded by the Guardians, and warned that another unfavourable report would lead to her dismissal. Notwithstanding this warning, the next official inspection in March last revealed an equally discreditable state of affairs, together with additional irregularities. The Local Government Board cannot consent to the re-appointment of Mrs. Kelly as matron, and as there is no doubt that the irregularities existed, and that the matron as well as the master was responsible for them, the Board cannot undertake to grant a sworn inquiry.

IRISH PRIMARY TRAINING COLLEGES.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what measures have been adopted to place the Irish Primary Training Colleges on a footing of equal treatment by the State?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The question involved is chiefly one of expense. I am in communication with the Treasury on the subject, and hope to make arrangements that will be satisfactory to all parties concerned.

MAGISTERIAL POWERS IN IRELAND.

MR. KNOX: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he is aware that, at the Belfast Petty Sessions, on Monday the 16th instant, before Mr. Eaton, R.M., a man named Wallace was charged with committing an assault occasioning actual bodily harm, that it was proved that a serious wound had been inflicted with a reaping hook, and that Mr. Eaton, saying the case was proved, ordered Wallace to pay 40s. and costs; under what Statute Mr. Eaton was empowered to deal summarily with an offender who had committed an assault occasioning actual bodily harm; and whether Mr. Eaton is the gentleman who formerly acted as Resident Magistrate at Mitchelstown?

MR. MADDEN: The charge in the case in question was one of "assault and wounding." The investigation in Court proved that the occurrence arose in a drunken quarrel in which the defendant had received a great deal of provocation from the complainant and others in his company, and was defending himself from attack when he struck the blow. The cut, though severe, was not a serious one. The presiding Magistrate was of opinion that the case was not one requiring to be sent forward for trial at Assizes. With the consent of the solicitor prosecuting, the charge was entered in the Order Book as for a common assault. The man was fined 40s. and 20s. costs, or, in default, one month's imprisonment with hard labour, one-third of the fine and 20s. costs being awarded to the complainant. The man, being unable to pay the penalty, is now undergoing the term of imprisonment. The conviction was made under 24 and 25 Vic., c. 100, s. 42, and 25 and 26 Vic., c. 50, s. 2. The reply to the last paragraph is in the affirmative.

MR. COMMISSIONER WRENCH.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, at the recent sitting of the Land Commission in Cork on the 3rd inst., Mr. Commissioner Wrench is correctly reported to have said, while hearing a fair rent appeal in the case of M'Grath, tenant, and Bullen, landlord, addressing the tenant—

"You are a very wise man to get your grass seeds from England. If more tenants did that they would have better grass. It will pay you well to get your seeds from England;"

and whether intimation will be conveyed to Mr. Wrench that language such as that quoted is likely to do great mischief to the Irish seed trade?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Land Commissioners report that the tenant in the case referred to stated in the course of his examination at the recent sitting of the Court of Appeal at Cork that he was in the habit of getting his grass seeds from Messrs. Sutton, of Reading. Mr. Wrench then observed that the tenant was "a wise man, and that it would pay him well to do so, and that if other tenants followed his example they would have better pastures." Mr. Wrench being aware from practical experience that the grass seeds obtained from firms who have made the laying down of grass lands a special feature of their trade have given particularly good results, he considered it his duty to call public attention to the fact, as he knows many Irish farmers suffer by obtaining inferior and unsuitable grass seeds from unreliable sources, instead of going to the best houses, of which there are plenty in Ireland, where they would be supplied with seed to suit the quality of their soil. It is needless to say that Mr. Wrench did not mean to convey any slight on the respectable Irish seed merchants.

FALSE ARREST.

MR. ROCHE (Galway, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Government intend to pay the expense of defending the constables against whom Mr. Fahy and Morrissey obtained decrees for £5 and £2 at last Quarter Sessions held at Gort for false arrest; also the cost of appeal which was heard before Judge O'Brien at Galway Assizes, he confirming the County Court Judge's decree, with costs; and whether he will state what course he will adopt in reference to the conduct of the constables?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am sorry that I am obliged to ask for further delay in regard to this question. I am not yet in a position to answer it.

MR. ROCHE: I will repeat if on Monday.

BOYCOTTING IN TIPPERARY.

MR. JOHN O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland who are the shopkeepers in Tipperary who have been intimidated by Burke, "the boot repairer, whom the Authorities say has, while ostensibly carrying out his trade in the street, taken up a position near their shops, and promoted their boycotting by warning persons not to enter; and, if Burke has broken the law, why has he not been prosecuted?"

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I cannot undertake to give the names of the shopkeepers in Tipperary who have complained to the police in the matter referred to, as if, were they known, their position would doubtless be made, if possible, a more unhappy one. But I may mention that in two of the cases where these complaints were made, the persons have, by reason of the boycotting and intimidation practised, been forced to surrender to the lawless agitation in Tipperary. No prosecutions were instituted against Burke, as the shopkeepers refused to give evidence, being afraid of the consequences.

ACTION OF AN EMERGENCY MAN.

MR. SHEIL (Meath, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the emergency man who resides in the house of Miss N. Kieran, of Teggatt House, Navan, has more than once locked that lady within doors, and refused her egress to attend mass; that this man so acted under the written instructions of William Rochfort, who is agent to Lord Howth; and whether he will take any steps to prevent any further interference with Miss Kieran when she wants to leave her house to attend divine service?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The report I received in connection with a former question concerning the woman mentioned represented that she had no legal claim to continue in the house, but was temporarily allowed to remain by the landlord merely as an act of grace in consequence of the illness of her sister. I am not aware whether the particular acts referred to took place, but even if they did they are not such as the Executive Government would have any title to interfere in.

VOL. CCCXLVII. [THIRD SERIES.]

IRISH TELEGRAPH OFFICES.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether the Cork Telegraph Office has hitherto been recognised as a first-class office, in the same manner as Liverpool, Manchester, Dublin, Belfast, and many other large offices in the United Kingdom, the clerks in all such offices receiving an equal rate of pay; whether under his new scheme recently promulgated, the above-named offices are continued as first-class offices, while Cork is placed in a greatly inferior position; whether the first-class clerks in the above-named offices will in future receive a maximum salary in the case of Belfast of 54s., and of the other named offices of 56s. per week; whether, in the case of Cork, the maximum in future will be only 50s., as at present; whether the work performed in the Cork office is of the same quality, the duties are as arduous, and the average amount of work per man equal to that performed in the offices in which these higher maximum salaries are to be paid; and whether, in view of the discontent likely to be produced among men receiving lesser pay for the same amount and quality of work, he will re-consider the case of the Cork office?

*MR. RAIKES: In framing the new scheme to which the hon. Member refers, I have considered it right to take into account the strain imposed upon telegraphists in certain busy centres, together with the value of labour and the cost of living in great towns, such as Liverpool, Glasgow, &c. Judged by these considerations there is no ground for increasing the maximum of the first class wages at Cork, which, therefore, remains at its former standard. The position of Cork has not been reduced because special circumstances have been taken into account in granting increased salaries elsewhere. I should, therefore, not be justified in holding out any expectation of a re-adjustment of the salaries at Cork.

CHARGE OF FALSE ARREST.

MR. ROCHE (Galway, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Government intend to pay the expense of defending the constables against whom Mr. Fahy and Morrissey obtained decrees for £5 and £2 at last Quarter Sessions held at Gort for false arrest; also the cost of appeal which was heard before Judge O'Brien at Galway Assizes, he confirming the County Court Judge's decree, with costs; and whether he will state what course he will adopt in reference to the conduct of the constables?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: All the circumstances attending the false arrest will receive careful consideration. Pending the result of that consideration no final judgment can be formed.

EVICTED FARMS IN TIPPERARY.

MR. FINUCANE (Limerick, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether Mrs. Mullally, who was evicted from her holding on the Modeshill property, Mullinahone, County Tipperary, about three years ago, was re-instated about four months since at a rent fixed by arbitration; whether her house has been and is occupied by policemen since her eviction, who have refused to leave though often asked by Mr. Hartford, the agent; whether he is aware that Mrs. Mullally's farm is about three miles from her present residence, to which she is obliged to bring the milk of her dairy cattle twice a day; and whether, as the object of the Government in sending policemen to the Modeshill Estate was to protect the emergency men who were herding 30 evicted farms to which all the former tenants have been restored, the policemen will now be ordered to leave immediately?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I must ask the hon. Member to defer the question until I have obtained the information that will enable me to answer it.

THE GALBALLY POST OFFICE.

MR. FINUCANE: I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he can explain the reasons for which Mrs. Donovan was deprived of the Post Office of Galbally, County Limerick, on 2nd January, 1890; whether Sergeant Osborne reported that Mrs. Donovan's stepson, William M'Cormack, who was imprisoned for six weeks, took a commission for an order from a Mr. M'Ferran on 24th August, 1890, but that Mr. Oldfield, Post Office Inspector, on examination of the office, found no order for 24th August with M'Ferran's name; whether he is aware that Mrs. Donovan filled up a form for the surveyor, stating her son filled no form, but acknowledging that he sold some stamps, and promising that he should not do so in future; if it is customary for others besides those making declaration to sell stamps; whether a Memorial, largely signed by inhabitants of Galbally, asking for an investigation to test the truth of the policeman's statement, was sent to Postal Authorities; and will such investigation be now ordered?

*MR. RAIKES: Mrs. Donovan was deprived of her appointment as Postmistress of Galbally, because she persisted in employing on the duties of her office a son whom she had been instructed not so to employ; and it was this fact, and not the occurrence to which the hon. Member refers, that influenced my decision. A Memorial asking for an investigation was received by me; but as the employment of her son was not only not denied, but admitted by Mrs. Donovan herself, no investigation appeared to be necessary.

MR. PERCY MAGAN.

MR. HAYDEN (Leitrim, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, having regard to the fact that the charge against Mr. Percy Magan, J.P., of having obtained money under the Arrears Act of 1882 by false representations, has been repeatedly made during the last nine months, and of his non-compliance with the request of the Land Commission, two months ago, for an explanation, he will consult the Lord Chancellor as to the desirability of suspending Mr. Magan from the Commission of the Peace pending legal proceedings for the recovery of the amount fraudulently obtained?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: As already stated this case is being investigated by the Irish Land Commission. Pending the result of that investigation any action would be improper.

MR. HAYDEN: Is it intended to suspend Mr. Magan from the Commission of the Peace until these arrears are paid?

MR. MADDEN: No action can be taken pending the investigation by the Land Commission.

JUDGES CHARGES IN IRELAND.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the charge addressed to the Grand Jury of County Antrim by Lord Justice Fitzgibbons, on Monday last, and especially to the following paragraph—

"The Commission, which had been opened there, included six counties: Meath, Louth, Monaghan, Armagh, Down, and Antrim. Those six counties were inhabited by 1,130,000 people, or something more than one-fifth of the whole population of Ireland, and that one-fifth of the population appeared, from the statistics, to enjoy the advantage of occupying property of a tenement valuation exceeding £3,500,000, or, in round numbers, more than one-fourth of the whole tenement valuation of Ireland. From one end to the other of that circuit the history of crime, he was happy to say, had been the same throughout. They had literally not met with one single instance, not merely of a trial, but a report of a crime caused by combination, by conspiracy, or by intimidation, and there had not been one single charge of riot;"

and if he will take steps to have the valuable testimony to the condition of different parts of Ireland contained in the charges periodically delivered by the Judges laid before Parliament and preserved for future reference?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: My attention has been called to the address delivered by the learned Judge mentioned. However valuable the presentation of the addresses of the Judges might be, I fear it would be hardly practicable to carry out such a course, inasmuch as it is not the practice to have an official reporter in Court.

MR. SEXTON: Will the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant procure a copy of the charge of the Lord Chief Baron Palles to the Grand Jury at the Wicklow Assizes, and cause it to be laid on the Table?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If an authentic copy can be obtained I will have no objection, so far as I am concerned, to its being printed. I am informed that the Lord Chief Baron always has a shorthand writer to take down his charges, but I do not know that that is the practice of other Judges. It is a question whether it would be worth while to have an official reporter present on every occasion of this sort. I do not think that it could be left to the Government to select what charges should be laid on the Table. If they laid one I think they must lay all

MR. MACNEILL: What does the right hon. Gentleman mean by an authentic charge?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I should say an authentic charge was one taken down by a shorthand writer, and certified by the Judge to be correct.

MR. SEXTON: Do I understand that the right hon. Gentleman will apply to the Lord Chief Baron for a copy of this charge?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes, Sir.

MR. DILLON: Has the right hon. Gentleman any further information to give to the House as to the extraordinary charge of Mr. Justice Harrison at Galway?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have said that I do not think it right for me to ask questions of the learned Judge as to the course he thought it his duty to pursue on the Bench; but I have received a communication from Mr. Justice Harrison which I did not bring down with me, but which I will read to the hon. Gentleman to-morrow.

DELAGOA BAY RAILWAY.

MR. PAULTON (Durham, Bishop Auckland): I beg to ask the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs what, if any, arrangement has been arrived at between Her Majesty's Government and that of Portugal concerning the settlement of the Delagoa Bay Railway, especially with reference to the amount of compensation to be paid to the English and American claimants?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The Portuguese Government have agreed that the Swiss Government should be asked to appoint three jurists to arbitrate as to the amount of compensation to be paid for the rescission of the contract and the taking possession of the railway, and instructions have been sent to Her Majesty's Minister at Berne to make the application as soon as his Portuguese and American colleagues receive similar instructions. I may mention that, with a view to meeting any pressing claims that may be made upon the English company, the Portuguese Government have undertaken at once to place the sum of £28,000 in the hands of Her Majesty's Government.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: May I ask the First Lord of the Treasury to what date he intends to postpone the Indian Councils Bill, and whether it will really be taken on the date to which it is postponed?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: We propose to take it on Thursday next, and if we find that we are unable to take it then another day will be named.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): I wish, Sir, to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he can give any information to the House as to the course of business to-morrow and Monday? I hope, also, that by this time he has been able to fix on some day on which he can undertake to propose the Foreign Office Vote.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The right hon. Gentleman was not in the House when I answered a question as to the course of business a short time ago. I stated that the Government propose to deal with the Anglo-German Agreement Bill, with the Local Taxation Bill, and with the Police Bill before they again take up Supply. I hope it will be possible practically to complete the Anglo-German Agreement Bill to-night, and to take up the Local Taxation Bill to-morrow and the Police Bill on Monday. After that we propose to again take up Supply, beginning with the Scotch Education Vote, and proceeding with the other Scotch Votes. I hope it will be in my power shortly to name a day for the Foreign Office Vote.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: The questions connected with the Foreign Office Vote are most important questions of principle—the principle upon which relations are to be regulated elsewhere in matters of great delicacy; and I cannot think that all the Bills the Government have before the House and all the other Votes in Supply ought at this period of the year to be put before that important Vote.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I will endeavour to give consideration to the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman, but we feel it most important to take the Bills I have named as soon as possible.

SIR G. TREVELYAN: Is the Scotch Police Bill included in the right hon. Gentleman's statement?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am afraid not. The Scotch Bill has not been reported on yet by the Committee upstairs.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I should like to obtain from the First Lord of the Treasury a more definite answer than has yet been given as to the Estimates being taken next Session as soon as possible and on regular days, for though a pledge was given last year that they would be taken early, most of the Estimates have not yet been voted.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I have already given an answer on this subject. It is the desire of Her Majesty's Government to give the House every opportunity, at the earliest possible period, of discussing the Estimates, if the House on its part will be content to display some reasonable limitation of the discussion. I cannot go further than that.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Then I beg to give notice that next Session I will do my best to assist the Government in bringing forward the Estimates early by throwing every impediment in the way of all other business which is placed before us.

BEHRING SEA FISHERIES.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): When will the Papers relating to the Behring Sea Fisheries be in the hands of hon. Members? Seeing that a telegraphic summary of the Papers presented at Washington has appeared in the morning papers, it is clear that hon. Members may reasonably expect to have their own copies by this time.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: If I had had notice of that question I should have endeavoured to be prepared to answer it. I stated, in answer to a question the other day, that the Papers were in course of preparation, but that they were very voluminous and might take some time. I shall be happy to tell the hon. Gentleman to-morrow when the Papers may be expected. May I add that I hope it will not be thought necessary to raise a Debate on a question which is still in course of negotiation?

SHIPS (TYNE AND CARDIFF) (SYNOPSIS OF RETURN).

LOCAL TAXATION (EXCHEQUER CONTRIBUTIONS, &c.)

Return ordered—

"Showing (1) the amounts paid out of the Local Taxation Account to or on behalf of the Council of each Administrative County and County Borough in respect of the local taxation licences and probate duty grant for the financial year ended the 31st day of March, 1890; (2) the amounts paid out of or transferred from the Exchequer Contribution Account of each Council in respect of such licences and grant, distinguishing the several payments and transfers made in pursuance of sections 24, 26, and 43 of 'The Local Government Act, 1888;' (3) the amounts, if any, remaining in each Exchequer Contribution Account after such payments and transfers have been made, and their application so far as they have yet been applied; (4) the amount paid by the London County Council in respect of the indoor pauper grant under section 43 (1) (b) of 'The Local Government Act, 1888,' for the said year; (5) the amounts paid by each Council in respect of the maintenance, improvement, and repair, during the said year, of main roads, distinguishing the amounts expended on such roads by the Council themselves from the amounts paid by them to Urban Sanitary and other Highway Authorities; and (6) the amounts contributed by each Council during the said year under section 11 (10) of 'The Local Government Act, 1888.'"—(Mr. Hobhouse.)

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS.

That they have agreed to,—Consolidated Fund (No. 2) Bill; Amendment to—Colonial Courts of Admiralty Bill [Lords], without any Amendment.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

CENSUS (ENGLAND AND WALES)
BILL.—(No. 385.)

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.
(In the Committee.)

Postponed Clauses 2 and 18 agreed to.
Bill, as amended, considered.

*(4.25.) MR. RITCHIE: I hope the House will allow the Bill to be now read a third time, in view of the fact that only one Amendment has been made in it, namely, that which provides that a Return shall be made in Wales of the persons who can speak Welsh and English or English only.

Question, "That the Bill be now read the third time," put, and agreed to.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

CENSUS (SCOTLAND) BILL.—(No. 387.)
COMMITTEE.

(4.27.) Bill considered in Committee.
(In the Committee.)

Postponed Clauses 2 and 18 agreed to.
Bill reported without Amendment;
read the third time, and passed.

ANGLO-GERMAN AGREEMENT
BILL.—(No. 393.)
SECOND READING.

(4.28.) Order for Second Reading read.

MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): I wish to point out that this Bill contains only a preamble, one clause, and a Schedule, and the Schedule contains statements of fact which cannot be altered by Amendments. Under these circumstances, I desire to know whether, upon the Motion for the Second Reading, it will be in order to move a Resolution as an Amendment, or whether, after the Bill has been read a second time, it will be competent for hon. Members in Committee to object to any of the details of the measure. The operative words in the Bill are these, "The assent of Parliament is hereby given to the provisions of the Agreement set out in the Schedule of this Act."

*MR. SPEAKER: It is competent for any hon. Member to move a Resolution superseding the Motion for the Second Reading, but it is not competent to add words to the Motion that the Bill be now read a second time.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: Suppose it was desired to qualify the Agreement so as to preserve the liability from military service of the children of all present inhabitants of Heligoland. Would it not be necessary to make provision for that at the present stage of the Bill, seeing that an Amendment in Committee would necessarily be an abrogation of the principle of the Bill as affirmed by the Second Reading?

*MR. SPEAKER: That would be, I think, a question for the Committee to decide. It appears to me a modification could be made in the provision.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: But it might be ruled by the Chairman that the Schedule could not be altered, as being a statement of facts.

*MR. SPEAKER: That is not a question of order for me to decide. It appears to me that the hon. Gentleman may embody in a Resolution such of the points stated in the Schedule as he may desire to refer to.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: My point is that this is the only stage at which it can be done.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Cambridge): Is it competent for Members, on the Bill for the cession of Heligoland, to discuss the Agreement so far as it relates to Africa?

*MR. SPEAKER: The other part of the Agreement is an equivalent for the cession of Heligoland, and, therefore, the Agreement with regard to the African question can be entered into.

*(4.33.) THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): In moving the Second Reading of the Bill I shall be able, in accordance with the usage of the House, to make good the one upon which it is proposed to sanction the arrangement made by Her Majesty's Government with the Government of the German Emperor to cede or transfer Heligoland to the German Empire. Small as is this territory, and small as is its population, the House and the country will not forget that its acquisition by Great Britain is connected with a glorious page in the history of this country; that for a great part of a century it has remained a part of our Empire; that our relations with it have not been troubled by any friction; that under the British flag its population have happily dwelt; and that its separation from us is not desired on either side, and can only be regarded with regret by both. The island was acquired by conquest in the course of the long war waged with the first Napoleon, and it was found to be useful during the closing of the German ports, which were then in French hands. Its fortification by us during the war was unnecessary, because we had the undisputed command of the sea, and after the war it was clearly unsuitable and unnecessary that it should be fortified against a nation with whom lately we had been allied. The island was inexpensive to us, although not profitable financially, and it did not contribute anything to the strength of the Empire. Its tenure by this country has never been challenged neither by Denmark nor when Schleswig became part of the German Empire by the Germans, although it was well known that to the national sentiment of Germany it was not unattractive. No British statesman has ever contemplated its cession, and when some speculative person suggested such a thing, without equivalent, it was always resisted by the Government of the day. It is said that, though, as I hope to show, we have got an ample equivalent for ceding the island, we have no right to transfer the population without consulting their wishes, and without securing their consent. It has been always the policy of this country that those who have come under the British away, by conquest or otherwise, should be treated with the utmost liberality. This has been our policy with the French in Canada, with the Maltese, and with the people of India, as well as with the Heligoland, and the result has been to render their lot happier than before, and to attach them to the British Crown. But still the retention of a possession must rest on high Imperial grounds. To us this island is of no material or strategic importance in these days; it has, however, it will be generally admitted, attractions for the German people from a sentimental point of view, which is a motive strong among nations, and which has commonly actuated them in the most important transactions of life. Besides, the island may probably be of more strategical value to the Germans than to us. In return for the island the German Government have thought it worth while to make large concessions in a Continent in which they have latterly obtained an extended footing. They have come to an agreement with us which Her Majesty's Government confidently submit to the House as likely to be pregnant with important results to British enterprise and trade, and I hope with advantage to the people with whom we shall have to deal. Before proceeding to make that good, I should like to notice some criticisms and objections which have been made. It has been said that the ceding away of Heligoland has not given satisfaction to the inhabitants. We have, however, heard less and less of the objections of the people of late. At first visitors ran over there and came back reporting that there was a strong feeling on the part of the inhabitants against the cession. Curiously enough a gentleman did me the honour of calling on me at the Foreign Office to-day, and he said he had been in the habit of visiting the island, and that he was able to speak with confidence as to the feelings of the people, as he was able to converse with the people in their own dialect. He told me that he had conversed with more than 100 natives, and that he had found only one man who entertained an objection to the cession. They told him that they had been altogether deceived as to the conditions of the cession, and that they had been informed that they would lose all the privileges they had enjoyed; but when it was shown that all their immunities would be secured to all now living, and that they would have the option of electing to be British subjects, they were entirely satisfied and grateful for the care taken of their interests. In accordance with the provisions of German law, the children of such persons as wish to remain British subjects will be exempt from military Service. I have no doubt that when the island has been for some time incorporated with the German Empire the people of Heligoland will be animated with the same sentiments which inspire the people of Germany with regard to the Fatherland. Her Majesty's Government have also secured for British fishermen, who have been in the habit of resorting to the island, the full enjoyment of all the privileges they have hitherto possessed, except that of fishing in the territorial waters. Now, I turn to the quid pro quo, and the result of the Agreement made for the extension of Her Majesty's sphere of influence in Africa. In the first place, the House will recall the position in which we stood not long ago. Thanks to the explorations of intrepid British subjects, wonderful discoveries have been made in Africa during the past century. There was a time when we might have made almost any part of that continent our own had we been prepared to undertake the outlay and responsibility. Even in the last decade, when that portion of Eastern Africa was thoroughly investigated, it would have been in the power of the Government of this country so to have taken possession of a sphere of influence in that region that no other Power would have thought of obtaining a lodging there. That was not done. I do not think it worth while to impute want of duty on the part of those who held office at that time. I apprehend that the policy and conduct of the Government of the time was in accord with public opinion, and that the Government were not prepared to undertake great and unknown responsibilities by taking possession of a large part of the continent. Consequently, the efforts of discovery did not immediately result in an acquisition by this country of a sphere of influence over a large portion of the continent which is now engaging our attention. Other nations were not so indifferent. One after another the great nations of Europe became alive in time to the great opportunities for the expansion of commerce in Africa. The Germans, especially, were active in Central Africa, and in 1885 they had established themselves, so as to constitute a valid claim to their interests being considered, in the great tract between the lakes and the sea. Still it is not surprising that responsible Governments were unwilling to accept unknown responsibilities. But when the results of the discoveries of great travellers became better known, then a desire was manifested to gain possession of the continent. In 1886

Sir J. Fergusson

there was an arrangement made by which the German and British spheres of influence in Eastern Africa were so far delimited that the districts inland were divided between the two Powers. But the Germans had established themselves to the northward as well as to the southward of us, and there was great risk of our endeavours being frustrated, and the chartered companies being overlapped and outflanked by the operations of energetic explorers. It therefore became exceedingly necessary that some better arrangement should be made. It was hardly possible that the Germans would have been able to give up a protectorate, on which some of their subjects had expended considerable sums of money, without some equivalent. They had been as active as ourselves in prosecuting journeys into the interior, and they had established themselves on Lake Nyassa. Only a few weeks ago it was commonly stated in this country that we were to lose the fruits of so much energy and outlay on the part of our enterprising fellow-subjects; that we should lose the Stevenson Road and the country covered by Mr. Stanley's treaties, and that, in fact, we should become a very inferior Power in the continent in which we had been the pioneers of discovery. The difference between our position so viewed and now is singular. There is hardly anything which our people claimed at that time, which is not now secured. The map will show that we have covered within that sphere all parts of the African continent in which our traders and missionaries have established themselves. I believe that there are two exceptions, where there are mission stations within the German sphere occupied by our fellow-subjects, and for these the Government have secured the fullest liberty and safety for all time to come. The Agreement has been the result of the most friendly negotiations with the German Government. Her Majesty's Government could not have accomplished what they have done had they not been met in a generous and friendly spirit by the German Government. That was the spirit which actuated them as well, I hope, as ourselves. But it is not alone with Germany that arrangements have been made. It would have been no small achievement if we had but obvinted all chance of collision and jealousy between the German people and ourselves. But other great nations had shown eagerness to secure a footing on this continent, and there were, consequently, risks of friction with them. Last year the Government made an important arrangement with France in respect of territories held by them on the West Coast of Africa which border on our colonies, and so settled questions which, for a long time, had caused considerable trouble to the two countries. Her Majesty's Government are, at the present moment, negotiating with France for a larger delimitation, which, I hope, will be brought to a happy conclusion. I am glad to say we are also negotiating with Portugal, with every prospect of such a settlement being arrived at as will obviate future risks of jealousy and conflict. So that on the greater part of the continent of Africa, we shall have avoided the risk of friction with the other Powers of Europe. In thus arranging these matters in times of peace we avoid fruitful causes of jealousy and danger, and render continuous peace possible. It has been suggested that in concluding these agreements, which, I contend, could not have been concluded on terms more satisfactory to this country, there must have been some secret understanding that in some way we are bound more than before in alliance with these Powers. I will say again that in the Agreement either with Germany or any other Power to cement farther the friendship which exists, and ought to exist between us, and to apportion our respective rights, there has been no advance upon or departure from the policy which has been over and over again announced to Parliament. I am glad to see that the Agreement has been received by responsible politicians in this country in a spirit which, I think, is eminently patriotic. There has been for some years a disposition to abstain from making foreign matters Party questions, and it adds immensely to the moral force which the Government of the country ought to exercise in the councils of the world when, in the main, Parties are allied in protecting British interests, and not taking them into the field of Party strife. Some hon. Members, however, have spoken as if by this Agreement we were dealing with the liberties of other people in a manner we had no right to. It has been said that Her Majesty's Government have no right to deal with these populations as if their property had become our possessions; but I affirm that in the proceedings which Her Majesty's Government have taken they have in no way infringed the property of the tribes of Africa. In every case the footing of the chartered companies in Africa has been gained by treaty agreement with the inhabitants. I believe the East Africa Company have shed the blood of no man; but, on the other hand, they have set free thousands of slaves. That company have already won over the tribes in a vast region to more peaceful habits, and have shown them that their interests lay in peaceful commerce rather than in internecine war. We have shown them that they may better enrich themselves by trading with European Powers, than by the devastating pursuit of the Slave Trade, and wherever we have gone, law, order, and justice have prevailed. And I may here refer to the efforts made in this present year by Her Majesty's Government, in concert with the representatives of all civilised nations, for the effectual abolition of the Slave Trade. The fruits of the Conference which has been held with regard to the Slave Trade have, of course, yet to be seen, but I do not think that the temporary check that has occurred from the abstinence of one Power will be permanent, and that measures will be agreed upon and that united efforts will be made on a greater scale than before which will result in abolishing that trade, which it has long been recognised as the duty of all Christian men to destroy. With regard to Zanzibar some have spoken as if the protectorate was the only thing given in return for the cession of Heligoland; but we have doubled our coast line by the Agreement, and enormously increased our area of influence in the interior. That protectorate does not interfere with the Agreement of 1862. Muscat and Zanzibar had been separated, as the result of an arbitration between the two sons of the Imam of Muscat, and we bound ourselves to respect the independence of the two States. It has been said that, in assuming the protectorate of Zanzibar, we have only come back in a partial degree to the position in which we stood five years before. This is not so. In the first place, we have never before assumed the protectorate of Zanzibar. It is true that ever since that great man, Sir John Kirk, had exercised influence at Zanzibar, the influence of this country has been predominant, and has been eminently successful in leading the ruler of that State to increase the civilization of his subjects and check the Slave Trade and assist British commerce. But we had in no sense then assumed the protectorate of Zanzibar, and now we do not propose to assume it in such complete fashion, or so as to hinder the commerce of any other Power, but in such a way that we shall secure the Sultan the dominions which remain to him, and make his position more comfortable. With regard to the small islands to the north, and the coast line from Wanga to the River Juba, the tenure of the Sultan will be more secure; and though he cedes the Sovereignty of the German coast, he had previously given a lease of 50 years of the administration. Here I should like to point out that, in securing this sphere of influence, we deliberately prefer not to disturb the authority of the Sultan. For the last 30 years and more, the happy policy has been pursued by England of not disturbing the sovereignty of native rulers, but by guaranteeing their possessions, and exercising a friendly influence in their States, of making their position more secure, and their people happier, while, at the same time, the rulers exercise their independence. This is the position which we have taken up with regard to the Sultan of Zanzibar, and I think that the House will agree that it is better to deal in this way with native races than to undertake all the responsibility and danger of their government. I will now notice some of the objections which have been made to this Agreement. It has been said that the Stevenson Road connecting two lakes has been made by British capital, and is the scene of British missionary efforts and the site of trading stations, and that if the road alone were secured to us there would be great inconvenience. All these things have been met in the negotiations, and sufficient space to the east will be secured to prevent all inconvenience, while access from one lake to another will also be secured, and absolute freedom of trade and transit is guaranteed. Referring to the south-west, of course there is a great region with regard to which there has been considerable controversy—namely, Namaqualand and Damaraland, which some years ago had fallen into the hands of Germany, owing to indisposition on the part of the Imperial and Cape Governments to assume the responsibility. I am by no means imputing blame to those who did not assume this extended responsibility, but at all events Germany acquired the protectorate over those regions. I venture to say that the contention that the Cape Government has a vested right to all the country south of the Zambesi is one which cannot be maintained, and I do not think that it is possible for this country to maintain it and be on good terms with other nations. It would not be possible for us to claim a sphere of influence in those two great provinces, but we have secured in a vast region in the interior a most valuable sphere of influence in which British trade will find ample room for employment and the great South African colonies for expansion. These are the leading features of the Agreement, with respect to which the House is asked to sanction the cession of Heligoland. I am happy to note that these questions have been well considered by the country. I believe that we may claim for this Agreement the merit of providing for the interests of our people in this sphere, but I would congratulate the country still more on having removed far away any chance of jealousy with a great and friendly nation, an object which was not confined to Germany, but which we hoped to extend to all our neighbours, so that colonisation might not lead to any fresh danger to this country, but rather increase our friendship with those nations with whom it was most desirable that we should live in harmony. I now beg to move the Second Reading of the Bill.

Sir J. Fergusson

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir J. Fergusson.)

(5.12.) MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): The right hon. Gentleman has divided his speech into two portions, the more considerable of which is not directly before the House. He has spoken of the conditions of the arrangement as to Heligoland, and he has spoken of the Anglo-German Agreement in Africa. It will be my duty—and I think my principal duty—to point out that there is a third division of this subject, a third point appertaining to it, of which he has taken no notice whatever, and which, in my opinion, is of even more vital importance than any of the matters upon which he has touched. I reserve my remarks upon the development of that idea until I have dealt with the matters touched upon in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. He said, towards the close of his speech, that the House was asked to accede to the cession of Heligoland. That is perfectly true in point of form. It might be said, if we looked at it from the outside only that this is only an affair of parochial legislation, because the population of Heligoland, I think, is not equal to the average population of any of the 10,000 parishes of England. But, Sir, I wish to point out that, although the Vote of the House is only to be taken upon the Agreement as to Heligoland in point of form, yet in point of substance the Vote of the House is upon the entire treaty. Now, upon that there can be no question whatever that the whole treaty-making power of the Crown is thrown into the hands of the House, in respect not only to Heligoland, but to all the conditions relating to the South African portion of the Agreement, although upon the form of proceeding there is no indication whatever to that effect. I am bound to say I have no complaint to make of the tone and spirit of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. On the contrary, I think that tone and spirit most satisfactory, and some part of the positive information he was able to give us was satisfactory also. In the first place, I think it my duty to give unqualified credit to Lord Salisbury for the spirit in which he has set about this Agreement. I think it has been a good spirit, having regard to the best interests of England, and, likewise, the spirit of one who does not wish at all to view those interests in a narrow or selfish manner, but who wishes, in discharge of this great colonising, protecting, or superintending function, that the benefits attending the extension of power and influence shall be, of course felt in the first instance in this country, but shall be extended, not grudgingly, to all the countries concerned. I apprehend that the rights of natives, whatever they may be, in their relations with European powers, are not now before the House, and can in no respect be diminished or disparaged by any Agreement with Germany, France, or any other European nation. They remain intact exactly as they were before the Agreement. The whole force of the compact the Government have been engaged in making bears absolutely and exclusively upon the mode in which we shall regulate our relative concerns among ourselves in Africa. One matter I must mention with some regret. I think it is clear, even to the Government themselves, that an error has been committed in concluding this arrangement with Germany before arriving at a final understanding with France with regard to the protectorate of Zanzibar. I am very reluctant to dwell upon this point, because negotiations with France are now in progress, and it would be difficult to comment upon it without, I fear, importing some embarrassment into the proceedings of Her Majesty's Government. But I must own there has been an error in that respect; an error which it is not difficult to account for, when I recollect that in the person and in the hands of Lord Salisbury—than whom there seldom has been a person more competent to meet the difficulty, if it can be met at all—are united functions which it has never been found possible in this country to unite before; and which, I must say from conviction and experience, I entertain the most confident expectation will never be united again. To discharge the functions of Prime Minister and Foreign Secretary of England exceeds the power of the human brain, unless you can raise from the dead a man of the stupendous powers of Napoleon, or of another man, a countryman of ours, whose brain was not less than his—I mean Oliver Cromwell. I fear the over-pressure of subjects of anxiety has led to some difficulty in this particular case, which, however, I do not mean to dwell upon. I am bound to say that, as far as I can judge, I do believe the general effect of the Agreement in Africa will be beneficial to the parties concerned, and that the proceedings have been conducted with a due and impartial regard to the different interests involved. With regard to Heligoland there are, I think, three points which it is our duty to take into view. The first of these questions is, whether there is any sufficient ground of British interests to lead us to take objection to the plan of Her Majesty's Government. The conclusion at which I have arrived is that there is no sufficient ground, and I am not going to give judgment on the scheme upon any such plea. I am not sure the question of the strategical importance of Heligoland is entirely disposed of. I can conceive contingencies of war in which it might not be without some material weight as to strategical operations; but, at the same time, viewing the state of the case, viewing the nature of our relations with Heligoland, and viewing the fact that those relations rest on conquest, and date from comparatively modern times, I feel that the welfare of the people of that island and the relations to their neighbours ought to be the dominant considerations in determining its destiny. I am not prepared upon the mere ground of British interests to take objection to the proceedings of Her Majesty's Government. Sir, there is one ground which appears to me to involve, and still appears to involve, very serious considerations; but then the right hon. Gentleman has given us, at any rate, some hope of a state of facts in this respect better than has been represented in various quarters. It has been the language of some that in cases where the inhabitants are numerically so insignificant we are not bound to have any regard to their consent or inclination in determining their political condition. I am not able to accede to that proposition. I do not think that the mere number of inhabitants will absolve us from our obligations to the persons who have the deepest interest in that country. There has been much said by British travellers to the effect that there is a disinclination among the Heligolanders to become the subjects of this cession. Well, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman has given us a consolatory assurance in his speech today. I am afraid the witnesses are not unanimous. I have myself to-day received a letter in the contrary sense from a gentleman who is considered to have good information, and who says that the more he goes into the question the more he is convinced that the Heligolanders do not wish to become a portion of the German Empire. I do not feel that we are able to accept British assurances to that effect. It would be only from the Heligolanders themselves that I, for one, could take assurances of their disinclination to become part of Germany. But if there be any prudential or other considerations which prevent them giving that assurance, I am bound to accept the declaration of the Government, whose duty undoubtedly has been to examine the matter, that they have assured themselves there is no such disinclination on the part of the Heligolanders; and in the absence of such disinclination, I cannot set up a handful of British opinions, which the Germans might fairly consider prejudiced opinions, against the conclusions which the responsible Government have arrived at. The absence of dissent from that kind of assurances of the Government, together with the duty of the Government to make the matter the subject of serious investigation, are all, I think, that I have a right to know. Then comes the question not of the principle of the cession, but of the particular terms which Her Majesty's Government have arranged on behalf of the Heligolanders. I quite see that they have made apparently careful provision for the perpetual preservation of the rights of British fishermen. As far as I can judge, that is an adequate provision, and I own I should have been extremely sorry if the case had been found to be that we had been more careful of the rights of fishermen, who find it for their interest to frequent the waters of Heligoland, than of the Heligolanders themselves. Though certainly an interesting people, with a good deal of substantial existence, the nationality of the Heligolanders is more microscopic than any other subject to which the idea of nationality has yet been applied. But they are a people with a good deal of character, with some peculiarities in their history, and distinct severance of language from those portions of the mainland with which they are most closely associated. They have a great claim upon our interest. On the subject of fortification, it is very difficult for us to enter. There are those who think it will be the interest and policy of Germany to convert Heligoland into a fortress. There are others who think it would be a great mistake. The introduction of fortifications on a limited space of ground entails many severe consequences, and it is quite conceivable that to fortify Heligoland might entail a great displacement of private rights and arrangements so as materially to alter the whole condition of the inhabitants of the island in a manner very detrimental to their interests. I earnestly and respectfully trust that, whatever may be done by Germany in the exercise of the sovereign power which she is to acquire, there will be considerable, and I will even say tender, regard given to these considerations. It is one thing to interfere with private arrangements in a country where the whole feelings of the people are, traditionally and from antiquity, enlisted on the side of those who find it necessary to acquire their territory; it is another thing to go into a country as strangers—for the Germans, are, after all, politically, as much strangers to Heligoland as we were when we went there in 1807—and for those who are strangers to inflict great personal inconvenience upon the natives; and I trust, therefore, that every effort will be made to avoid such inconvenience. But there is another question upon which we have had a declaration to-night, which, if I understand it aright, removes many difficulties from my mind, and conveys to me considerable satisfaction. After all, what must have struck every Englishman in considering the case was this—what is to be the condition of these Heligolanders as to naval, and even more as to military, service, as to coercive military service in and on behalf of a country with which they have never been connected, and to the military strength of which they would hardly make even so much as an infinitesimal addition? Now, we see that there are two provisions in the Agreement which bear upon the question. The first is the provision where it is positively stipulated that all native Heligolanders now in existence, parents and children, shall be exempt from military service.

If that stood alone, I own it would give me no sufficient satisfaction, because I should say, "We are aware that in certain countries where slavery has prevailed, laws have been passed to provide that everybody born after a certain date should be born free; but it is quite another thing to provide that everybody born after a certain date shall be born subject to a heavy burden and to a heavy restraint, which may be very odious." But there is a second provision which the right hon. Gentleman has explained to-night. That is the provision with regard to what is called opting to be British subjects. Now, if I understand the right hon. Gentleman rightly, every man in Heligoland, being a Heligolander, may opt to become a British subject, and, if he opts to become a British subject, he may remain in Heligoland as such; his children will be born there; they will be British subjects also, and, being British subjects, they will not be subject to compulsory naval or military service in Germany.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: May I give the exact information we have—

"Minors, being children of fathers who have opted for British nationality, will also possess that nationality."

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: As I understand, they will be permanently British subjects, as much and as fully British subjects as their fathers were, and, that being so, the same law will apply to their children in their turn.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I am not sure about that.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Then they are not British subjects.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The right hon. Gentleman must be aware that even the children of fully-born British subjects residing in foreign countries lose their nationality. [Cries of "No!"] I beg pardon. The children born in France of British parents lose their immunities, and are liable to conscription.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: What laws a Foreign Power may be competent to make within its own jurisdiction I am not concerned to discuss. I am speaking of actual law and actual arrangements. I am not sure that I can ask the Government to provide that there shall never be at any future time any detriment imported into the laws affecting these subjects; but, as I understand the matter, the present Heligolandiers opting to be British subjects will see their children growing up to be British subjects in the plenitude of everything which belongs to British citizenship as fully as they themselves enjoy it; and they, having those rights, will, under the present German laws, have the same power of transmitting them to their children. [Sir J. FERGUSSON: Yes.]* If that is the case it is to me a very satisfactory declaration.

Sir J. FERGUSSON:* I will read the whole Paper—

"With regard to last paragraph, acting Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs informs me that German Government consider the supposition contained therein in accordance with the sense of the agreement of July, and that minors being children of fathers who have opted for British nationality will also possess that nationality.

Thus the children of persons who have opted for British nationality will also possess that nationality whether born before or after.

Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE: I understand that declaration to have no reference whatever to the limited term of time mentioned in the Agreement.

Sir J. FERGUSSON:* None whatever.

Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE: It clearly applies to children not in existence. I can only say that what I have heard from the right hon. Gentleman is a great relief to my mind, with regard to the most serious part of this matter—that is, the making the best provision possible for the future comfort and well-being of the natives of Heligoland, and those descended from them. Of course, if they choose not to opt to be British subjects it is their affair. I have to thank the right hon. Gentleman for the assurance which we find in his speech with reference to this very important point. But I have read somewhere the declaration of a statesman who said, in answering a speech, that what he had to answer was not what the speech contained, but what it did not contain, and that is my complaint against the right hon. Gentleman. Over the speech of the right hon. Gentleman I have been able to go, I hope, in an amicable and dispassionate spirit; but the right hon. Gentleman, following the example of the Government in the House of Lords, has taken no notice whatever of the fact that by the demand made to-day upon the House of Commons to give its vote or assent to a cession of territory, he is placing the House in a position absolutely without precedent and introducing a novelty into the practice of this country, which, whether it be right or wrong—and upon that I give no opinion—involves a matter of vast importance and of enormous difficulty. Is there any doubt at all that this proposal is an absolute and entire novelty? In the whole course of its existence the House of Commons has never been asked to vote a cession of territory until to-night. My right hon. Friend (Sir W. Harcourt) reminds me that the practice has been upon various occasions to invite the subsequent approval of Parliament to arrangements made by the Executive Government in the form of Addresses to the Crown. Of that we are perfectly aware; but that is not voting the subject-matter of the Treaties that have been made. It is giving an opinion upon them; it is not giving them validity and constituted force. There may be an idea in the minds of hon. Gentlemen that the United Kingdom has always been a Power whose course has been on wards and not backwards—a Power which has endeavoured continually to make additions to its territory and not diminutions of it. That is quite true generally, but it is at the same time true that there have been occasions—I will not go back beyond the Restoration, because I do not know in what manner the British provinces of France were ceded to the French Crown—it is at the same time true that cases of actual cession of British territory since the Restoration of Charles II. have not only occurred, but that they are to be counted by scores. In India alone, before the Mutiny in 1857, there were no less than 23 cases of cession of British territory to another Power. So the present cession is not a case without precedent, and in those cases that have occurred Parliament has not been asked to give judgment beforehand. Everyone, therefore, must feel that this is a step of vast importance. The question of the Treaty-making power is undoubtedly one of the most difficult questions of practical politics in the world. The proof of that is to be found in the history of the Constitution of the United States. The able and sagacious men who considered this question there arrived at a solution of the difficulty by adopting a compromise. They gave the power of intervention to the Senate of the United States; they did not not give it to the popularly-elected body, and that body has nothing whatever to say with respect to a Treaty concluded with a Foreign Power, and it has no power of interfering with the conditions of that Treaty either directly or indirectly by censuring or punishing those who have made it. No one doubts, Sir, that this power of Treaty-making lies in this country with the Crown, subject to certain exceptions, which, I believe, are perfectly well understood. Wherever money is involved, wherever a pecuniary burden on the State is involved in any shape, I say, it is perfectly well understood, and I believe it is as well known to Foreign Powers as to ourselves, that the Government is absolutely powerless without the assent of Parliament, and that that assent, if given, is an absolutely independent assent, upon which the Crown has no claim whatever, presumptive or otherwise. I believe it to be also a principle—and I speak subject to correction—that where personal rights and liberties are involved they cannot be, at any rate, directly affected by the prerogative of the Crown, but the assent of Parliament, the popularly elected body to a representative chamber, is necessary to constitute a valid Treaty in regard to them. But, Sir, setting aside these cases which are well defined, both in principle and in practice, there remains a vast range over which this Treaty power extends. It is not a question of the cession of territory alone. There is the question of acquisition of territory. The acquisition of territory is as important as the cession of territory. The cession of territory is undoubtedly included in the Treaty-making power, and included in what is sometimes called the prerogative of the Crown—a phrase I do not wish to use, because I think it would rather tend to prejudice the case on this occasion; and I am sure it is most important that the Members of this House should look at this question from a practical point of view, and should understand what change, if any, is being made, and what the bearing of that change will be upon the practical power and position of this Government.

Now, Sir, what is the true doctrine, according to the best authorities, and what has been the uniform practice with regard to the cession of territory? Heligoland, small as it is, is a territory, and the doctrine applies, in its integrity, to a single acre as much as it does to half a continent. I believe Blackstone may be accepted in this matter as a very sound expositor of Constitutional Law, and the effect of his language is that the Crown unquestionably has the power of ceding territory, but that Parliament has the right to control the exercise of that power by punishing those who misuse it. Instances are not difficult to give. Dunkirk was ceded by Charles II. when Clarendon was, perhaps, his principal adviser. The cession held good. Clarendon was impeached. Impeachment passes out of view or out of fashion, and we come down to the great period of the disruption of the British Empire by the loss of the American colonies. A Treaty is concluded by the King—a very just and wise Treaty—recognising the independence of America. The House of Lords, I believe, approves that Treaty, and the House of Commons disapproves that Treaty. Most of us on this side of the House, perhaps most of us in all quarters of the House, would be of opinion that the House of Commons was wrong, but that, of course, is not the question. The question is the power of the House of Commons, and observe that, while the House of Lords approved the Treaty, and that approval of the House of Lords remained wholly valueless and ineffective, the House of Commons censured the Treaty and, censuring the Treaty, punished the Ministers in the only mode known to modern practice—namely, by ejecting them from office. Blackstone lays down this doctrine, which, upon the whole, I believe to be a wise and sound doctrine, and in speaking of the control of Parliament, he did not speak of that which was shadowy and valueless. I admit that there are to be found, in various quarters, declarations of lawyers which raise doubts, at any rate, upon the extent of the power of the Crown to cede territory. Let me say, in the first place, that no one of these doubts touches the case of Heligoland. So far as I know, doubts were expressed by Sir Roundell Palmer, the present Lord Selborne, in the Debate in 1863, upon the cession of the Ionian Islands, which, though a cession of very great importance to the governing Power, was not a cession of territory, inasmuch as those islands formed no part of the territory of the Crown, and were legally judged to form the Septinsular Republic, as it was then called. Sir Roundell Palmer—I believe he was then Solicitor General—in speaking of the Ionian Islands, had to follow Lord Palmerston, a Constitutional Authority of great experience, who laid down broadly the doctrine that the power of cession was in the Crown. Sir Roundell Palmer, following him, said it was undoubtedly in the Crown, unless it was thought that a question might be raised if the territory purporting to be ceded had been made directly the subject of Parliamentary legislation, or in a case where representative institutions had developed upon the territory under lawful authority, and thereby the people had acquired rights in regard to it. Now, I look with all possible respect upon the declarations of so eminent a man, and I believe similar declarations might be picked up here and there, at any rate in vague indications, as having occurred to the minds of lawyers. I further believe they have been suggested by the contemplation of extreme cases. Such questions as this have been put, "Could the Queen cede the Isle of Wight? Or Lancashire? Or Yorkshire?"

SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): Or Ireland?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: The hon. Baronet surely does not suggest that. In my opinion you cannot take a more unsafe guide to Constitutional legislation in this country than by raising extreme cases, because if you make them the foundation of your action you will find that, instead of having the best, you will have perhaps the worst and the most absurd Constitution in the world. What would be the result if the House of Commons, in the exercise of its undoubted right to refuse Supply, refused all supplies? What would happen if the Queen, in the exercise of her undoubted right to dissolve Parliament, were to dissolve all Parliaments, without permitting them to do any work? We must proceed in all these great matters upon the belief that a certain amount of common sense does, after all, enter into the transactions of mankind, or if, unhappily, the stock of it should on any occasion altogether fail and be exhausted, a remedy would be found when the exigencies should arise. But I deprecate discussing this question on the basis of extreme cases. No such extreme case has ever come into view in the exercise of the power of the Crown to cede territory, any more than it has in the exercise of the power of the House of Commons to refuse all supplies, or of the Crown or its advisers to baffle Parliamentary institutions or frustrate them by successive dissolutions. There is one thing which I think is still higher than the dicta of Legal Authorities in this important question, and it is our long, uniform, and unbroken course of practice. It is one thing to stand upon the opinion of an ingenious or even a learned man; it is another thing to cite the authority of an entire State, signified in practical conclusions, after debate and discussion in every possible form, all bearing in one direction and stamped with one and the same character. It is hardly possible, I believe, to conceive any kind of territory—colonies acquired by conquest, colonies acquired by settlement, with representative institutions or without representative institutions—it is not possible to point out any class of territory where you cannot show cases of cession by the Crown without the authority of Parliament. Do not let it be supposed that I am in favour of action outside Parliament. I will come to that point by-and-by, when I deal with the doctrine as to the way in which these matters are conducted. Is there any doubt, is there any question, that land subject to the authority of Parliament has been ceded by the Crown without reference to the action of Parliament? Twenty-three cessions, as I have said, have been stated in judicial proceedings to have been made in India before the Mutiny, and since 1784, at any rate, all Indian territory has been absolutely subject to the authority of Parliament. In the case of Newfoundland, the Islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon, which were necessary to France to enable her to exercise the rights of fishing secured to her by Treaty, were ceded to France. If there be any doubt on the point there are others more learned than myself who will be able to exhibit the doctrine in its plenitude, in an overwhelming mass of evidence, so much so as really to bear out what I have said—that it is hardly an exaggeration to say that in scores of cases cession has taken place, and in all cases the practice has been uniform for the Ministers of the Crown to advise upon their responsibility, for the Crown to act, and for Parliament to accept the results. I am ready to admit that a great deal may be said in the way of presumptive argument against such a practice. It is very easy to state such an argument. It is easy to say that the negotiation of Treaties is much more in the nature of a legislative than of a merely executive function, and if you will not entrust legislation to the executive power, why do you trust to the Executive Treaty-making, which involves legislation of the most important character, the more important and more dangerous that to alter it or to revoke it does not depend upon ourselves, but requires the assent of another party? But, looking broadly at the case, I take it to be thus. I have searched for precedents—I have considered the whole time covered by my own life, and, as well as I could, some time before my own life, and I have not been able to find a case in which a Treaty has been made which has been disapproved by the majority of the House of Commons. I do not think there is a single instance of this. I can point to instances of Treaties having been disapproved of; there are, no doubt, instances in which I have disapproved of certain Treaties myself, which have been entered into, but on these occasions I was, unfortunately, in a minority, and not in the majority of the day. I am thinking directly of the Treaty entered into some 12 years ago with regard to Armenia and Cyprus, a Treaty which, I must own, differed from this, which has nothing to do with Party considerations. I was opposed to the Armenian Treaty. I thought it was a bad Treaty, but it was approved of by the majority of the House of Commons. If the House of Commons does not approve of a Treaty which has been entered into it can, of course, turn out the Government of the day, which would be very careful, on returning to Office, not to enter into such Treaties again. The effect of the present system, therefore, be it theoretically good or theoretically bad, places in the House of Commons the supreme control over the Treaty-making power of the Crown. Is that to be the case after the Treaty-making power comes to be handled by this Bill? It seems to me almost a necessity that out of this proceeding some complications of weight and importance must grow, deeply affecting the relations of the Crown and Parliament and the administration of political power. Speaking roughly, as the matter now stands, we have, virtually, the whole control. The other branch of the Legislature—the House of Lords—cannot turn out a Government. We, if we have votes enough, can. But will that be so after this? No. That which we now have exclusively you invite us to halve with the other branch of the Legislature. Now, I have said I do not wish to make this a Party dispute, and, therefore, I do not want hon. Gentlemen opposite to listen to this, which I offer rather as consideration to Members on this side, who have a natural tendency to say, the more you take from the Crown and give to Parliament the better. That is a presumption in the Liberal mind; it may be sound, it may be right; I do not discuss it. But I must point out that what is now proposed is to take a power which we now possess in a form, theoretically irregular, but practically effective—to take this power out of our hands and divide it with another Assembly. I hope I shall not be thought guilty of introducing Party prepossessions if I point out that while the political complexion of this Assembly varies after General Elections, the political complexion of the House of Lords never changes. I do not anticipate any Administration of the same colour as the present Administration will meet with any obstacle in the management of the Treaty-making power in making it subject to the action of the House of Lords. But, having regard to the fact that since the Reform Act 12 out of the 14 Parliaments have had a Liberal Government in office, I can conceive that some difficulty might, in the future, arise in bringing into complete unity the general political sentiment actuating the House of Lords, and that which a Liberal Government, and a Liberal House of Commons, might feel due to the wishes and interests of the people. That being so, I find myself in great difficulty. I think it is quite obvious that, in a matter such as this, of such vital importance, if we are to depart from the uniform and thoroughly established practice, thoroughly rooted in the Constitution of the country, such a change ought to be made with care and caution, after investigation and upon the full responsibility of Ministers of the Crown, who have not, on this occasion, found it necessary even to mention that such a change was—not meditated, not contemplated, not in any of those limboes where certain legislative projects, such as Irish local legislation still abide—but alive, at work, and embodied in a Bill to which we are now asked to give a Second Reading. I believe that I am right in saying that no statesman of this country, no person whose name can be quoted as of established authority in this Assembly, has ever questioned the existing system. Fox thought of questioning it in 1782, but when he came to look closely into the subject he abandoned his intention. In 1843, which is in my own recollection, in the case of the Maine boundary, when territory had, undoubtedly, been given away, Lord Palmerston challenged the arrangement, but never questioned the competency of the Crown to do what it had done. If we are to change all this, we ought to think well how we change it, and how far the change is to go. Already, in connection with this proceeding, while we seem to be considering the cession of Heligoland, we are considering the whole Anglo-German Agreement, which becomes waste paper if you withhold your approval from the cession of Heligoland. I think I shall receive the universal assent of the House when I say that such a change, if it ought to be made—and I am far from precluding the discussion of it—ought not to be made until the matter has been examined and sifted to the bottom. Such a change ought not to be made sub silentio. It should be made, if at all, with our eyes open, and our minds awake, with full knowledge of what it is we are abolishing and why we abolish it, of what we are substituting, and why we venture on such a substitution. Under these circumstances, I find myself in a position of difficulty, which precludes me from taking part in the proceedings on the present Bill. I have not shrunk from the responsibility of going over the subject matter of the Agreement which has been made; and, if legitimately proposed, I would not wish to withhold my assent to what has been laid before us on the merits of the proposal. Unquestionably I cannot vote against the Bill. What has been promised to Germany Her Majesty was fully entitled and authorised to give, and it was what the German Government was perfectly entitled to believe that Parliament would at once affirm. The German Emperor lives in a learned land, where doctors and professors abound. There are those about the German Government who know the history of other countries better than the inhabitants themselves, and I have no doubt that they know very well that the Treaty-making power lies with the Crown, and that the reservation that has been made is a reservation merely complimentary and formal. I do not feel myself able, if I had the right, if I were entitled to give or withhold it, to withhold my assent to the Bill. But I am not competent to deal with it. I am not disposed to lend any aid in making this precedent on a matter of profound and vital importance in the constitutional practice of this country. I value the British Constitution, and would not touch it except on good cause shown. I do not see any good cause for touching the Treaty-making power at the present moment. I do not know to what extent this Bill, which I suppose will go forward, will create a precedent; I do not know what bearing it may have on the power of the Crown to cede territory. I can conceive that it might be urged, if Parliament is asked to vote the cession of Heligoland, questions as to the validity of other cessions in former times may be raised, because the Crown made those cessions without the sanction of both Houses of Parliament. I must decline to be a party to instituting such a precedent at all, and I must decline taking any part in the proceedings on the present Bill. That may be consolatory to the right hon. Gentleman opposite, for he considers the dispatch of business towards the end of the Session constitutes the Alpha and Omega of our duty. I am sure the right hon. Gentleman will give me credit, in endeavouring to sustain my argument, for not being actuated by any factious feeling. It really touches a matter of deep, serious, profound interest and importance. I wish to wash my hands of these proceedings as constituting a precedent. I repeat my assurance that I appreciate the motives that have actuated Her Majesty's Government in these proceedings, but I do trust that the House will bear in mind that we are dealing with matters which, though not very immediately in view, are, nevertheless, of vital consequence to the country, and that in making changes some care, and some reverence even, is due to the Constitution under which we live.

(6.15.) THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I beg to assure the right hon. Gentleman that it is no consolation to Her Majesty's Government that he should propose to withdraw from further discussion of the Bill. Looking at the tone and spirit with which he has treated the question, it would have been a great satisfaction to us to have had the advantage of his great knowledge and experience. The right hon. Gentleman has paid a compliment to my noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. He has given unqualified praise to my noble Friend for the spirit with which he has conducted the negotiations; and I am glad that it should be known, both in Germany and elsewhere, that, so far as the substance of the Agreement is concerned, the right hon. Gentleman, representing as he does so large a proportion of hon. Members who sit opposite, should have associated himself with the general feeling of satisfaction that an Agreement has been come to with the friendly Power of Germany. I will not follow my right hon. Friend in the first part of his speech. I see with great pleasure that, so far as the African question is concerned, he considers that the rights of the natives remain in exactly the same position as now, and that the Agreement will not to any extent change their position. I am sure that he will also associate himself with the general feeling which I believe will exist in this House, that it is satisfactory to have terminated the race or competition with Germany in those regions, and that we shall, for the future, be able to pursue our colonising efforts without that jealousy which otherwise might have existed.

The right hon. Gentleman spoke with great discretion, and touched in the slightest possible manner, on what he called the error of my noble Friend in having concluded negotiations with Germany before he had invited France to consent to the proposal with regard to the protectorate of Zanzibar. I am glad that the right hon. Gentleman, through the delicacy with which he touched upon the question, has relieved us from the necessity of going into the matter during the pending negotiations with France, which, I believe, in a short time will be brought to a satisfactory termination. At any time after the negotiations are concluded we will be prepared to enter into a discussion of "the error," as he called it. With regard to Heligoland, we do not take any exception to the hope which the right hon. Gentleman expresses with respect to the declaration of the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs as to the status of British subjects in Heligoland and their children in the future. The question is a complicated one; it depends on the interpretation of German law. We are satisfied that the statement of my right hon. Friend was absolutely correct, and that the inhabitants of Heligoland and their children retain the full rights of British subjects. We have made every provision possible for the status of those from whom we part. The main point of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman touched upon the Constitutional question of the treaty-making power, and we must admit to the full the right and the duty of the right hon. Gentleman, holding the views that he does, in placing his most interesting and learned arguments fully before the House. He has saved the House from the remark that a matter of this kind had been passed over sub silentio. I notice that the friends of the right hon. Gentleman in the House of Lords did not raise the question. If they had done so my noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs would have been most competent to deal with it. At all events, I am prepared to the best of my ability, though practically without notice that this particular point would be raised—but of that I make no complaint—I say I am prepared to deal with it. With one most important point in the conclusion of the right hon. Gentleman's speech let me at once attempt o deal. The right hon. Gentleman said if we attempted to find a precedent for the course we had pursued in asking the assent of Parliament to the cession he doubted if we could find it. We do not for a moment base our argument on the assumption that the assent of Parliament was indispensable to the cession. If we were to say that by no other means would it be legal to make the cession, then there would be something in the argument of my right hon. Friend. But we do not take that ground. There is one point to which the right hon. Gentleman did not call attention, and that is, that in the agreement itself it is stipulated between the Crown and the German Emperor that the assent of Parliament shall be given. It is a perfectly right contention that we were right or we were wrong in stipulating for the assent of Parliament, but it is not for Parliament to say that such an assent should be reserved to it. It is the Crown which has stipulated for the assent of Parliament, and it is the prerogative of the Crown to deal with the matter. But it was the wish of the Crown that Parliament should be associated with it in this case. My right hon. Friend called attention to the fact that some doubt has been expressed upon the point of whether the assent of Parliament was required. I think I shall have the assent of Members in various quarters of the House when I say that if there was any doubt on the point it was better that it should be solved by taking the assent of Parliament. But I do not rest upon that argument. I rest upon the argument that we were not obliged to ask the assent of Parliament. The right hon. Gentleman, with some ingenuity, put the question of the whole treaty-making power on this particular point, which involves the cession of territory. I should be as anxious as the right hon. Gentleman to preserve to the Crown the Treaty-making Power. I know that is not the view of some hon. Members—those who contend that the Treaty-making Power should be transferred to this House. I am glad that we are strengthened by the very powerful speech of the Leader of the Opposition on behalf of the policy of retaining the Treaty-making Power in the Crown. We do not wish to set the example that Treaties should invariably or generally be submitted to this House before they are made. I wish to reinforce the argument of my right hon. Friend on that head. I wish to say that there are many cases in which to require the sanction of Parliament to the making of Treaties would be extremely impolitic. I am perfectly ready to leave as a general question the risks which the right hon. Gentleman intimated might follow, when he said that the present position was this—that it was the House of Commons, and not the House of Lords, with whom the ratification of the Treaty-making Power rested, because the House of Commons has the power of punishing Ministers, and the House of Lords is deprived of that interesting function. That power of the House of Commons, no doubt, is a great restraint upon Governments in negotiating Treaties, and it must keep the entire responsibility of it. But I am not sorry that, upon a point so vital as the cession of territory, in time of peace and not under the pressure of war, Parliament should have been asked to give its assent. It is not an indispensable assent. It is indispensable in this case, because the Crown has inserted a clause to that effect. I followed with attention and interest the precedents quoted by the right hon. Gentleman. None of those precedents bears even a near analogy to the present case. But the very fact that these negotiations were not an absolutely indispensable settlement of an international dispute, but merely a matter of policy, adopted without pressure, and under no compulsion from any Power whatever, seemed to make it more desirable that we should have the assent of Parliament to the transfer of persons who are British subjects; because the cession of territory in which there are British subjects is a matter which should be dealt with with extraordinary prudence and the fullest consideration on all sides. We accept this responsibility. We admit that it is a departure in a certain sense from practice, though there is no precedent which would be exactly analogous to this case. This view does not involve that the assent of Parliament is indispensable to Treaty making, or even to the cession of territory. But there are occasions when the Crown, while reserving its full right of making a Treaty, if it chooses, may, on the advice of its Ministers, after an Agreement has been made and entered into, which transfers British subjects from one allegiance to another, submit it for the approval of both Houses of Parliament.

(6.33.) SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I have listened most attentively to the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but I am as far as ever from understanding why the Government have thought it worth while, on a great constitutional question, to change absolutely in silence the whole practice of Parliament, affecting, as it does, the relations of Parliament to the Crown, and of one House of Parliament to the other. It is, I suppose, a part of that remarkably morbid passion which the present Government have for unnecessarily raising constitutional questions on matters where every one is agreed. The Chancellor of the Exchequer cannot deny that there is no example in the history of the English Constitution of a Bill of this character for such a purpose. The ordinary form in dealing with Treaties, whether they be Treaties of cession, or any other Treaties, is to lay the Treaty before both Houses of Parliament, and, if the Treaty is of sufficient importance, to move an Address of approval by Parliament to the Treaty made by the Crown. If, as in cases of minor cessions, the Treaty is not of sufficient importance, it lies on the Table; no one thinks it worth while to move an Address; and the cession takes place without the approval of Parliament. That is unquestionably the Constitutional Law and practice, and why has it been departed from? Why have the Government not, in both Houses of Parliament, moved an Address approving the Anglo-German Agreement? That is the constitutional practice, and if it had been followed we should have had the whole Treaty before us. But instead of that the Government bring in a Bill in a way never before heard of. They pick out one article, and the opinion of the House is not asked as to the whole Anglo-German Treaty, but only as to this one article referring to Heligoland. The Chancellor of the Exchequer says that nothing was said about this procedure in the House of Lords. I should think not: it is far too much to their advantage for them to raise any such question of law. Then the Chancellor of the Exchequer says that it was not necessary to ask the leave of Parliament, but that this was done merely out of the bounty of the Crown. But I will tell the right hon. Gentleman this—that if there is anything clear and certain in the constitutional history of this country it is that where taxation or anything else has been empowered by prerogative alone, and the interposition of Parliament has been subsequently invited or enforced, that prerogative has gone. No constitutional lawyer can deny that, for it is proved in every chapter of history. The growing power of Parliament and the waning power of prerogative are attributable to the fact that Parliament has been introduced into matters that were once done by prerogative alone; and once the interference of Parliament has been established it cannot be disestablished. Do not let it be supposed that this is a small thing. There was another argument used by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, which was hardly worthy of his abilities. He urged that this was nothing, because it was inserted in the Bill that the Crown had itself in the Treaty proposed the assent of Parliament. The Crown has always done that in the class of Treaties to which my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian referred. The Crown is obliged to do it. Take any Treaty of Commerce—your own Sugar Treaty, for example. In that Treaty the Crown inserted that it should be under the assent of Parliament. Was that because the Crown reserved the power not to ask the assent of Parliament? Why is the Parliamentary assent given to Loan Treaties or Commercial Treaties? Because it does not belong to the prerogative of the Crown to tax or lend the money of the people. Therefore, when a Treaty of this kind is made, the assent of Parliament is reserved exactly in the words that he used, because the Crown cannot do it without the assent of Parliament. The suggestion that the Crown has the power to do these things without the assent of Parliament is contrary to practice. Does any man deny that, in every case where cessions have been made, they have been made by the prerogative of the Crown without a Bill? In 1783, when the great cessions were made in the Treaty of Lord Bute, they were violently opposed, as everybody remembers, by Lord Chatham. If he could have argued that those cessions to Spain and France must have the assent of Parliament by Bill, he would have advanced that argument. How did this unlearned doubt ever arise? This is a subject into which I was professionally called upon to inquire some years ago, and it was carefully sifted in the Courts of Law before a very competent tribunal. As far as I know, the idea that a cession of territory required the authority of Parliament was suggested for the first time in the Debate, during the Shelburne Administration, which gave rise to the notorious coalition, and which was started by Lord Carlisle in the House of Lords. The idea received some countenance from Lord Loughborough, but it was stamped out forever by a speech of Lord Thurlow's, then Lord Chancellor, who treated it with the greatest contempt, for he said that no one ever heard of an Act of Parliament being required for a cession of territory. Mr. Fox, and all those who were violently opposed to the cessions in the Treaty of 1783, would have used this argument if they could have done so. The cessions were far more important than that which the House is now dealing with. They included Minorca, Florida, St. Pierre, and Miquelon, and there was no attempt to carry them out by Bill. From that time the proposition that cession of territory requires the sanction of an Act of Parliament has never been maintained by any responsible statesman or by any author worthy of any credit or authority. People who have not examined the subject say that the cession of territory is different from other Treaty-making powers. They do not differ at all. Cessions of territory are almost always made for corresponding considerations to those in this case; and you cannot deal with one part of a Treaty without dealing with the whole. Although, apparently, in this case the House is asked only to deal with the cession of Heligoland, you are, in fact, dealing with the whole Treaty-making power. Commercial Treaties are generally made as separate Treaties, but cession is always a consideration for some other advantage, it may be the cession of some other territory, or it may be the settlement of some disputed question, as here. I venture to assert there is no precedent for asking the assent of Parliament merely to a cession of territory. When the subject of the Ionian Islands was under consideration an hon. Member said that they ought not to be given up by Act of Parliament. Lord Palmerston said it was not a cession; but if it were he said that there was no question that the Crown, by its prerogative, might make a Treaty alienating such possession without the consent of the House of Commons, and that the history of the country furnished numerous instances in which cessions of this kind had been made, as in the case of Senegal, Minorca, Florida, the Islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon, which were all ceded by Treaty to some Foreign Power. Therefore, there can be no question as to the competency of the Crown to make the cession. I do not understand the Government to deny that this Treaty-making power resides in the Crown alone. It seems to me to be perfectly gratuitous to depart from the principle. If it were necessary I could show this by appealing to the highest authorities. Kent, in his Commentaries, says that wherever resides the Treaty-making power there resides the right of cession, unless the Constitution expressly excludes it. This subject was carefully considered by the founders of the American Constitution, to whom my right hon. Friend has referred in terms of well-deserved eulogium. In 1788, after the original Union of the States, and when the Federal Union was constituted, they carefully considered the Treaty-making power and the powers of the Executive of the United States; and there is nothing, I think, in the history of Constitutional Law so instructive as the discussion of those matters in the Federalist by Alexander Hamilton. In an 1869 number he says—

“The King of Great Britain can, of his own accord, make Treaties of peace, commerce, and alliance. It has been asserted that his authority in this respect is not conclusive, and that conventions with Foreign Powers are subject to revision and stand in need of ratification in Parliament, but I believe that this doctrine was never heard of until it was broached on this occasion. Every jurist of that Kingdom and man acquainted with its Constitution knows it is an established fact that the prerogative of making Treaties exists in the Crown in its utmost plenitude. Parliament, it is true, is sometimes seen employing itself in altering existing laws in conformity with the stipulations of new Treaties, and this may possibly have given birth to the imaginations that its co-operation was necessary to the obligatory efficacy of a Treaty."

I understand that that doctrine is not denied by the Crown. I have heard it said that this doctrine only applies to cessions made after a war. There is no foundation for any statement of this kind; there is no authority, no example. Cessions have been made in peace, as well as Treaties at the conclusion of a war, over and over again. For instance, in 1814 Bantam was conceded to Holland. It has been said that there might be a different rule in respect of Treaties for which Parliament has legislated. There is no foundation for that distinction at all. The Crown has conceded territories over and over again, besides the Indian territories, where Parliament has legislated in respect of them. I give, as an example, the cession of the Gold Coast to the Dutch in 1867 by the Government of Lord Derby. That Treaty was signed by Lord Carnarvon (whose loss, I am sure, we all deeply deplore), and by the present Lord Derby. In 1843 an Act of Parliament was passed specially dealing with that territory, and in order to enable Her Majesty to provide for the government of her settlements on the coast of Africa. I would also give the cession of the English possessions in Sumatra, which were legislated for by Parliament. They were ceded by Treaty to the Dutch in exchange for the possession of the Straits Settlements, without an Act of Parliament. No instance can be given in limitation of the prerogative in this respect. I say this with some confidence, because it happened that in 1875 I was counsel in the Privy Council in a matter where this question was raised. The High Court of Bombay held the doctrine that an Indian cession was not valid because it had not been confirmed by Act of Parliament. On appeal, we challenged that doctrine. It was argued at great length before the Privy Council, and it is a remarkable fact that Lord Cairns, who was then the Chancellor, challenged Mr. Forsyth, who appeared as counsel on the other side, regarding this point. He was challenged to produce an instance; and he admitted that he could not. This is the first example introduced by the Government without a word of explanation or of warning to the House of Commons that they are changing the constitutional practice; and until the Chancellor of the Exchequer spoke, no account has been given of the remarkable course pursued. Something has been said about the American practice. I know there are gentlemen who think that the American practice should be adopted in this country; but this is not the American practice. It goes a great deal further than the American practice. If anyone wishes to understand the American practice I will recommend him to read a most interesting and instructive chapter in Storey's History of the Constitution, in which the author explains why the Americans adopted the concurrence of the Senate, and why it did not include the House of Representatives. It points out that there the chief of the Government is not, as in the case of the monarchy of England, perpetual. He only lasts for four years. It was, therefore, deemed necessary to have some other Treaty-making Power associated with him. But the Senate, and not the Legislature was so associated, and the Senate acts, not as part of the Legislature, but as part of the Executive. It is more like the association of the Privy Council with the Sovereign in matters of this kind. If anyone will consider the point, they will see how impossible it is to conduct the affairs of a great nation if the Treaty-making powers are dependent on the Legislature. Therefore, do not suppose that what the Government are doing is what the Americans have done; they are doing a great deal more than the Americans did. I ask what is the meaning of this departure on the part of Her Majesty's Government from the Constitutional practice in this case? I must say that a lazier reason than that given by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer I never listened to in my life. You cannot touch the Constitution of this country by bits. Any interference with one part of it is likely to bring down the whole edifice about your ears. The Government appear to labour under the notion that they can tamper with the Constitution without consideration and without warning. We must consider the future, and see how far these things reach, and I venture to say that this is a matter that reaches very far indeed. When you have once made Parliament a partner in this matter you cannot repudiate the partnership. In my opinion the Government have by this proceeding destroyed the treaty-making power and prerogative of the Crown as far as the cession of territory is concerned. In my opinion they have gone further than that, because the cession of territory is only a part of a treaty, and we cannot consider the cession as a whole. Therefore, do not imagine that this is only an affair of to-day, because it concerns the generations that have to come after us. What are the consequences of this proceeding? The Chancellor of the Exchequer referred to cessions made before, and said, "Oh, the argument that they will be invalidated is unfounded." I think it is perfectly well founded. If you pass an Act of Parliament to validate this cession you re-open all the questions which were raised in the case I speak of in the Privy Council. In that case it was alleged that English jurisdiction survived because the cession was invalidated and incompetent, because it ought to have been ordered by the Houses of Parliament. In future people will point to the cession of Heligoland and say the authority of Parliament was necessary by Statute. In the cases of Sumatra, the Gold Coast, and India, the cessions have not been made by Act of Parliament. By their action Her Majesty's Government have tied the hands of the Executive. In my opinion the moment this Bill is carried the Government are bound to introduce a Bill to validate all past cessions which have been made without the authority of Parliament, and if this is to apply to a Treaty of Cession, why not to all Treaties? Annexations may bring with them responsibilities and dangers far greater than any loss sustained by cession. Why, then, are annexations not to be subject to the approval of Parliament? There are alliances offensive and defensive with the great military Powers of Europe. These involve consequences infinitely greater than the cession of Heligoland. Why are they not to be confirmed by the authority of Parliament? As my right hon. Friend has said, this opens up one of the greatest Constitutional questions that can be opened. Her Majesty's Government have taken a course which involves the rights of the Crown and the relations of both Houses of Parliament. It has been said that this is a question of prerogative of the Crown, and so it is. But what is the prerogative of the Crown? In the old days, perhaps, it meant that the Crown had the right, irrespective of any control whatever, to enter into Treaties for the cession of territory; but that is not what it means now. In these days the prerogative of the Crown means the prerogative of the House of Commons. The Ministers of the Crown are the creation and the creatures of the House of Commons, and any impeachment of the prerogative of the Crown is an impeachment of the right of the House of Commons. The House of Commons can say how far the prerogative of the Crown shall be exercised, and that, in my opinion, makes the prerogative one of the most valuable of all the rights of the House of Commons, because the Ministers of the Crown exercise it under the authority and by the direction of the House of Commons. Therefore, no hon. Member who regards the prerogative from this aspect will be disposed to assent to the cutting down of the prerogative of the Crown. Do not let it be supposed, therefore, that in fighting for the prerogative of the Crown we are fighting for anything that is opposed to popular rights, because we are, in truth, fighting for that which is one of the great weapons that can be used in support of popular rights. What is the effect of this proposal of the Government? I do not call it this insidious proposal of the Government, because I do not believe that the Government have ever considered its gravity. I do not suggest they have made this proposal in order to give to the House of Lords the power of veto in regard to the foreign policy of the country. I believe when Dr. Johnson was asked how some errors had occurred in his dictionary, he replied, "From sheer ignorance." I believe that that is the case with Her Majesty's Government in this matter, and that they have made this mistake in sheer ignorance. Had they made this attack upon the Constitution of the country intentionally, they would have been acting most unfairly both to Parliament and to the country. I believe, however, that that is not the case, and that Her Majesty's Government have introduced this measure sheerly from want of consideration of the important change which it would effect in constitutional practice. The policy that induced Her Majesty's Government to bring forward this measure may have very serious consequences. In 1713 there was a Whig majority in the House of Lords, which supported the Duke of Marlborough against the Tory Government of Bolingbroke, and the Government had to create 12 Peers in one day in order to bring about the peace of Utrecht. Coming to later days, there was no period during the Foreign Administration of Lord Palmerston when he had not a hostile majority opposed to him in the House of Lords, and if matters of this kind had been submitted to that Assembly they would have destroyed his policy altogether. Over and over again the House of Lords passed Votes of Censure upon him, but Lord Palmerston, having the support of an assured majority of the Representatives of the people in this House, took no notice of those Votes of Censure. What would be the consequence if a Government, having a large majority in the House of Commons, were to find measures of this kind embodying their foreign policy thrown out by the House of Lords? The result would be to make the consent of the House of Lords an absolute condition precedent to a Treaty involving the cession of territory. I do not say it is the intention, but it will be the consequence, of this proceeding that any Treaty which the House of Lords disapproves cannot be ratified. Thus you give a veto to the House of Lords on the foreign policy of this country. This is a most dangerous and mischievous innovation. It is said if you do not do this the Isle of Wight might be given up. That is absurd. You might as well talk of vetoing the Mutiny Bill or the Appropriation Bill. These are points not worth considering. We are here dealing with a practical question. What is the situation? You have a principle founded on the Constitution. There is no exception. No authority can be quoted against it. In the case before the Privy Council it did not become necessary for the Court to decide the point, and the Judges are always very happy, when there is a large point and a small point, to decide on the small point. If you will look at that case you will see there is no doubt what the views of the Judges were. About that no man who reads the case, in which I was concerned with my friend Mr. Justice Fitzjames Stephen, can have any doubt. Well, that is the situation in which the Government have sprung upon us this new proceeding. They had before them the plain and simple course of proceeding. If they had chosen, this important matter might never have arisen. They might have laid the Treaty on the Table, and allowed any one to question it. If they had thought fit they might have moved an Address of Approbation of the Treaty. They had the cases of 1783, 1815, 1863, and 1856. How was the opinion of Parliament invited in those cases? It was invited by an Address in both Houses, thus leaving it open to the House of Lords to approve or the House of Commons to disapprove. My opinion is that this is an enormous constitutional mischief. It touches the foundation of your Executive Government and your relations with every country in the world. How is a Government that has not the command of a majority in the House of Lords to treat with any foreign nation? A foreign country would say—"We cannot treat with you. You have not got a majority of the House of Lords; we are not going to enter into a Treaty." A more serious condition of things it is impossible to conceive. I can only express, in conclusion, my astonishment at the action of the Government in having thought it desirable, in this wanton manner, to violate all Parliamentary precedent. I can only say that I shall associate myself with my right hon. Friend in the action he proposes to take. We have no wish to raise any question with Germany in this matter. It is not a question affecting the foreign country. Germany has nothing to do with it. It is a question belonging to our own Constitution. The form in which you have presented this arrangement for our acceptance is one that is not in accordance with, but in complete contradiction of, the constitutional practice always pursued by this country. We do not vote against your Bill, because we do not wish to break the Agreement with Germany. We cannot vote for it for the reasons given by my right hon. Friend. It remains only for us to enter our solemn protest against the proceeding which the Government have taken, in the hope that it may not form a precedent in the future.

*(7.22.) THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): For one thing, at all events, I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman. He accuses the Government in submitting this question to Parliament of having made a formidable breach of the Constitution. He accuses us of increasing the power of the House of Lords at the cost of the House of Commons; but he is good enough to say that we did not do it by design. I am thankful for the admission, because I remember the last time I came into conflict with him on a constitutional question he was good enough to accuse me, with regard to a certain proposed Standing Order, that my special object was to destroy the power of the House of Commons, and increase the power of the House of Lords.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I withdrew that.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am utterly unable to understand whence has been born the right hon. Gentleman's new passion for the prerogative of the Crown. My impression was that, by conviction and tradition, the right hon. Gentleman was unalterably opposed to the prerogative of the Crown, and that his one desire was to diminish it. I now find him standing up as the champion of the prerogative of the Crown against, of all Parties in the world, a Conservative Government. I could not understand this strange protest until we reached the latter part of the right hon. Gentleman's speech, and then I discovered that what he was afraid of was not the action of the House of Commons, but the action of the House of Lords; and if there is a thing that he dislikes more than the prerogative of the Crown it is the power of the House of Lords. The greater hatred has overcome the lesser hatred, and we have the right hon. Gentleman standing forth, for the first time in his life, as the great champion of the prerogative of the Crown. Now, what is the value of this precious argument that he has unearthed as to the possible action of the House of Lords with regard to a Treaty? He asks how any Government can negotiate a Treaty with a Government if it happens to be in a minority in the House of Lords, which can set the Treaty aside? ["Hear, hear!"] Well, I am glad I have correctly stated his argument. Then let the right hon. Gentleman have the courage of his opinions. Let him be consistent. Let him withdraw from the House of Commons what it has now by immemorial usage, the right to have its assent asked to any commercial Treaty, to Treaties embodying financial proposals. We are told that to associate the House of Lords with us in any matter of this kind diminishes rather than increases the power of the House of Commons. Then, I say to the right hon. Gentleman, let him carry his argument to its logical issue. Let him carry out his new opinions, which we have heard for the first time in our history; let him advocate the doctrine that all Treaties shall be withdrawn from the cognizance of Parliament. Until he does that he has not a leg to stand upon, when he tells us that the power of this House is diminished or destroyed when we substitute the assent of Parliament for the prerogative of the Crown. I think that disposes of his argument. [Opposition Laughter.] Well, I will not say it disposes of his argument, but I will say that it disposes of the consistency of the right hon. Gentleman. I think there is one argument which, if it had had any foundation in fact, would have had a far more serious import—I mean the argument that all previous Treaties ceding territories will be invalidated if we once admit the principle that the assent of Parliament is required. But the right hon. Gentleman must know that that is not good Constitutional Law. If we were to come forward and say to France, "We find that we have ceded you territory under conditions not in accord with the constitutional usage of the British Empire; you will be good enough to hand it back to us," France would laugh at us. The weakest State in Europe would laugh at us. The argument of the right hon. Gentleman that such cessions are absolutely invalidated must fall to the ground.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I did not go to the full length of that statement. My argument applied only to the great danger which would arise in regard to Indian cessions.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I believe I am right in saying that a cession made on the authority of the Sovereign is a valid cession. The right hon. Gentleman said that Lord Loughborough had given his assent to the doctrine that Parliament was required to give its consent to the cession of territory, but then, he said, Lord Loughborough was a man of indifferent character, and his argument was immediately bowled over by Lord Thurlow. But then Lord Thurlow also was a man of very indifferent character, and I believe that historians to this day have not been able to make up their minds whether Lord Loughborough was a greater scoundrel than Lord Thurlow, or whether Lord Thurlow was a greater scoundrel than Lord Loughborough. I come down, then, to more recent days. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian is not in his place now, but he quoted Lord Selborne as an authority for the doctrine that the assent of Parliament was necessary. [Cries of "No."]

SIR HORACE DAVEY (Stockton): He said it might be in a particular case.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: At all events he quoted Lord Selborne as having directly traversed the doctrine that he, the Member for Mid Lothian, has laid down, that under no circumstances could Parliament be required to give its assent. But there are other authorities of not less weight than Lord Selborne, and even of later date, and I am surprised the right hon. Gentleman did not know that. In two years, in the year 1870 and in 1884, I believe I am right in saying that the then Law Officers of the Crown expressed an opinion upon this great constitutional issue precisely in accordance with the doctrine now advanced by Her Majesty's Government. These are the opinions of very eminent legal gentlemen, who are responsible for the advice given to Her Majesty's Government.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Will you produce them?

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The right hon. Gentleman knows very well that would not be a possible proceeding.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I rise to order. I say that if these documents are not produced, they ought not to have been mentioned. The right hon. Gentleman is surprised I was not acquainted with them. How should I be? The right hon. Gentleman knows that the value of them depends upon what the circumstances were, and what were the opinions taken, and to make a vague statement on the matter is worthless.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman calls that a point of order or not, but I have no objection to it. It is not necessary, however, that the opinion of the Law Officers should be produced in the manner required, because all that is wanted for my argument is to show that there may be and have been doubts expressed by competent authority. I should be very sorry to lay it down as a doctrine to be held by every Government that it was absolutely necessary to make a cession of territory valid that it should be done with the assent of Parliament. What I do say is that eminent Legal Authorities, consulted specifically, have given it as their opinion that such assent is necessary. The question is, therefore, in a nebulous condition. It is one of those undecided cases of constitutional practice and law. Such cases constantly arise, and must constantly arise in, every unwritten Constitution. They do arise under our Constitution, and the question the Government had to determine was this—the matter being so far undecided—on which side were they to lend the weight of their practice and authority? On which side should they attempt by a precedent to determine this undetermined question? I say we were undoubtedly right, having those two alternatives before us, to choose the alternative which gave greater authority to Parliament, instead of choosing the alternative which diminished the authority of Parliament. Now, does anybody doubt that? The right hon. Gentleman and the Member for Mid Lothian talked throughout their speeches as if this procedure diminished the power of the House of Commons. What is the power they claim for the House of Commons? The power of turning out the Ministry if the Ministry do not please them. Well, that power is retained; that power remains undiminished, and if they disapprove of a Treaty submitted to them they have only to pass a Vote of Censure, and the Government of the day vanishes into thin air. But I differ from the right hon. Gentleman. He seems to think that the control of Parliament over the Executive, control after the event (to use a somewhat Irish expression), the control by punishment and not by prevention, is in all cases the best method of managing international affairs. I do not think it is the best method. I admit that you could conclude a Treaty at the end of a war without Parliamentary consent. You could not conduct delicate foreign negotiations through the medium of the Houses of Parliament. I go much further, and I say to require the assent of Parliament to those exchanges or cessions of territory, which have constantly attended the conclusion of a peace, would be wholly absurd, and I, for one, should never think of being a party to any precedent that would make such a course obligatory on the Crown. But when I am told that, in all cases, this power of punishing the Ministry is ample security for managing international affairs I venture to differ. Prevention, as we all know, is better than cure. Here the right hon. Gentleman does not prevent; he punishes; he cannot cure. Under these circumstances it does seem to me that in these days, when the whole tendency of events is to increase the power of Parliament over the Executive, it is good to give Parliament not merely the power of punishing, but of preventing the Ministry from falling into error. That has been the policy we have followed in this case.

SIR W. HARCOURT: It will be a binding precedent.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The right hon. Gentleman interrupts me by saying this is a binding precedent. I do not object to its being a binding precedent if you do not exceed the precedent. The precedent is this—that in a time of profound peace, when no great public emergency threatens the State, when no other and ulterior considerations were involved, when no difficulties of negotiation would be produced, then, and then only, a cession of British territory, and the transfer of British subjects to a foreign dominion, should not be undertaken until the assent of both Houses of Parliament had been declared. That is the precedent we have set. That precedent, I hope, will always be adhered to, and I hope—I do not shrink from it—the time will never come when, under the conditions I have enumerated, any Government will attempt to concede portions of the British territory without first asking the assent of this House and the House of Lords. Is it not absurd that it should be a doctrine of our Constitutional Law that any Treaty which involves even a sixpence of expenditure should require the assent of this House and the House of Lords, but that a Treaty, which might involve the cession of places of vital interest to the safety of the British Empire, should be able to be passed unquestioned by a Ministry who might be called to account, but could not be prevented from carrying out their policy? I am not afraid, for my own part, of any conclusions that may be legitimately drawn from the action of Her Majesty's Government. The precedent we accept is one from which we do not shrink. It is a precedent which we think ought to be followed. We know that it does not interfere with the Treaty-making power of the Crown; we know that it does not interfere with the power of the Crown in a great national crisis, without the assent of Parliament, to pass Treaties which may involve far greater cessions than that of Heligoland; and we do not object, but rejoice in the fact that if this precedent has been set it will not be in the power of any Government to come, in a period of profound peace, to manipulate the territories of the British Empire without asking the assent of the British Parliament.

(7.42.) SIR HORACE DAVEY: After the speech we have just heard we now know from the highest authority that the right hon. Gentleman not only defends the cession of Heligoland, but he rejoices in it and hopes it will be a precedent for the future. The precedent set by the Government in this matter is one of the most important constitutional changes that has ever taken place, certainly within my political recollection. Now, Sir, what is the position in which we stand in relation to this matter? The right hon. Gentleman has told the House that he makes certain limitations to the generality of the doctrine he has just laid down. If I understand him rightly, he says the Government deliberately intend, by the form they have given to this Bill, to set a precedent by which it will be impossible for any future Government to make any Treaty without the assent of Parliament under certain conditions. What are those conditions? Anything more vague or more unsatisfactory cannot be conceived. There is to be no difficulty in a time of profound peace, but only in case of a national crisis. But who is to judge of whether there are difficulties of negotiation, or whether the time is one of a national crisis? Who is to judge, moreover, of whether there are ulterior considerations? Not only no lawyer, but no layman, would be able to grasp such a proposition of Constitutional Law as the right hon. Gentleman laid down. The proposition laid down by the right hon. Gentleman is that there is an exception to the Treaty-making power of the Crown in certain cases, which he is utterly unable to define by words which are capable of being put into a proposition of law.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am unwilling to interrupt the hon. and learned Gentleman. Nothing in my speech implied any limitation upon the Treaty-making power of the Crown; it was entirely the power of ceding territory.

SIR H. DAVEY: If you put a limitation upon the power of ceding territory, you put a limit upon the Treaty-making power of the Crown to cede territory. No one contends that the Crown can cede territory otherwise than by Treaty. I believe I am perfectly accurate when I say that in not a single instance has any doubt been thrown upon the power of the Crown to cede territory. It is quite true that the Minister who advises the Crown to make a cession of territory may be impeached, but I am not aware that Parliament has ever been asked by the Crown to give its opinion as to a cession of territory or the manner of making it. Our Constitutional Law is based upon precedents. We have no written Constitution. I ask where, if there are any precedents, am I to find this new constitutional theory? Blackstone, and all the great writers upon constitutional law are silent upon it. They place no limitation upon the power of the Crown to make a Treaty even for the cession of territory. The right hon. Gentleman said there were opinions quotable each way. I should like him to quote them. What is the use of telling me that the Law Advisers in a certain case gave certain opinions, unless I have an opportunity of reading those opinions, and of knowing the circumstances of the case to which they apply? The opinion of a lawyer without the case on which it is written is of singularly little value. But here we have not got even the lawyer's opinion. We are only told that the lawyer has given his opinion. I shall discard from my consideration any of those apocryphal opinions of the Law Officers. The right hon. Gentleman referred to the opinion of Sir Roundell Palmer, for whom I have as high a respect as anybody. Sir Roundell Palmer, in answering a question in this House, said the Crown had power to cede territory, but that he thought there might be a difference when Parliament had legislated for the cession of territory. So far as I know there is no authority in any text book, and no authority in any precedent, for the qualification, for it does not amount to more than a qualification, which Lord Selborne (Sir Roundell Palmer) was disposed to make in giving his answer. Lord Selborne did not say anything about a time of profound peace or ulterior considerations or difficulties of negotiation. I would much rather pay attention to the opinion of Lord Selborne after he has heard the argument of counsel, and, with the assistance of Lord Cairns, gives the judgment of the Privy Council, than to an off-hand answer to a question in this House. What was it that Lord Selborne said in giving the judgment of the Privy Council? He said—

"Their Lordships think it sufficient to state that they entertain such grave doubts, to say no more, of the soundness of the general abstract doctrine laid down in high quarters as to be unable to advise any decision on the question."

I must congratulate the Party which calls itself the Constitutional Party on this new departure from Constitutional Law. In my opinion, it is revolutionary; in my opinion it is a precedent of a most dangerous character, and, so far as I can see from the speeches of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the right hon. Gentleman, not a single shred of justification has been given for this departure. Has the Chancellor of the Exchequer given any justification for it? All he has said was that the Government did not think it right to cede territory in which there were British subjects living, and that there were British subjects living in Heligoland. There are British subjects living in every portion of the British territory, and if the justification of the Chancellor of the Exchequer were sound, you could never cede any British territory at all without the assent of Parliament. The deliberate opinion of Lord Palmerston, who was a man of the highest experience in these matters, was that the Crown had, without the assent of Parliament, the most ample power to cede territory. Of course, if a Minister of the Crown does it, it is at the risk of being censured and called to account in this House. But subject to that limitation, it appears to me a precedent of a most dangerous character, which we are now told has been deliberately set in the form in which this Treaty has been made and this Bill has been introduced.

(7.58.) SIR G. BADEN-POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale): Sir, the hon. and learned Gentleman who has just sat down has described this as the most important constitutional change of the century, and one without the slightest justification. But the Government had no other course open to them than that which they adopted. Distinguished constitutional lawyers have told us that it still remains doubtful whether by prerogative of the Crown it is possible to cede territory, and still more it is doubtful when you include inhabitants for whom this Parliament has legislated. I have noticed that speakers on the other side of the House imagine that Parliament has only one way, especially the House of Commons, of controlling the prerogative of the Crown, and that is by moving an Address to the Crown. But it must be acknowledged that in any Treaty which requires a legislative enactment to carry out its terms Parliament must have full control over that portion of the Agreement. I venture to say that in many cases Parliament has exercised that control where the right of the British subject has been recognised by Parliament, and the Crown does not cede that right without the sanction of the Legislature. With regard to Heligoland, Parliament has legislated on many details affecting the residents; there is no doubt Parliament has control of Heligoland, and the Agreement will affect a state of things which the Legislature has sanctioned.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Will the hon. Member give us the reference to the Act of Parliament?

*SIR G. BADEN-POWELL: I daresay the right hon. Gentleman is well aware of the power under which the Supreme Authority in England confers the right of legislating for the colonies by Order in Council. This is done by virtue of the General Statute Law, and the Order in Council merely carries out the general Statutes of Parliament. In my humble opinion, the Government have no other course but to come to Parliament, considering that in this particular case the Treaty would interfere with the legislative enactments passed by Parliament itself. It is no question whether the Bill forms a precedent or not, for it does not change the Constitutional action of this House in regard to the prerogative of the Crown. As to the general question, whilst no doubt we feel we ought ourselves, by reason of our experience, to make the best use of Africa, we should not object to other countries making some use of it. Personally, I have no jealousy of other countries; and I think that, provided we obtain low Import Duties and free transit routes, we need not fear any other Power, especially when we remember that we have in Africa a million square miles of territory which will surely form a sufficient area for our operations during the next century or two. Wherever our civilisation extends markets open for British goods, and we are able to obtain from the natives in return supplies of food and other objects of commerce which are very valuable to us. It has been said in relation to this Treaty that we need a free course for our trade from the Zambesi to the Nile. That is an argument which will not hold water. We do not want to go from the north to the south in Africa, but to carry our goods by the shortest route to and from the coast, and our course will be east and west rather than north and south. From this point of view I have no fear of the extension of German influence right up to the boundaries of the Congo State. I think it a great pity, however, that the Government has not been able to negotiate for the Protectorate of Damaraland and Namaqualand. It has been said that he German occupation of those territories is purely our fault and not the fault of the Cape Colony. If we look at the history of the question we shall find that at no very distant date the Cape Colony absolutely repudiated any idea of extending British authority over those territories. In 1885 the Cape Parliament resolved upon the desirability of annexing the coast up to Walfish Bay, but they specifically excluded the interior from annexation. Sir Bartle Frere, with the free assent of Lord Carnarvon, urged both Governments to annex the whole of the territory up to the Portuguese boundary. The Cape Government was at the time in some difficulty, and it declined to annex those territories. It also withdrew the two British Residents from them, because, as it was distinctly stated, the moral force with which they sought to control the districts had failed to control them, and they were not prepared to use any other force. In February of 1884 our Ministers began again to urge the Cape Ministers to combine with them on this subject. It was not till June that they got a reply from the Cape, and by that time it was too late, because the Germans had taken possession of the territory. To my mind, there are very strong and urgent reasons why we should, if we could, have negotiated with Germany to get back these territories. I think, myself, that the whole of South Africa below the parallel of about 20 south latitude, should be under one flag and united together in one confederation or dominion, and I am convinced that all the European races in South Africa are willing to come together in one confederation, and will inevitably do so as soon as local jealousies have time to cease. For this reason I should like to see Damaraland and Namaqualand made an adjunct of the Cape Colony or Bechuanaland, so as to round off the South African States system. These countries would, I think, be best opened up from the Cape and Kimberley—as we know they do not, as it is, deal direct with Europe. I regret that there is no arrangement from the retrocession of these great territories, but, at the same time, I think the Anglo-German Agreement will confer inestimable advantage on the whole of Africa and enable us to work hand-in-hand with the other European Powers. I only hope that our negotiations with France and Portugal will be as successful as those with Germany. I do not think Her Majesty's Government had any other constitutional course open to them than to come to Parliament to sanction this Treaty to enable us to cede Heligoland. For we have legislated for the people of that island and could not hand them over to a Foreign Power without the consent of Parliament. (8.20.)

(8.43.) Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

*(8.45.) MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I intend very briefly to give my reasons for supporting the Government. I have always desired to limit the prerogative of the Crown, and it is because I conceive that this Bill, whenever it receives the Royal Assent, will distinctly limit the prerogative of the Crown that I shall go into the lobby with the Government. If I had any doubt on the matter, my doubt would have been cleared away by the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour). The right hon. Gentleman said that there were authorities quotable on both sides of the question, and that the Government had taken the course which he said was undoubtedly the right course to take, namely, that which gave greater authority to Parliament. If the right hon. Gentleman's words have any meaning, they mean that the Government, a Conservative Government, has with its eyes open selected a course which will in future diminish the prerogative of the Crown and increase the authority of Parliament at the expense of that prerogative. It is perfectly true that the right hon. Gentleman said that the limitation of the power of the Crown will be confined to the precedent we are dealing with this evening. I submit that there is no distinction or possible separation of the Treaties under different categories, except so far as those Treaties already come under categories where Parliament has already authority. The Chief Secretary said that any future action in reference to such a matter will be limited by the consideration which he said governs the House now in relation to this Treaty, namely, questions as to whether there was outside excitement, and a number of matters to which I need not allude. I submit confidently that the only precedent that will be possible for reference will be the precedent of the Statute itself, and that it will not be competent to go outside the Statute to discuss the reasons which may or may not tempt or induce Members of either House to concur in the passing of the Bill; that it is quite impossible to take anything exterior to the Statute itself to determine whether or not the Statute limits the prerogative of the Crown or the extent to which it limits it. That this Bill if it becomes a Statute will limit the prerogative of the Crown is clear. It will not be competent after this Bill becomes law for anyone to go behind it and say that it was doubtful or that it might or might not have been done in some other way. The whole of the utterances as to the limitation of the prerogative of the Crown in the highest Constitutional Authorities show a gradual limitation by Statute after Statute, and it has been held over and over again that it is impossible to limit the prerogative by words of doubt; it must be limited by words which I say we have here. This, by the assent of the Queen, will be a relinquishment of the prerogative of Her Majesty and her successors to make, in the words of one of our greatest Constitutional Authorities, Treaties, leagues, and alliances with Foreign States and Princes without the consent of Parliament. I submit that that is a legal submission which the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General will hardly dispute. The express words of the Chief Secretary for Ireland were that the Government intentionally and knowingly proposed—I am not quite sure about the intention—to give greater authority to Parliament; greater authority against whom? It can only be against the Crown. There is no authority given by this Bill against anybody except against the Crown. It may be that the exigencies of the argument will require the Attorney General, who, I notice, dissents, to contend that the prerogative has been abandoned in this particular only. I assent, without fear of contradiction, that such a contention would be laughed out of any Court in the realm. There never has been the contention that the prerogative, limited in one Statute, could be re-taken by the Crown of its own will; it needs the consent of the two Houses of Parliament to restore to the Crown the prerogative it has voluntarily abandoned, and the whole of the theory of our limited Monarchy and the whole of our Constitution has grown in that way, and it is because I desire to limit the prerogative of the Crown, to make the Chief Magistrate of this country subject to Parliament, because I hope that this proceeding may lead to the prevention of wars by preventing the making of Treaties which end in wars, that I intend to vote with the Government in support of this Bill. It has been said that the assent of Parliament is necessary, because it is a matter of doubt. I suggest that the burden is upon the Attorney General or whoever may reply to show one solitary case in which any Treaty has been impeached on the ground of the inability of the Sovereign of these realms to enter into it. It is quite true that there is the danger that the effect of this Bill will be to increase the power of the other House, as well as of this. I am not concerned with the other House. I am concerned with the powers of this House, and it is because I am sure that this Bill will increase the power of Parliament—meaning by that, both Houses of Parliament—and will limit seriously in this respect the prerogative of the Crown, that I intend to vote with the Government. It is said that as there is in the House of Lords a Party predominant over the Party to which Members on this side of the House belong, you will paralyse Liberal Governments. I am willing to take the risk of that. If I am sure I have reduced the power of the Crown to make Treaties which involve impositions upon the nation, I shall be quite content to rely on what experience has taught us, that when the House of Lords enters upon a struggle with the House of Commons on questions of public policy, it is the House of Commons that prevails. But at present the House of Commons is powerless against a Ministry in relation to a Treaty. A Ministry may be thrown out of Office by a hostile vote of this House, but the repudiation of a Treaty never follows. I intend to vote with the Government, and it is something to be able to defend one's self before the country by showing that those who boast most of being constitutionalists, either intentionally or in ignorance, are most frequent in trampling upon the Constitution. It would be a special pleasure to me to assist the Government in modifying one part of the Constitution, because I had to struggle against them in defence of another part. I need not occupy any length of time; the way lies so clear that words weaken rather than strengthen the case. The point is not as to what Treaties have been before, but as to those we are to have in the future. I admit that whatever has been done by the Crown in virtue of prerogative; whatever has been done before this Bill becomes law, is not affected; but from the moment this Bill receives the Royal Assent, it is an admonition to the Sovereign that the Crown has no right to enter into alliances or engagements with any Foreign State or Prince without the authority of Parliament, and, therefore, not without the authority of this House. This is so clear to my mind that on this ground alone I shall vote with the Government in limiting the power of the Crown.

*(9.1.) MR. BAUMANN (Camberwell, Peckham): Perhaps I ought to apologise to the House for descending from the Olympian heights of Constitutional Law to the prosaic level of the Agreement itself now before the House; but I do not think we ought to allow the constitutional aspect of the question, important as it is, entirely to obscure the merits or demerits of the Agreement which we are asked to assent to. The present Sir Robert Peel once said the Constitutional Lawyers were the greatest bores in the House of Commons, and at this stage of the proceedings I think it is a dictum that Members will not be disposed to deny. If we are to consider the Treaty itself, it is about time we said good-bye to Constitutional Law. Most hon. Members will agree that it is a new and sound departure in our foreign and colonial politics when we resolve to settle international differences by bargains rather than by battles, as in former days; and I am very glad to infer from what has been said by the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs that this Agreement is likely to create a precedent, and that we may in future, by conceding in West Africa something to the just demands of France, settle without further disagreement the question of the Newfoundland fisheries. France has behaved towards us with great forbearance and comity in this matter, and I certainly hope that, having made this Agreement with Germany and having left France rather out in the cold in the matter, we shall not be slow, when we come to deal with the question of Zanzibar, to follow the lines on which Lord Salisbury has proceeded up to the present, and make some concession to France on the West Coast of Africa. With regard to the East African part of the question and the concessions we have made to and obtained from Germany, I will say only this, not being peculiarly well qualified to speak on the matter—that I think the settlement is of a statesmanlike character, and that it is well worth giving something to secure the friendship of the greatest Protestant Power in Europe. But with regard to that part of the subject which deals with South Africa, and about which I know a little more, I am bound to say that I cannot altogether approve the arrangement which Lord Salisbury has made, because I think the noble Lord has gone too far, and unnecessarily far, in allowing the Germans to come within our sphere of influence in that part of Africa. It is not only that he has allowed Germany to come east of the 20th degree of longitude, and as far as the 21st degree; but that when they reach the 18th parallel of latitude, he has allowed the Germans to go a great deal further east to Victoria Falls in such a way as to block or cross the path of our expansion in the Bechuanaland Protectorate. In order to appreciate what Lord Salisbury has done in admitting the Germans within our sphere of influence in South Africa, it is necessary to allude shortly to the history of that sphere of influence. Our sphere of influence was proclaimed with all due solemnity and deliberation on February 11, 1888, by Mr. Moffatt, then Acting Commissioner; and on July 25 in the same year, Sir Hercules Robinson wrote to the Transvaal Government that Her Majesty's Government regarded territory north of the South African Republic, South of the Zambesi, east of the 20th degree of east longitude, and west of the Portuguese settlement of Sofala, as exclusively within the sphere of British influence. Now the phrase "sphere of influence" was new in colonial politics at that time, and it struck the ear of the Dutch Republic, and they asked the British Government to give an explanation of what was meant by "sphere of influence," and they asked what was the position under the law of nations of such territory, and as this is of great importance in colonial politics, I hope the House will forgive me if I read Lord Knutsford's answer. He instructed Sir Hercules Robinson to reply to President Krüger on March 29, 1889, in the following terms:—

"In answer to the question in paragraph 5 of your Despatch as to what would be the position under the law of nations of territory exclusively under British influence, I am directed to state that such territory could not be without the consent of Her Majesty's Government, annexed by the South African Republic or by any Foreign Power, nor could any concession be made by any King or Chief within such territory which would place British subjects or British trade in a position of disadvantage."

I ask with what face, having on those conditions rigorously excluded the Boers from the territory which marches with their own country, and into which they might legitimately ask that they might be allowed to expand and overflow, can we admit the Germans to it? I think the Boers have some reason to complain that we have hemmed them in on every side, but I think they have a double reason to complain when we have told them somewhat bluntly that the Protectorate territory is meant not for them but their masters, and now allow the Germans to take out a large slice of this, to them, forbidden territory. I cannot help saying our conduct in this regard appears, I had almost said contemptible, when we compare it with our attitude towards Portugal. Before the awful personality of Serpa Pinto we are arrogant and unbending: before Germany we are complaisance itself. It is extraordinary what a cementing bond of friendship is the mastership, mastership of many legions. I warn Lord Salisbury, however, that in admitting Germany within our sphere of influence in South Africa without, I believe, taking any counsel with the Government of Cape Colony, he is opening up a vista of future troubles.

Mr. Baumann

I am afraid he is raising a crop of troubles in South Africa, because it is impossible that there we can have a double reign. I have, therefore, felt it to be my duty to protest against unnecessary concession to the Germans in South Africa, especially as we receive nothing in exchange. Viewing the Agreement as a whole, however, I regard it as a solid monument of statesmanship, and I shall vote for the Second Reading of the Bill.

(9.15.) MR. PHILIPPS (Lanark, Mid.): The Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs has said that British interests should be above Party fights. Now, I remember that, on June 2nd, an hon. Member moved a reduction in the Vote for the expenses of Heligoland, on the ground that it would be desirable to trade away the island to Germany for some concession in Africa, and upon that 27 Members voted in favour of the proposition and 150 against it, who are now disposed to accept this Agreement, and, in view of these things, I am disposed to doubt whether the House does put British interests above Party fights. I remember, after the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy and the hon. Member for the Scotland Division had suggested the exchange of Heligoland for some advantage in South Africa, the Under Secretary for the Colonies said that "Not a shadow of reason or excuse for giving up one of the possessions of the Crown had been brought forward by the hon. Members."

Well, we have not yet heard of the resignation of the Under Secretary for the Colonies, and I do not think he is going to speak on this question. Therefore, I think the right hon. Gentleman (Sir James Fergusson) is a little sanguine in expressing the hope that this will be treated above Party considerations. It has been said in favour of giving up Heligoland that there is difficulty in defending an outlying possession such as this; that we have not an army to garrison such. But do we garrison outlying islands around our coasts? No garrisons are needed; they are defended by the knowledge that they are defended by the power of the British Navy, by the knowledge that if invaders landed, they would soon be surrounded, and have to surrender to a British Fleet. Surely there is no serious argument in this difficulty that we cannot garrison our possessions. The cession of the island I do not regard as of very much importance, but it is a new principle that we should give up a population of 2,000 persons who have no wish whatever to be surrendered. The only evidence of their willingness is that Lord Salisbury said he had an impression that they did not object, and the Under Secretary has stated that we hear less and less of objection on their part every day. Well, I suppose that is natural, for the people are poor and powerless, and as they feel it is more and more likely they are to be handed over to Germany, they would naturally be more and more reluctant to raise objections. There is only one way of settling the question, and that is by taking a plébiscite. I do not wish to exaggerate the importance of Heligoland, though I believe there is some evidence that Naval and Military Authorities do consider it of some value. The Under Secretary does not dispute that Heligoland is of greater value to Germany than to us. Its value to them, from a sentimental point of view, is considerable, and possibly it has a naval value. On that account we ought to get a very good bargain from Germany, but the fact is we have only obtained two things which can be called concessions at all, namely, certain rights in Uganda and in the Sultanate of Vitu. The value of these rights is very doubtful. They may be of certain value to trading companies, but my point of opposition to the Anglo-German Agreement is that we are seeking to create in Central Africa a place for future colonisation, and I do not believe in a pestilential place like Vitu or equatorial districts as a place where Europeans can settle, live, and thrive. On the other hand, there are in East Central Africa alone two things of great importance to us—first, the plateau of land to the East of Lake Tanganyika, which many travellers, Commander Cameron and others, say is suitable for European colonisation; and, secondly, a British belt running from north to south. With this we should have a frontier continuous with the Congo State and Lake Tanganyika as a frontier for 400 miles. Neither of these two things are obtained for us. The Government have reserved the right to a road from one British territory to another—I could have wished that it was the right to a railroad, which will be of far greater consequence. But it is in South-West Africa that we have made the most disastrous concessions. The value of that country has only recently become known. It is fit for pastures, and is of great mineral wealth. It is just as we have got to know its value that we have gone out of our way to surrender a large slice of it to Germany. The Germans are making no use of Damara-land and Namaqualand. I do not think there are more than 200 German citizens in all that vast territory. They are simply settling on it, waiting until the work and capital of our people make it valuable, and then they will step in and claim it. While I do not say the Government could have got it back I do say, repeating what has been said by the hon. Member for Peckham, that it is an outrageous thing that German territory should be extended from longitude 20 deg. E. to 21 deg. E. at the expense of the Chartered Company, and by a strip of 300 or 400 miles to the upper waters of the Zambesi. There is no concession whatever made to us in that part of Africa. We have thrown away the interest of Englishmen, of Boers, and of all the peoples of South Africa, and have got no earthly advantage in return. It is a serious matter, for this is one of the richest countries in the world. It is rich as an agricultural country, it abounds in mineral wealth; it has gold, and gold attracts settlers. These will find a fine climate, where they and their families can live and thrive, land for pasture and agriculture, coal just under the surface, iron ore, and other minerals. From all this we deliberately shut ourselves out. There are other and minor reasons against the arrangement. The line of division will cut through the country of the Makololo and Baroto tribes, and experience on the Afghan frontier with the Turcoman tribes, under like circumstances, should warn us against troubles that may arise from this cause. We have heard a great deal about the Hinterland doctrine; we are told that where a country has the coast line it ought also to own the land behind it. But I have noticed in this case that wherever the Hinterland doctrine has been in our favour, the principle has been departed from, whereas it has been kept when it has been against us. Why have we not the Hinterland principle applied in the case of Walfisch Bay? If the Government got the right to run a railway from Walfisch Bay into the interior, it would be some compensation for the wicked surrender which they have been making. I do not want to repeat what has already been said about Zanzibar. I think it is agreed that in 1886 we did practically exercise a Protectorate there. The Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs has admitted that at that time our influence in Zanzibar was predominant and successful. In the year 1886, I repeat, we were exercising a Protectorate in Zanzibar, but by the action of the Government, Germany was allowed to get into the island, and now the only real concession which we have got under this Agreement is, that we are allowed to have back again the island of Zanzibar. At the same time, we do not recover possession of the five or six hundred miles of coast line which make the possession of the island valuable. The fact is, having once given up the island, we are surrendering Heligoland in order to get it back again. We are told, Sir, that we must not look at this Treaty bit by bit, but that we must consider it as a whole. But how can we do that unless we first take it bit by bit? We give a concession and we get a concession, and the question is, where does the balance of advantage come in? We get nothing given us except certain definite rights over two places in the Equator, the Sultanate of Vitu and Uganda. Moreover, under the Treaty, we shall have to buy the island a second time from France. That is a bargain which only requires to be mentioned in order to be condemned, and I am sure that if hon. Members vote as they feel, this Anglo-German Agreement will not meet the approval of the House to-night. I am not attacking the Agreement in any spirit of Jingoism. Jingoism is, I think, a hateful thing. We know what it is. We know that men on the platform shout about this great Empire, and howl about giving up the territory which our forefathers fought for, but I venture to think that their forefathers had little to do with the building up of this Empire. The reason why I dislike the Agreement is this. I know that this country is a country in which white men can live. I believe it is a country where millions of our fellow subjects may live and thrive. You have many States happily coming well together. You have the Cape, Natal, the Transvaal, and the Orange Free State. They are getting on better and better, and we are coming rapidly nearer to the day when there will be a confederation of all the States in Africa. Yet we are, by this Agreement, throwing in among them a German Official element, connecting them with another European country, with which they cannot coalesce or combine. In South Africa there are already nearly half a million of white men spread over the different States—an hon. Member near me says there are 1,000,000. I did not know there were so many, and I have stated there are 500,000, because I believe it is best to be on the safe side. But in the German territory in the South-West you have only about 200 Germans. Why, then, do the Government want to give up more territory to these few Germans, who do nothing to civilise these States, but simply sit down to take their ease, leaving it to British and Boer enterprise to develop the country and make it more valuable to them some day? In the meanwhile, the people of this country are increasing at an enormously rapid rate every year, and we must find some country for our emigrants in the future. I, therefore, deplore immensely that even one square mile of Africa should be given up without absolute necessity. It is difficult to understand why this Agreement was ever made. They tell us that we have the advantage of having secured the friendship of Germany. I hope that we have, but it seems to me that friendship may be sometimes too dearly bought, and I think it will be much too dearly bought if it is purchased by giving up valuable territories in the colonies and in Africa. We do not require interest in Europe. The less we have to do with European politics the better. I think that friendship purchased in Europe will prove a very dear bargain indeed if we give up for it valuable territory in the colonies. I am opposing this Agreement because of the intense interest I feel in this continent and in the subject of colonisation. Africa is a country in which white men may live and thrive, and it is because of my regret at seeing Her Majesty's Government giving up even a small bit of this immensely valuable territory that I beg to move that the Bill be read a second time this day three months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."—(Mr. Philipps.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

(9.40.) SIR JOHN KENNAWAY (Devon, Honiton): We must all congratulate Lord Salisbury upon having succeeded in closing an open sore between this country and Germany. No doubt it is possible to point out various localities in which we might have had something more, but to intimate, as the last speaker has done, that there has been a throwing away of an opportunity, and a neglect of the interests of our colonies, is very unfair. The feeling of the country will be that there is great cause for satisfaction at the conclusion of this Treaty. It is well to observe how marvellous has been the change of opinion during the past few years with regard to the acquisition of territorial influence. A short time ago we were anxious to get rid of, or, at all events, there seemed to be a feeling that we cared nothing for our colonies or colonial possessions—that they were a burden to us, that we had more on our hands than we could manage, and that we might get rid of everything outside our islands. The change from that state of feeling has been most marked, and only a few months ago we were oppressed with the fear that Germany had altogether out-stripped us in the race, and that we were likely to be crowded out of Africa altogether. There was fear that our commerce in seeking new outlets, and our missionary enterprises which had sent forward so many devoted men, and had expended millions of money, might have their energies hampered. Because we must remember that it is this English enterprise and English zeal which has opened up Africa in the way it has been opened up. English money has been spent to a very large extent, and it is only right that we should have a full and free scope for our energies, both in respect to commerce and to missions. When, therefore, the Agreement came to light, it was agreeable to find that our interests had been safe-guarded to a very great extent. The hon. Gentleman who has just spoken threw scorn upon Uganda, but it has been proved that the country, as described by Mr. Stanley, is a very rich one and fertile, and I hope that when opened up by the East African Company, as it will be, it may prove a very useful outlet for colonisation to develop and promote civilisation in these parts. When, too, we remember the tension which existed a short time ago between this country and Germany, and the good feeling and hearty good will which now prevails, we shall feel that great importance should be attached to the present Agreement. The East African Company, which has already done so much, and is competent to do more, and the Missionary Societies will now be able to go forward with the sure knowledge that their energies will not be hampered. The House has heard a good deal of high oratory this evening respecting the clause which makes the Agreement subject to the assent of the British Parliament, and that high oratory has come from those who are, no doubt, well qualified to speak on the matter. We have been told that this is a great blow at the Royal prerogative and the hon. and junior Member for Northampton has said that he will support the Bill because it is a clear limitation of the Royal prerogative. My right hon. Friend the Irish Secretary, always an advocate of a heroic policy, has rushed forward in defence of the clause, and at once wished to take the view that it would have great effect in the future. I hardly know whether other Members of the Government will take exactly that view. I, myself, have regarded it not so much in the light of a precedent, but I think that this clause was inserted at the request of His Imperial Majesty the German Emperor, who wished this Agreement to be not merely a Treaty with the British Government, but one with the British people, for he desired the question to be decided in amity between the two nations, and to be regarded as a token of the wish of the two peoples to live in strong friendship. This being the case, I hope and trust that, whatever we may think of the legislative achievements of this Session, we shall at all events look back upon this Agreement of 1890 as one which forms not only a bond of union between the two peoples, but also a precedent to the settling of such matters in a spirit of mutual concession and conciliation, which will enable them to go forward in the future in the work of civilisation in which these two Christian peoples are working together.

(9.50.) DR. CLARK (Caithness): If it were not for the African question I should strongly support the Second Reading of this Bill. I am glad that the Government have given up Heligoland, but, inasmuch as a great tract of valuable land is being given up in Africa as well, I shall oppose the Second Reading. The right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs is mistaken in saying that the Cape Government refused to take over Namaqualand. The fact is that in 1883 a Mr. Spence was organising an expedition in Cape Colony to go to Namaqualand, and take over some land for which he had obtained a concession there. About that time a German subject obtained from a Hottentot chief, for a few pounds and some cattle, a concession of some five miles of land, and the object of Mr. Spence's expedition was to turn the German out. Prince Bismarck asked the British Government whether we had a Protectorate in Namaqualand, or whether we would undertake to protect German subjects there. To that question for many months Lord Derby gave no reply. From September, 1883, until June, 1884, both Mr. Montana, as Colonial Secretary, and Mr. Scanlan, as Prime Minister, wrote to the High Commissioner strongly urging that the Imperial Government should take over the country, and when that Ministry was displaced by Sir Thomas Uppingham strong representations continued to be made to the Imperial Government to take over Namaqualand. Sir Hercules Robinson telegraphed to Lord Derby urging that the Imperial Government should accede to the wishes of the Government of Cape Colony, but Lord Derby telegraphed back asking Sir H. Robinson to prevent the matter being brought before the Cape Parliament. Those facts I learned in conversation with members of the Cape Ministry, and they also appear on the Despatches. Yet we are told by the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs that neither the Imperial nor the Cape Government would take over Namaqualand, and hence the Germans took it over. It was not until Prince Bismarck had waited for months for an answer which he did not get that he stepped in and declared the five miles or so of land which were claimed by the German subject to be German territory. Now that has blossomed into one-half of Africa. No doubt the Liberal Government are to blame, but the Cape Government expected that in a matter of that kind the present Government would ask them whether they would sanction the course about to be taken. Then, why should the Government hand over to Germany a portion of Bechuanaland upon which so much British money has been spent? The Makololo and the Bechuanas will be partly under English and partly under German control. In exchange for all that territory, we are getting a strip of coast land. But everyone knows that in Africa the coast line is the least valuable, because of the fever, which makes it impossible for white men to live there. The really valuable land is in the well-watered uplands some 5,000 or 7,000 feet above the sea, and that is the kind of land which has been given up to the Germans. There is now a more friendly feeling than there has been for a long time between the two sections of the population of South Africa, the Dutch and the English. There is less race feeling existing there now, and the first step has been taken this year by having a Customs Union. The men who have been fighting us are becoming loyal to the Crown, and there is a still more kindly feeling developing in the Free State and the Transvaal, where a British subject can have a vote after two years, and can become naturalised after five years. But now you are introducing the German element in Bechuanaland; you are bringing it to within easy distance of the Transvaal. I do not disapprove of the cession of Heligoland, which is to Bremen and Hamburg what the Isle of Man is to Liverpool and Manchester; but as regards South Africa, nothing more foolish has been done in the last 20 years than has been done. I yet see the sources of strained relations with Germany. In certain territories British subjects are prevented from entering by German officials. That those who have spent their money and time there are to be subject to a few people on the coast seems to be the height of folly. I say you have introduced an element of discord when Boers and Englishmen were beginning to see the merits of each other. You have brought the German force within a fortnight's march of the borders where the Crawford incident took place. Her Majesty's Government have done this, when they might have developed the magnificent territories and obtained the assistance of the Cape Government in establishing a position which they have now sacrificed.

(10.5.) MR. E. BECKETT (York, N.R., Whitby): Sir, though this Agreement seems likely to encounter no very violent opposition in this House, and will probably be sanctioned without a Division, I do not think it is one in which the Government and the country need take any particular pride. I think the Conservative Party have not studied the question, feeling the utmost confidence in the statesmanship of Lord Salisbury. Still, I fear that they have an uneasy sense that all is not well. They do not think it is quite what they would have approved of in 1885. It certainly is a fact that if any cession is proposed by the other side of the House, we shall not be able to oppose it with the freedom we should have felt had this Agreement not been in existence to bear witness against us. Lord Salisbury, in his speech in the House of Lords, did not claim any great merit for this arrangement, though extravagant eulogies have been passed upon him by his supporters. He said that the chief merit of this Agreement was that neither England nor Germany gained any advantage over the other. I think it will be granted that England will get no advantage from Germany, but no one will say that Germany does not get very considerable advantage from England. Germany has been too much favoured and England too much forgotten. We have made a cession for which we have received no adequate return. We have thrown away huge territories in Africa with a reckless prodigality that reminds one of the rake's progress, and in our passion for parting we take the Gibraltar of the Baltic and chuck it into the German Emperor's lap in order that he may say to the world, "Behold, another Bismarck is here!" A great deal has occurred in South Africa which I think is best illustrated by taking a description of England in Africa a few years ago written in a German journal of high authority—

"England has laid her hand on all South Africa, where the Orange Free State alone prolongs an independent existence for perhaps only a few years. She has assumed a semi-autocratic position in Egypt and Zanzibar, and the cry has gone through the English papers to win the great and newly discovered territories of the Congo for Great Britain and to create in them a new and gigantic market for Egyptian merchandise."

After dazzling his readers with this picture of England sitting enthroned in the Continent of Africa, the writer added in a deprecating way, "But Germany ought not to resign this immense spoil to England." Nor has she. You cannot say that now our possessions in Africa are like an ocean whose broad expanse is broken only by a solitary island. The Transvaal has emerged from the waves. The waters have receded from Damaraland and appear likely to leave Swaziland uncovered. Our autocratic position in Zanzibar has been resigned and only partially resumed; so that all that remains to us is our semi-autocratic position in Egypt and a bare half of our former possessions in South Africa. It has been contended that we really have no Protectorate over Zanzibar, and the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs used rather a hard expression, for he said that we would not resume the Protectorate of Zanzibar in a concrete form.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I did not use that word.

MR. E. BECKETT: Our relations with, and our services to, Zanzibar date back 30 years and more. In 1860 an insurrection, organised by the Sultan's brother, was suppressed by our aid, and the Sultan saved from ruin. He and his successors were devoted to the British alliance, our object being, independent of trade, the suppression of slavery. We also provided a Christian Church, and have something like 10,000 children in Christian schools. Furthermore, we have greatly reduced, if not altogether abolished, the Slave Trade. In 1872 we sent Sir Bartle Frere on a special mission to Zanzibar to arrange for the suppression of the Slave Trade. We have by these and other events established a virtual Protectorate, which was acquiesced in by the Powers of Europe, and the Sultan looked to us to support him. In 1873 there was no mail service to Zanzibar except that of England, and in 1875 the Sultan visited England, where he was received with great state and cordiality. On his return new rules for the suppression of the Slave Trade were made, and in 1875 the Bishop there wrote that the Slave Trade was practically at an end. In 1879 Egypt thought to secure the trade of Central Africa, and sent a fleet to Zanzibar. This, however, was protested against; the protest was supported by England, and Egypt gave way. In 1880 Sir John Kirk, our able and zealous Consul there, left on two years' leave of absence. He was received with great demonstrations, and treated with special marks of distinction. On his return he decorated the Sultan with the Grand Cross of St. Michael and St. George sent by the Queen, and in the following year the Sultan entertained the officers and men of the British Fleet. From 1883 dates the growth of German influence. Owing to the apathy and indifference of the English Government the Germans tried to undermine and oust us. The Sultan, however, still looked to England, and in 1884 he wrote—

"Confiding in the good Providence of the Most High God and relying on Her Most Gracious Majesty we have no fear of aggression from any one."

In 1886 Germany made claims which were resisted by the Sultan, but a convention was made between England and Germany which deprived Zanzibar of nearly all its possessions, but reserved a 10 mile zone on the mainland. This was done to satisfy English public opinion. The Government did not dare to hand over unconditionally the territory of a faithful ally, who had trusted us and followed our advice for a quarter of a century; but in 1888 the territory of Zanzibar was further contracted, and the whole mainland was practically surrendered to Germany, and what was the result? From the date of that usurpation the natives became dissatisfied, and rebelled; murders were committed; Germany expressly bound herself in 1886 and again in 1887 not to operate in, or permit operations in, the territory we have now surrendered to her. The right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary has to-night made use of a very remarkable expression, for he said we did not assume this Protectorate in a concrete fashion, but that our operations in this part of Africa were for the common good of the human race. It seems to me that to say we only go to Zanzibar on philanthropic considerations and for the good of the human race in general is hardly a thing worthy of consideration. It is said that we have trading rights over the German sphere of influence in East Africa. We had already trading rights over the German sphere of influence, but Germany has excluded British traders and caravans from that sphere and placed great obstacles in the way of our traders. The utility of our trade route has been made light of. Is it as useless as some seem to think? Before the Anglo-German Agreement was published, I stated that the Power becoming possessed of this route would have the control of the inland trade, which has been valued at £15,000,000 a year, and I predicted that Germany would stand firm. Lord Salisbury has said that rather than give way Germany would have broken off the Agreement; but it must be remembered that we have trading rights secured by the Berlin Act of 1885, which, however, have been absolutely disregarded. They tried to ruin Mombassa. A South African told me that it was almost impossible for Englishmen to trade in Damaraland. In 1888 the Consul made a claim on the mines in Damaraland, saying that by the law of Germany the mines could only be owned and worked by German subjects. The Germans are bad neighbours, and their action in Africa has been marked by continued hostility to us, while we have been putting into their hands the sticks with which they beat us. We have meekly yielded to their aggressions, each concession having been the prelude to a fresh claim. With regard to the presence of the Germans in Uganda, Bishop Smythies writes—

"The result of the Germans coming has been that, after living safely among the people for 20 years, our relations with them becoming ever more friendly, we now see our work hindered, our lives possibly endangered, and our religion degraded, because we are now associated with violence and oppression. And all to what end?"

We may well ask to what end? And the answer is, the aggrandisement of Germany and the humiliation of England. We have allowed the Germans to extend in Damaraland, Namaqualand, across to the Zambesi, so that we cannot reach the fertile lands except through the German territory. It was proposed to construct a railway from the Victoria Falls to the Zambesi, the Portuguese having given a concession for that purpose. If it were made, unquestionably it would open up a valuable market in a highly fertile region. The hon. Member for Caithness hit the right nail on the head when he said that the arrangement was unfortunate at the present moment for the South African people, because we have allowed it to appear to the natives that another nation has taken advantage of us and is stronger than we are. If we wish to unite the white men in South Africa in a confederation with the Government of England, we must show that we are prepared to assert supremacy and power. The day of confederation will be postponed as long as Her Majesty's Government show that their policy is one of shuffling and retreat. No one can pretend that we have gained anything in South Africa, and we have gained nothing in East Africa to which we had not a right before. I do not think that anyone has attempted to assert that we have obtained a good bargain in Africa, and I do not see why concessions in Europe should have been added to our concessions in Africa. We must look at this South African question in the light of past history, and it is an unfortunate thing that to the African mind of late years we have always appeared in the light of surrendering something to somebody. A Union, under the headship of England, is now the dream and aspiration of South Africa. If Germany could have been induced to clear out of Damaraland and Namaqualand a great stride would have been made towards the realisation of that dream. Confederation will become easier in proportion as the over-mastering power and ruling capacity of England are felt and recognised; but as long as our policy is one of shuffle and surrender, so long shall we postpone the day of confederation. As it is, Germany has gained an extension of territory to the Congo, and absolute possession of the coast line, and she has only ceded regions none of which ever belonged to her, while we have only gained a resumption of our Protectorate over Zanzibar, which Germany boasts she can render valueless to us if so inclined. We have yet to know what we have to pay for Zanzibar. But if our bargain has been bad in Africa, what has it been in regard to Heligoland? In return for Heligoland I think the Government might have asked Germany to retire from these disputed portions of the African territory. It seems to me to be a most extraordinary thing in the negotiations for surrendering Heligoland that we should have said that the island was practically useless to us. No doubt it is valuable to Germany, but it was also valuable to us; indeed, in the event of war with Germany the possession of Heligoland would be invaluable to this country. Its possession would have the full worth of a fleet to us, and this was the opinion of one of our greatest Admirals—Admiral Russell. A German paper—the Hamburger Nachrichten—says—

“England has always possessed in the island the means of keeping Germany strategically insecure, of indirectly molesting her, and of dangling before her eyes the great value of her friendship. Think of the rôle which Heligoland played in the wars of 1864 and 1870! Its possession, in short, gives us the command of the North Sea; the commerce of Hamburg will gain by its cession to us, for a blockade of the Elbe will now be an impossibility.”

No doubt if we were to go to war with Germany the cession of Heligoland must add heavily to our responsibilities, because the attempt to blockade Hamburg and the mouth of the Elbe would be exceedingly difficult, dangerous, and expensive. I believe that Germany would have been willing to have given up much more than she has ceded for the possession of Heligoland. Its value to Germany is very great. It gives her an eye to see, and an arm to strike at Holland, Belgium, France, Russia, and Denmark. We do not want anything in Europe that Germany can give us; we are perfectly able to protect our own coasts. Would the friendship of Germany prevent Russia from attacking us in India, or France from harassing us in Egypt? Would it make negotiations with France easier in Newfoundland? It remains to be seen whether this would be the case, but, at all events, if friendship is worth anything it should be reciprocal, and Germany has shown very little reciprocity in this Agreement. She is anxious to take everything; we seem anxious to give everything. It was, I believe, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle, who said the other day that Heligoland was the tomb of Jingoism, and that in it were interred the principles of Lord Beaconsfield's foreign policy. I confess that, although I am not a Jingo, the policy so described had its good points as well as its faults. We must not forget that one of its fruits was peace with honour. Although the policy of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian had its merits, one of its chief results was war with dishonour; and, for my part, I prefer the aggressive principles of Lord Beaconsfield's foreign policy, which shattered Zululand and reduced Afghanistan, to the moderate principles of the foreign policy of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, which dictated the disgraceful Transvaal surrender and the desertion of Gordon.

(10.30.) SIR LEWIS PELL (Hackney, N.): The hon. Member for Mid Lanark is mistaken in saying that the Sultanah of Witu was awarded to us. It was the Port and Island of Lamu that was submitted to arbitration, and declared to belong neither to us or to Germany. Subsequently, the Sultan of Zanzibar handed Lamu to us. It is also a mistake to suppose that “Hinterland” has been given to Germany, but not to us. Our boundary line runs along the first parallel of South latitude, right across to Victoria Nyanza, and into the region South of Uganda, where it turns a little South and embraces the mountain Mfumbiro. It then continues West, until it strikes the frontier of the Free State of the Congo. Our “Hinterland,” therefore, is reserved to us almost equally as well as the Hinterland of the Germans is kept for them. It is in vain to compare the position of political affairs on the East Coast of Africa, with a condition of affairs which obtained at some more or less remote date. I remember the coast of East Africa at a time when the word of a British Representative round the whole shore line of the Indian Ocean was law. Those days are gone. Then no foreign Power interfered with us. Now, other Powers have come in, and we have had to take our place with them. The question is, what was the position immediately before this Agreement was made? The East African Company, finding that Germany had declared a Protectorate over an immense region lying between the Rivers Juba and Juba to the Northward of the British sphere of influence, and thus finding themselves squeezed in, both to the South and North, by Germany, felt it would be impracticable for them to carry out the enterprise they had in hand. But the result of this Agreement is, that while the Germans surrender their Protectorate over that vast region, our influence reaches up to the northernmost tributary of the River Juba—thus increasing our shore line by 200 miles, giving us access to the river itself, and increasing our Hinterland until it strikes the frontier of the Congo Free State beyond Lake Albert Nyanza. I think we have no reason to complain of the provisions of this Agreement. On the contrary, it strikes me as being a measure that has been carried out with great tact, great patience, great skill, and great success. I believe I speak the opinions and feelings of those directly interested in the present political, commercial, geographical, and other interests in this region, when I say they are very much obliged to the Government for the manner in which the arrangement has been effected. We obtain the finest port by far on the coast and nearest to the British Empire in India. I allude, of course, to the Port of Mombassa. We obtain access to two great rivers and one inferior river—namely, the Juba—the Tana, and the Sabaki, and we obtain the nearest line of railway from the coast to Lake Victoria Nyanza. Those of us who are directly interested in the arrangement are quite satisfied with the advantages which the Government have secured for this country.

*(10.35.) MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I do not propose to follow the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down into the question of the advantages that the Agreement will secure for the Royal East Africa Company, because it would be impossible to do so, unless you, Mr. Speaker, were to permit the innovation of the suspension of a gigantic map from the clock to the Bar. I think the satisfaction the hon. Member expresses will be qualified in the mind of the House by the knowledge that he represents the Royal East African Company. The complaint that has been made with regard to the delimitation of Eastern Africa is that the interests of England in other parts of Africa have not been sufficiently kept in view, and that valuable territories in the South, valuable lines of communication in the interior, have been surrendered in exchange for some hundred miles of arid coast. I do not propose to refer to the constitutional question arising out of this Bill for the cession of Heligoland, because that has been sufficiently dealt with earlier in the evening by my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian and my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby, further than to repeat the demand they made—that the Law Officers of the Crown should produce the precedents on which the Government rely for bringing in a Bill to ratify a Treaty for the cession of territory. One thing at least is clear, that although there have been many cessions of British territory in various parts of the world, none of these has yet been thought to need a statute to effect it. I desire, however, to call attention to the fact that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland admitted the very doctrine for which my right hon. Friends contended, namely, that this is a constitutional change of great magnitude, and one that cannot help having its results in the future. The argument of the Chief Secretary goes to show that this will be no longer res integra, but that when the question of any other Treaty arises the Government will have to consider whether it should or should not embody it in a Bill and place it before Parliament. If any Members on this side of the House have not fully apprehended what is the ground on which we consider this a change of profound import, whether for good or for ill is a matter which I do not now inquire, let me remind them again that this is not a question of increasing the powers of the House of Commons in regard to the foreign policy, but of enlarging the powers of Parliament which includes another Chamber. Whatever power the House of Commons may have in future for rejecting a Bill will be, under this precedent, equally enjoyed by the House of Lords. The power given to the House of Commons will be counterbalanced by the veto of the House of Lords. I hope if there is any authority for the course the Government have adopted in bringing in this Bill, the Law Officers of the Crown will not be slow to furnish us with it. As to the merits of this Agreement, I must frankly own that I cannot dissent from the view taken by Her Majesty's Government as to the small strategic value of Heligoland to us, seeing that for the 83 years during which it has been in our possession we have made no attempt whatever to fortify it. It has been said that notwithstanding that fact it would have been of great service to us in the event of our being involved in a war with Germany. I hope, however, it will not go forth from this House that there is any danger, or even a remote possibility, of our being involved in a war with that country, with whom we have for such a long period been on the terms of the greatest friendship. We have not been at war with Germany since the 13th century, and I think we may fairly hope that in no time we can contemplate now will any likelihood of such hostility arise. At the same time, it is only fair to say that by the possession of Heligoland we always held a trump card, which we could play whenever we desired to make a bargain with Germany, as it is well known that that country sets the highest value upon the island. There can be no doubt that in a war between Germany and any neighbouring Power the possession of Heligoland would be of great importance, and I think we may, therefore, say it was the duty of the Government to secure substantial advantages in return for it. I confess, however, that I cannot express myself equally favourable with regard to another point arising upon the Agreement. I think that we are entitled to hear from the Under Secretary some evidence as to the feeling of the people of Heligoland with regard to the cession. We should have evidence laid before us that the Heligolanders, if not in favour of it, are not opposed to it. No such evidence has been given. Not a single word has been said in this House, or in the House of Lords, to show that any steps whatever have been taken to ascertain the wishes of the people of Heligoland.

Mr. Bryce

The case before us is, no doubt, a small one. The population of the island is small, less than that of an average English parish, but as a precedent it is important. This is the first time that this country has established the precedent of handing over British subjects to another Power, as if they were cattle, without even ascertaining their wishes, much less obtaining their consent. I pass from that subject, having made this protest, and desire now to observe that we require a far stronger justification for the cession of the island than any yet offered. Such justification of the cession as has been made is to be found in the settlement of questions affecting Africa, and what we have to ask is, are the advantages which this country is to receive in Africa adequate compensation for the giving up to Germany of a possession which is to her of so much importance in Heligoland? I am anxious in what I say about Africa not to be misunderstood. I do not wish to be thought to give any countenance to the doctrines of African annexation and extension, doctrines which are not held on this side of the House, though they have found expression opposite. We have no more right to Africa than any other European Power. We have no right to any exceptional position of authority there. There was never a time when England, though she has much reason to be proud of the work of her discoverers, has formally founded upon that work any exclusive claim to the possession of the interior of tropical Africa. I am sure that there is no country which can so well spare something to other countries as can England. He would be a rash man who would ask us to undertake, with our existing colonial and foreign responsibilities, the task of reducing to order the gigantic territory of Equatorial Africa. Surely there is the greatest difference between the acquisition of land in temperate climates, into which our own people can overflow, and where their commercial genius can grow and flourish, as in Canada and Australia, and the acquisition of a tropical country, with unhealthy coasts and savage inhabitants, where enormous sums would have to be spent in laying the foundations of trade. Much has been said of trade to come;

but remember that is a distant and doubtful prospect, and between us and that prospect lies vast expenditure and the likelihood of sanguinary conflicts with native races. I should like to invite the attention of the House, also, to this consideration—that all these distant dominions, for which France, Portugal, Belgium, and Germany show an appetite, can only be held by the sea. While England holds command of the sea these possessions are virtually hostages. They are a pledge that if these countries quarrel with England, they place within the hands of England their communications with, and possibly even the ultimate ownership, of these outlying territories. I hope, therefore, that the House will not allow this prospect of enlarged territories in Africa to fascinate the imagination. Let us also remember that this Agreement with Germany gives us no additional direct rights over the soil and the inhabitants. It does not even infringe upon the rights possessed by any other European Power, except Germany. It is a simple Agreement between England and Germany that within certain limits they will not interfere one with the other. Do not let this Agreement be quoted as an Agreement for the sanction of annexation. For my part, I should have preferred an Agreement in the nature of a self-denying ordinance for East Africa, similar to that made for the Congo basin in West Africa. However, let us come to this Agreement, and examine it in the light in which Ministers present it to us as a bargain. So regarded, we shall find it to be a poor bargain. It constitutes no triumph for British diplomacy, and I do not think the Government can go to the country on the strength of it, and ask for a vote of confidence in their foreign policy. I had hoped to hear from the Under Secretary an acknowledgment of the very exceptional forbearance he has received from the Opposition by questions or Motions during the last four years. We have been extremely careful in not interfering with pending negotiations, lest any harm should be done, and the Government have been allowed greater scope than was allowed in the period from 1880 to 1885 to their predecessors. I want to ask whether the Government, having these exceptional advantages, have used them properly. I do not altogether disapprove of the general tone and line Lord Salisbury has taken, and, indeed, we have some reason to congratulate him upon having come over to the pacific views entertained on this side the House. The hon. Member for Whitby said that this is not an Agreement that Conservatives would have approved of in 1885. We agree heartily with him in that declaration. In the fact that it is wholly unlike the former attitude of the Tory Party consists the main virtue of the present Agreement. Let me briefly recall to the House some of the leading incidents in Lord Salisbury's conduct of foreign affairs. He began, in 1887, by withdrawing from Port Hamilton. That surrender was allowed to pass by the Tory Party because it came from their own leaders. It was a very proper act, and we took no exception to it. Next came the question of the New Hebrides, and the Government were obliged to buy out the French, who had no right whatever in the New Hebrides, by surrendering British rights over the Island of Raiatea. Next we had the question with regard to Germany and Samoa. Here the Government left the assertion of our rights, and those of poor King Mafetua, as against Germany to America, and all that has been gained is due to the efforts of the United States. It is not necessary to go over the points of surrender in the present Agreement as regards Africa. The hon. Member for Peckham (Mr. Baumann) has referred to the South West, the hon. Member for Caithness (Dr. Clark) has complained of neglect of the wishes of the people of Cape Colony, and the hon. Member for Whitby (Mr. Beckett) and the hon. Member for Lanarkshire (Mr. Philipps), in his able and vigorous speech, have condemned the whole Agreement from beginning to end. The defence on the points raised by these Members has been very imperfect. A settlement is always obtained by the Government by the simple process of always surrendering to their opponents. In point of fact, the Government have advanced no reason for the surrenders they have made in South Western and Central Africa, except that, when Germany asked it was much easier to submit than to stand out and contest the point. Now, a few words upon Zanzibar. Zanzibar is a great trade emporium, and from it goods are distributed over all the adjoining parts of Africa. What I want to know is whether we are to understand that complete Free Trade is now secured between Zanzibar and the different ports of the mainland which is to become German. Is Germany to be prevented from establishing Custom Houses on the mainland, and from thereby destroying the commercial value of Zanzibar? That is a point on which no information has been given. Why, when this Agreement was being made, were steps not taken to have the whole area secured for Free Trade, carrying out thereby the provisions of that Berlin Act to which Germany was a party? If this has not been done it is a very serious omission and greatly reduces whatever value there is in the Agreement. Nothing has been said to explain why the Government consider Zanzibar of more value now than it was in 1886, when they virtually abandoned our interests there. It has been admitted that in 1886 Zanzibar was virtually under the control of this country. Sir John Kirk was virtually master of Zanzibar by the consent of the Sultan. The Sultan recognised in him a capable and upright adviser, and British ideas and policy were virtually supreme at that time. That was the case in 1886, when the Government of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian quitted Office. Why was that position of advantage thrown away? If Zanzibar is as valuable as we are now told it is, surely our position there was well worth keeping. Why was Sir John Kirk recalled; why was his influence taken away and the place practically left for the Germans to do as they pleased in it. It seems to me we are simply buying back in 1890 a part, not by any means the whole, of what was thrown away in 1886, and that view is confirmed by the language the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs has used. He said that we had not even now assumed in any practical sense the protectorate of Zanzibar; he said that a protectorate has not been taken in any concrete fashion.

Mr. Bryce

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: May I once more say I never used that word?

*MR. BRYCE: I took the right hon. Gentleman's words down at the moment, because they surprised me, and they were "in any concrete fashion." I can only suppose this Protectorate is an abstract Protectorate, and what is meant by that? What is the value of it? However, I do not wish to insist on any phrase which is repudiated, but to inquire what is meant by the language, the Under Secretary has used. Whatever value the Protectorate may have seems to be still further reduced by the fact that it is subject to the consent of France. I should be sorry to say a word which would hamper the Government in the negotiations with France; but when we find that what we have got from Germany has been got subject to the consent of another Power, and we do not yet know what that other Power is going to propose as to the terms of its consent, it is clear we have not got the whole matter before us. We do not yet know what the demands of France are, and we do not know what terms are going to be made with Portugal as regards her claims on the Zambesi, claims very material to the use that can be made of the Nyassa region. Altogether, therefore, the House is asked to sanction that of which we cannot yet say whether it will turn out to be a benefit or not. It would have been more satisfactory if the Government had been more candid. Why did they not tell us, in the first instance, that France had to be consulted? Looking at all these points, if I am asked whether this Agreement is a good bargain, and one that reflects credit on Her Majesty's Government, the answer cannot be in the affirmative. If the Government are going to the country and claiming to counterbalance the defects of their domestic policy by the skill with which they have conducted foreign policy, it is the duty of the Opposition to put on record its opinion that their conduct of foreign policy has not been successful, and that in this matter they have not shown themselves skilful in making a bargain. It is true the Opposition have no intention to vote against this Agreement, not because, though "willing to wound, we are yet afraid to strike." On any fitting occasion I hope we shall always be ready to record our opinion on questions of foreign policy, just as upon questions of domestic policy. It is sometimes the duty of an Opposition to denounce and resist a Ministry which is pursuing a dangerous course abroad, and so we did denounce and resist Lord Beaconsfield and Lord Salisbury from 1876 to 1879. In this instance, however, opposition, though it might injure the Ministry, would not necessarily correct what has been done amiss. We, therefore, do not propose to divide against the present Agreement, because we feel that when an Agreement such as this has been made the position of things has been vitally altered, and that it is not possible to go back to the state of things which existed before the negotiations began. The Agreement may be faulty, and yet the injury to national interests from rejecting it may be greater than those which an acceptance of it could involve. I admit that some arrangement was needful, looking to the jealousies of competition and the danger even of conflict between the pioneers of England and the pioneers of Germany in East Africa, and I think Lord Salisbury was well advised in being anxious to put an end to the difficulties of the situation. I think that we must also feel that the rejection of this Agreement would mean some ill-feeling on the part of Germany. She has come to feel that Heligoland is by this time virtually hers, and to take it back once it has come almost within her grasp would be regarded as an unfriendly act. And we ought to be friendly with Germany, with which we are connected by the ties of blood and of religion, and with which we have had no national hostilities for many centuries. Therefore, without at all desiring that we should have any exclusive alliance with any Power, we must on both sides of the House welcome and approve the desire which Lord Salisbury has shown to live at peace with Germany, even though we may think that he has given far more to her than she had any title to claim. From what has passed this evening we have seen that there is a good deal of discontent among the Conservative Party as to this Agreement, and the Liberal Party might, had they given vigorous opposition to it, have reduced the Government majority to a point which would seriously injure their authority in the country. I hope, however, that hon. Members opposite will give us credit for never having had any such intention. We have felt that there are far higher interests and duties in matters of foreign policy than those connected with Party, and that there in this case are interests involved which may determine the future of colonisation in Africa for centuries to come, and we feel that the rejection of this Agreement might lead not only to ill-feeling on the part of Germany, but to a general scramble amongst other European Powers for territory in Africa. Therefore, although mere Party motives might have prompted a different course, and although we may feel that the conduct of the Government has not been marked by as much skill or judgment as we could have wished, nevertheless, in the interests of the country at large, we feel bound to allow the Agreement to be ratified.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM
(Lanark, N.W.): Why?

*MR. BRYCE: Because far greater evils might follow from its rejection than are likely to follow from its acceptance. One evil might be the growth of a bitter and angry spirit with Germany.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM:
How about France?

*MR. BRYCE: I do not see that our position is made worse with regard to France by this Agreement. We desire to be friendly with France also; and there is nothing in the substance of the Agreement arrived at, though the manner of introducing it might have been more courteous. Its rejection might aggravate the condition of the inhabitants and retard the measures being now taken for the extinction of the Slave Trade. Therefore, whilst retaining the opinion I have stated as to the character of the Agreement, I must feel that, upon the balance of loss and gain, the advantage of accepting it is greater than anything to be gained by moving its rejection.

*(11.16.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): I do not wish to detain the House at any length, as we are all anxious that a Division should be taken to-night, but I should be wanting in courtesy to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, and also the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, and others who have made appeals to me, if I did not make some reply to their challenges. It is a little difficult quite to understand for what section of the House the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down spoke, because if we contrast his observations with the tone of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, it is difficult to conceive that the two speakers were in accord. In his most interesting speech the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian began by stating that he must congratulate Lord Salisbury not only upon the spirit in which he had entered into the Agreement, but also on the terms of it, and he devoted the greater part of his speech to the constitutional question, without making any severe criticisms on the terms of the Agreement itself.

*MR. BRYCE: My recollection of the right hon. Gentleman's speech is quite different. The right hon. Gentleman referred to the ungrudging spirit in which Lord Salisbury had entered into the Agreement, but I did not understand him to express approval of the Agreement in its details.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: I will not enter into a controversy with the hon. Gentleman, but I listened to every word the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian spoke, and I certainly failed to hear any real criticism or expression disapproving of any of the terms of the Agreement, though, perhaps, that was intended to be part of the unspoken criticism. All I wish to convey to the House is the impression which reached my mind. I now propose to deal with the constitutional question. We were told by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, among others, that there never has been any difference of opinion on this question, and that no person whose opinion is worth quoting has ever expressed any sanction of the policy pursued by Her Majesty's Government in advising Her Majesty to insert in the Treaty that the cession of Heligoland should be subject to the assent of the British Parliament. Some caustic observations were made on the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, who complained that the Chancellor of the Exchequer did not produce precedent after precedent to the House. I confess I thought that that argument came with little grace from a speaker who must admit that not the slightest notice was given to any Member of Her Majesty's Government that this point was to be raised. Of course, it is the duty of the Opposition so to conduct opposition as to embarrass the Government; but I must point out that it is somewhat ungenerous to the Chancellor of the Exchequer to twit him with not being prepared with chapter and verse on the spur of the moment, especially when in the most interesting Debate in the House of Lords there was no allusion, direct or indirect, to this point, although such high authorities as Lord Rosebery, Earl Granville, and others, took part in that Debate. What has been the excuse for this? I think that the Colleagues of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby in the House of Lords will be somewhat surprised to hear it. The right hon. Gentleman said, "Of course they did not raise the point, because it did not suit the House of Lords," suggesting that they were willing to extend their own power even at the risk of sacrificing the privileges of the Crown. I venture to think that Lord Herschell, Lord Rosebery, Lord Granville, and Lord Kimberley, hardly deserve such treatment at the hands of the right hon. Gentleman. Before this point was put with such great confidence it would have been well if the right hon. Gentleman had extended his researches to a little later period than that of Lord Thurlow and Lord Loughborough. The hon. and learned Member for Stockton (Sir H. Davey) and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby fell foul of my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary because he did not produce and read the opinions to which he referred. Well, no one knows better than they that while my right hon. Friend was right in pointing out that it is not correct to say that no one of any position expressed any doubt on this matter, yet my right hon. Friend would have been wrong to produce opinions which would have disclosed negotiations on other matters perfectly well known to Her Majesty's advisers at that time. But I can give the right hon. Gentleman the weighty opinion he desires. In 1870 there arose an important question respecting the cession of the Gambia to the Emperor of the French. Questions were asked in the House as to whether negotiations with a view to the transfer had taken place, and whether it could take place without the consent of Parliament. I may remark at this point that the European population of the Gambia at that time was 39 males and 18 females. In answer to questions by Mr. R. Fowler—now Sir R. Fowler—and Sir John Hay, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian said—

"That his impression was that such an arrangement could not be carried out without the consent of Parliament. He could not answer positively, but such was his impression and belief."

A little later the right hon. Gentleman added to what he had already said with reference to the power of the Government—

"That there had never been the slightest intention of taking any proceedings of the kind without the consent of Parliament."

If modern history is searched, it will be found that proposals were made for the cession of the Gambia to France, though they were not carried out.

SIR W. HARCOURT: But not by Bill.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: The proposal was one to obtain the sanction of Parliament by Bill. This is not the first time that the question has been raised. There was a Debate in 1854 on a proposal to cede the Orange River Free Territory, and a Motion was actually moved that an Address be presented to Her Majesty praying her to re-consider the proposal for the abandonment of her sovereignty over the Orange River. The opinions of Sir Roundell Palmer and Mr. Wills were read to the House, stating that the territory having been fully recognised as a colony, the Crown could not, by virtue of its prerogative, constitute any branch of its subjects into an independent State, and could not, without the consent of Parliament, cede its sovereignty over that territory, and much less over any of its subjects. I strongly protest against the assumption of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby that nobody whose opinion is worth anything has ever expressed the views which have, on this occasion, actuated Her Majesty's Government. In the Debate of 1854 speeches were delivered by the late Lord Chief Justice Cockburn and Sir Frederick Thesiger, which proves that most weighty opinions were expressed on both sides. It is clear that Sir Roundell Palmer looked on the matter as one which required to be carefully considered, for he spoke as follows:—

"When British subjects have settled in newly discovered territories they carry with them the laws of this country. In that case cession cannot take place without the consent of Parliament. In the case of conquered or ceded countries, if Parliament had legislated concerning them, then the concurrence of Parliament might be necessary."

The consent of Parliament which is there implied is not a consent to approve the transaction or turn out the Ministry of the day; but a consent to make the cession operative. I contend that there is no change whatever in the Constitution involved by the procedure of the Government. It is a question of its being in the power of the Crown to act in one way or the other, there being undoubtedly more than one method open. It has been assumed that there has been no legislation for Heligoland. But there have been Orders in Council founded upon general Statutes, and I can well understand that if it had suited the purpose of the right hon. Gentlemen opposite, and we had proposed to proceed by Royal prerogative, they would have found way the strong argument against more to be taken without the assent of Parliament. There is no change in the actual responsibility involved in this mode; the new system was a question of its value as we value a good the Crown to act with Germany, and little there being any embark in landgrabbing method open. I do not think that Her of the Crown to cede territory without the consent of Parliament, when the nature of the negotiations or of the interests involved render it desirable to proceed in that way, but the fact that the prerogative of the Crown has sometimes been exercised in that way does not preclude the Crown from proceeding in the other way when it appears expedient. The right hon. Gentleman (Sir W. Harcourt) cannot shake the argument away by shaking his head. I challenge the right hon. Gentleman to show by instances that when the Crown elected to act in one of two ways the other mode of action ceased to be within the prerogative. If in the case of financial and commercial Treaties it is not un-constitutional to ask the consent of the House it cannot be suggested that it is wrong in a case of this kind. Nobody can say it is un-constitutional to ask the consent of Parliament in a case where there may be other considerations which may come into play and lead Her Majesty's Government to hold their hand. Her Majesty's Government are prepared to advise Her Majesty to assent to the Treaty, believing that its terms are for the interests of the nation, but which they are ready to subject to the criticism and judgment of the House of Commons. It has been argued by Members on either side of the House that the conduct of the Government in allowing Germany to extend her Protectorate over Damaraland and Namaqualand is such as cannot be approved, and the hon. Member for Aberdeen has said no reason for their action has been given by Her Majesty's Government. But it is conceded that in 1884, by the action of the then advisers of Her Majesty, which we may regret, but cannot do more, Germany was allowed to assume the Protectorate over Damaraland and Namaqualand. That being the case do hon. Members suggest that the Government ought to contest the matter hostilely with Germany?

my hon. friend to think that if that had been the course which the negotiations had I venture the Dep. they would not have been carried out by the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian. It is necessary to consider the existing state of things on the basis of this, with the action things, and in accordance with the action of the Government of 1884.

Sir R. Webster

matters of foreign policy there must be continuity.

*MR. BRYCE: I said no reason had been given for the extension as far as Victoria Falls and the Zambesi.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: It is based upon the arrangement made in 1884. With respect to Uganda it has been said that the Government have not acted with wisdom, because the Protectorate of Great Britain was recognised there long before the advent of the Germans in that part of Africa. My information does not lead me to that conclusion, but to the conclusion that grave questions certainly exist as to the extent of the recognition accorded to the British Protectorate, and as to the limits within which German influence prevails. What is the alternative policy that is proposed? Is there to be a steeplechase, or rather go-as-you-please contest in Africa? Is each nation to struggle to get what it can, the interests of the natives suffering in consequence? For my part, I believe that it is far wiser to negotiate in a conciliatory and friendly spirit with the Powers likely to colonise, and to fix our limits of influence once for all in order to avoid contentions and disputes in future. The House has heard criticisms of the arrangements made by the Government from Gentlemen on both sides of the House, some of whom are, perhaps, not quite impartial, being connected possibly with companies which have been disappointed, or companies which have been gratified. I confess it is a satisfaction to me to notice that in the speeches of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby there was very little tangible argument against the Agreement. They rode off, in fact, on the so-called great constitutional question, and I hope I have shown to the House that that point does not deserve the importance assigned to it. When this matter comes to be canvassed I think the House and the country will be of opinion that Her Majesty's Government have reason to be proud of the arrangement they have made. The hon. Member for Aberdeen said the reason why success has attended the Government in foreign matters is not because the policy of Lord Salisbury is altogether approved of, but because the Opposition have been so indulgent as to foreign matters.

*MR. BRYCE: I did not make any such large claim. I said that the Government of Lord Salisbury had had an advantage in their foreign policy which previous Liberal Governments did not enjoy: they had not been constantly questioned and worried.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: I think, however, that if Her Majesty's Government had been discredited there are gentlemen on the opposite side of the House who would not have failed to avail themselves of the opportunity. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian has over and over again said that he has no fault to find with the foreign policy of Her Majesty's Government, therefore I think it has not come with very good grace from the hon. Gentleman the Member for Aberdeen to attribute the success of Her Majesty's Government in foreign matters to want of interference on the part of the Opposition. I hope I have now sufficiently dealt with the points raised. I submit to the House that this is an instance of an Agreement conducted and carried through in no selfish spirit, with no desire to grab or get for Great Britain anything to which she is not entitled—an Agreement which, I believe, will be to the future advantage of both countries, and which Her Majesty's Government do not desire to carry through simply by virtue of the prerogative, but which they are by no means ashamed to submit to the judgment of the House and the country.

*(11.45.) MR. MUNRO FERGUSON (Leith, &c.): The hon. and learned Gentleman takes shelter from many disagreeable arguments behind the approval of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian. Our contention and our complaint is that there has been no quid pro quo for the cession of Heligoland. We also complain that it was only by process of time that we were able to discover what the Agreement with regard to Damaland was, the two maps published presenting a very different appearance. Lord Salisbury said Heligoland was to be taken as equivalent for Zanzibar. All Great Britain seems to get is a Protectorate over Zanzibar and Pemba, a territory under the rule of a native chief, which will make our responsibilities there of a very difficult character, while the Germans receive in freehold a coast line of 600 miles. It was some time before we discovered what the Sultanate of Zanzibar means. Lord Kimberley, when he asked a question in another place, was informed that a Sultanate bore the same relation to a Sultan as a monarchy to a monarch, but subsequently we come to the information that the Sultanate was restricted to the two islands, and did not include the 600 miles of coast line. Was not this sufficient concession without throwing Heligoland into the pot? Heligoland should not have been ceded except as an equivalent for Damaland. Not even yet have we had an answer to the question whether the Germans can restrict our trade by the establishment of Custom-houses on German territory. For the last 100 years we have traded supreme in districts now held to be within the German sphere of influence on a continent where, seven years ago, Germany did not possess a square foot of territory. The Under Secretary has referred to the state of matters at Zanzibar, when that great man, Sir John Kirk, was there, and we have never been told why he was recalled or why the system, which was much more to the interests of this country. A virtual Protectorate without the actual responsibility entailed by this new system was abandoned. Much as we value a good understanding with Germany, and little as we desire to embark in landgrabbing in Africa, I do not think that Her Majesty's Government will have much cause for congratulation over this Agreement.

(11.51.) Mr. W. H. SMITH rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

*MR. SPEAKER: The Debate has opened a grave and important constitutional question, the discussion of which occupied the earlier portion of the Debate. The second part of the subject can scarcely be said to have been adequately discussed. I hope the House will allow the Debate to proceed.

Debate adjourned till to-morrow.

(11.53.) PUBLIC WORKS LOAN BILL.

(No. 389.)

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

(11.55.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I have pointed out that among the 16 Gentleman named there is no Irish Representative, and I gather from the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that he is not unwilling to amend a flagrant omission, and, therefore, I move the first of two names of which I have given notice, that of Mr. Thomas Redington. He is a gentleman well-known, Deputy Lieutenant of the County of Galway, a member of the Royal Commission on Piers and Harbours, and in every way fully qualified.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 27, after the word "esquire," to insert the words "Christopher Thomas Redington, esquire."

Question proposed, "That the words 'Christopher Thomas Redington, esquire,' be there inserted."

(11.57.) THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): It is impossible for me now to accept a name at such short notice. There has been no time for me to consider the point or to communicate with other gentlemen whose names have been suggested. It would be necessary also to communicate with the gentleman nominated.

MR. SEXTON: The right hon. Gentleman has given no intelligible reason for refusing the Amendment. As soon as the Bill was printed, and I had the opportunity of examining it, I gave notice of my Amendment. The right hon. Gentleman has not said a word, nor I suppose does he find himself able to say a word, against the gentleman I have named. His qualifications must be, I think, known to the Chief Secretary. I shall feel it my duty to press both names to a Division.

MR. GOSCHEN: I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman thinks it necessary to press the point. I have no information from the gentleman himself as to his willingness to serve. I have no doubt he is well qualified, but I would ask the hon. Member not to press the matter now. I do not know how far it is desirable that names should be added, but I cannot accept the Motion now, and the hon. Member, if he insists, may prejudice his own case and create a false impression.

MR. STOREY (Sunderland): I think, Sir—

It being Midnight, the Chairman left the Chair to make his Report to the House.

Committee report Progress; to sit again up on Monday next.

SUPPLY—REPORT.

Resolution [17th July] reported. (See page 103.)

(12.1.) MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): On this Resolution I do not intend to make any lengthened remarks, but I wish to ask the Chief Secretary whether an opportunity will be afforded me on one of these Votes to make certain remarks which I think I have a right to make with regard to certain affairs in Ireland?

(12.2.) THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I do not understand that the hon. Member has any special observations to make on this Vote. I think he desires to speak on the Prisons Vote.

MR. CONYBEARE: I think I should have a right to speak on the Resident Magistrates Vote, but I will forego that right on the assurance that I shall have an opportunity of speaking on the Prisons Vote.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Certainly, but we do not pledge ourselves to stop business at an earlier hour than usual for the purpose.

(12.3.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I wish to draw attention to a charge delivered in Ireland by the Lord Chief Baron, for it has an important bearing on the salaries of the Resident Magistrates in connection with this Vote. His Lordship declared that any one in Ireland had a perfect right to refuse to deal with any other person, or any combination of persons had a right to refuse to do so, provided the combination was voluntary, and not for a malicious purpose. During the last three years the Resident Magistrates in Ireland have repeatedly sent persons to gaol for acts of the very kind which the Lord Chief Baron now declares to be legal. I would therefore ask the Chief Secretary to take steps to inform the Resident Magistrates that many of the sentences they have passed in the time stated have been illegal, and also that they have no right to send any one to prison who, individually or in combination, refuses to deal with any other person or persons, unless it is shown that the combination is obtained by duress or is for malicious purposes.

(12.6.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The charge of the Lord Chief Baron to which the hon. Member has referred will be brought under the notice of the Resident Magistrates of Ireland. But I must not be understood to endorse the inference drawn by the hon. Member from the remarks of the Chief Baron.

(12.7.) DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid.): I wish to ask the Chief Secretary if he will take notice of the grave and scandalous charges against Mr. Gardiner, who holds a judicial position in the City of Cork? One of those charges is a charge of seduction of the worst possible kind, and I want the right hon. Gentleman to consider whether or not Mr. Gardiner is worthy to continue to exercise the functions of a Resident Magistrate in the city from which I have the honor to come.

Resolution agreed to.

SUPPLY—REPORT.

Resolutions [18th July] reported.

First Resolution (see page 229) postponed.

Second Resolution (see page 275):—

(12.9.) MR. W. P. SINCLAIR (Falkirk, &c.): I wish to draw the attention of the House to one matter in connection with this Vote. The question of national education in Ireland did not receive any attention whatever from the House during the fortnight the Irish Estimates were discussed. The particular point to which I wish to draw attention is that there has been a complete change in the curriculum of the education of girls; a new departure has been taken, and I think that change ought not to be passed over without notice by Parliament. According to the new departure, when girls have passed the Fifth Standard they are to be deprived of all further intellectual training, and to devote the remainder of their school life to "industrial work," which means needlework. Up to the present the adoption of this rule has only been optional, but now it is proposed to make it obligatory. I think the change should not be enforced, because I believe it will have a very injurious effect on the future of those girls, and will tend to swell the already overcrowded ranks of sempstresses. I hope the House will express in some way its desire that the training of the womanhood of Ireland shall continue on the same lines as in the past, and that consequently this new departure will not be sanctioned.

(12.19.) COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I only wish to say that I disagree with everything that has fallen from the hon. Member on this subject. I know a parish where the girls, thanks to instruction in needlework, have been able to contribute materially to the support of their homes. I hope the Chief Secretary will do something for boys also, by giving them some teaching in agriculture.

(12.20.) MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.): I also differ from the hon. Member. Nothing better could be done for Ireland than to give young girls a training which will fit them to be good house-keepers and wives.

(12.21.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I believe that the National School Commissioners never reject any representation made by a school manager to relax the rule in favour of his particular school. There is therefore a large elasticity in the working of the rule that will prevent any evil results arising from it. If a manager thinks that the education in his school is prejudicially affected by these regulations, he has only to make a representation to the Board of National Education, and his application will be considered. The rule has worked well in the past, and I hope it will continue to do so in the future.

Resolution agreed to.

Subsequent Resolutions (see page 275) agreed to.

Postponed Resolution to be considered to-morrow.

POSTAGE RATES BILL.—(No. 302.)

Order for Second Reading read, and discharged.

Bill withdrawn.

LIFE AND PROPERTY PROTECTION BILL.—(No. 277.)

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir E. CLARKE, Plymouth): In assenting to the Second Reading of this Bill I have simply to state that the Government cannot give its assent to all the provisions it contains.

MR. CONYBEARE: I should like to ask whether the Government propose to give their sanction and approval to the extraordinary doctrines enunciated in this Bill. If so, I think that that is a proceeding which does not redound to the credit of the Government, and that we ought to take exception to it.

MR. SPEAKER: If the hon. Gentleman objects to the Bill it cannot be further proceeded with at the present moment.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday next.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

On the Motion for Adjournment:—

SIR J. SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield): May I be allowed to ask when the Post Office Estimates will be brought on again? Hon. Members are kept here awaiting their discussion, and it would promote their convenience if the Government would fix some definite time for the further discussion of these Estimates.

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): This is a matter in which the Government propose and the House disposes. I think, however, the Post Office Estimates will be taken immediately on the conclusion of the discussion of the Heligoland Bill.

SIR W. LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth): I should like to have some statement from the Government as to when the Local Taxation Bill will be taken. Is there any intention of bringing it on to-morrow; and, if not, when will it come on?

MR. JACKSON: It will not be taken to-morrow.

House adjourned at twenty-five minutes before One o'clock.

MERCHANT SHIPPING — SUNDAY LABOUR AT HONG KONG AND SINGAPORE.

QUESTION — OBSERVATIONS.

*THE EARL OF MEATH, in rising to ask Her Majesty's Government whether their attention has been called to the following remarks made by Admiral His Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh, at the annual meeting of "Missions to Seamen" Society, held at the Mansion House, on 28th April:—

"The Report also complains that in some ports abroad, and in Crown Colonies, especially Hong Kong and Singapore, the crews are compelled to do unnecessary work in transhipping cargoes on Sundays, which causes much discontent and discomfort to the men, and puts a stop to all religious observances, whereas in the Australian and self-governing Colonies such unnecessary working of cargoes is rigidly forbidden.

"I understand that the Secretary of State for the Colonies has called the attention of some Colonial Governors to this grievance of seamen."

And whether the practice complained of has been prohibited, so that seamen may enjoy their Sunday rest in port in common with other of Her Majesty's subjects, said: My Lords, I hold in my hand a paper which contains the names of certain steamers, together with the names of the owners, which were wharfed at a single wharf at Hong Kong on the Sundays between March the 17th, 1889, and March the 25th, 1890, and all those steamers, I am informed, worked cargo without exception on those Sundays. The firms to which the vessels belonged were Macgregor, Gaw, and Co., of the Glen Line, who worked 13 ships on 13 Sundays; D. Jenkins and Co., eight ships on eight Sundays; The Peninsular and Oriental Steamship Company, 13 ships on 13 Sundays; The China Mutual Shippers' Steam Navigation Company, five ships on five Sundays; The Union Line, Sandilands, four ships on four Sundays; Gellatley, Sewell, and Co., four ships on four Sundays; the British India Steam Navigation Company, six ships on six Sundays: the Ben Line, four ships on four Sundays; miscellaneous, five ships on five Sundays; making a total altogether of 62 ships on which cargo was worked at one wharf in the Crown colony of Hong Kong during that period. Of course, there were other wharves occupied, and, no doubt, a similar number of vessels were engaged there in transshipping to those which I have mentioned as being employed at this particular wharf. I understand that the same thing is going on in other Crown colonies. I am informed that there are 120,000 seamen in the year who pass through the port of Hong Kong; consequently, it would appear as if a large proportion of those 120,000 seamen were not permitted to have the Sunday's rest which most working men in this country claim a right to. Now, I am not going to argue this question upon moral and religious grounds, although a great deal might be said upon those grounds, but I am going to argue this question upon the right of every working man to have one day in seven of rest, the right which he has asserted in this country for a long time, and which is almost universally accorded to him. I cannot see why, because a man is a seaman, and because he goes to a foreign port, or a port in one of our Crown colonies, that he should be deprived of the rest which he would have if he went to Australia. For instance, in Australia Sunday labour is forbidden, and why is it forbidden? It is because there the working men themselves have a vote, and they accordingly make their influence felt. But in a Crown colony that is not the case. The Governor, of course, if he desires to obtain support from anybody, goes naturally to the Chamber of Commerce; but the Chamber of Commerce is composed of employers, and employers are not so anxious as they ought to be in many cases that workmen should have a day's rest. I hold that Her Majesty's Government cannot say that they are not responsible for this state of things. If this were a self-governing colony, they might say that in a self-governing colony, of course, the vote of the working people—of the mass of the population—has to be considered; but there is no working population in this Crown colony which has a vote; and, therefore, I hold it is the duty of Her Majesty's Government to see that no injustice is put upon the working classes in these colonies, which are under their care. I am not one of those Sabbatarians who think that under no circumstances should work be performed upon a Sunday; but I do say this, that there should be shown some great necessity before work is carried out on a Sunday, and I cannot understand why this should be done by these steamship companies, some of whom send their vessels to Australia, because when their vessels get to Australia they manage to carry on their work during the working days of the week, and yet when they go to a Crown colony like Hong Kong they profess to be unable to do that, and allege that they are obliged to work their men on Sundays. The actual state of the case is this: that in the Treaty Ports of China work is forbidden on Sundays, but in our own ports it is permitted. Now, I consider that is a scandal; and the result is that if a shipowner desires to give his seamen rest upon a Sunday at Hong Kong he finds himself at a great disadvantage. But there are some shipowners who are courageous enough to do it. Mr. Laing, of Sunderland, a steam ship owner, when one of his vessels was at Hong Kong last refused to allow his men to work on Sunday, and he thus put himself to great disadvantage. I do not think it is fair that those shipowners who do their duty towards their men should be put at a disadvantage because other shipowners work their men upon every day in the week. My Lords, I do not intend to ask now for Papers, but unless some satisfactory reply is given me, I intend next Session to move again in this matter, and to ask for a Return of Papers, giving the names of the companies and employers who work their men on Sundays, the names of the ships, and the number of Sundays upon which the men are employed in Sunday labour.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Lord Knutsford): My Lords, my attention has been called to the remarks of his Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh to which the noble Earl has referred, but the question was brought under my notice last year when I received a letter from the Rev. Mr. Bowyer, who has taken great interest in this subject, and I at once communicated the contents of that letter to the Governors of Hong Kong and the Straits Settlements at Singapore, and asked them to report upon the matter. The Governor of Hong Kong expressed his desire to see Sunday labour diminished at the docks and wharves of that port, but, after full inquiry into the subject and consideration of the difficulties of compulsory legislation, he came to the conclusion that such compulsory legislation on the Sunday labour question was not desirable, and, although I am not prepared to assent to all the Governor's reasons which he advanced in support of that decision, I regret to say that I am obliged to concur in the decision myself. The same decision was arrived at by the Governor of the Straits Settlements, who expressed himself very warmly in sympathy with the desire of those who wished to see Sunday labour diminished. He has himself taken steps towards diminishing Sunday labour, because in all Government contracts a provision is now inserted that work under those contracts shall not be carried on on Sunday, except in very urgent cases and under special authority. But after communicating with the Chambers of Commerce, the leading merchants, and the unofficial members of the Council, who represent the communities in these Crown colonies, the Governor of the Straits Settlements came to the same conclusion as that arrived at by the Governor of Hong Kong, that compulsory legislation was not desirable. The answers that were received by him from the Chambers of Commerce and the leading merchants were certainly not of an encouraging nature. I took the opportunity of consulting both these Governors when they were in England on leave, in order to ascertain whether any compromise could be effected, whether there was any kind of legislation which could be introduced which would diminish this Sunday labour, but I regret to say that I found no compromise was possible. I am distinctly opposed to compulsory legislation on this point, that is to say, forcing against the views of the unofficial members legislation by an official vote. The case of Australia, which has been referred to, is very different. In the first place, as in other colonies where there is a Custom-house, Sunday labour can be prevented indirectly by closing the Custom-house, but in Hong Kong and Singapore Custom-houses do not exist. I am not aware—though I may be wrong in this—that in Australia any Act prohibiting Sunday labour is in force. The working men themselves have declined to work on Sunday, and have thereby indirectly secured for themselves freedom from work on that day, but I am not aware that there is any compulsory or direct legislation on the point. The Colonial Governors will do all they can to discourage Sunday labour, but I do not think anything can be done in this particular branch of labour unless it can be obtained by the voluntary unanimity upon the subject of the members of the Chambers of Commerce and the leading merchants in the colonies, and also of the leading merchants here who have partners or agents in the colonies. In that way pressure may be put upon the Local Legislatures, and ultimately some measure may be introduced which will put an end to Sunday labour at the docks and wharves in these colonies. But at present I am bound to say I do not think there is that feeling in the colonies which would justify compulsory legislation.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY: My Lords, I think we are greatly obliged to the noble Earl for calling attention to this matter, which I think your Lordships will agree is one of no slight importance. I think we all agree that in cases of emergency we should not stand in the way of Sunday labour, but this is a matter which we are told affects 120,000 seamen at Hong Kong, and a very large number also at Singapore. I must confess I do not think the answer of the noble Lord is quite conclusive as to why a thing should be impossible in Hong Kong which is possible in Australia. As a matter of fact, work in connection with shipping is carried on upon Sundays in the Crown colonies alone. I cannot help thinking that we require more information upon this subject in order to get at the actual facts, and I would suggest to the noble Earl whether during the next few months he could not address questions to the Governors of all the colonies inquiring of them what are the regulations and practice upon this matter in those colonies. We shall then be better able to talk about this matter. It cannot be left in its present position. The feeling of seamen is rising very strongly upon this question of Sunday labour, and the question will have to be pursued further, but before anything more is said, I think it is very desirable that we should get accurate information from each of the colonies, and I have no doubt that the noble Earl will see no objection to sending out Circulars for the purpose I have mentioned, so that we may be in possession of the actual facts in regard to both Crown and self-governing colonies.

LORD KNUTSFORD: I need only add that it will afford me very great pleasure to adopt the suggestion of the noble Earl, and that I will direct a Circular to be sent out as he suggests.

COMPANIES (WINDING-UP) BILL.

(No. 217.)

House in Committee (on re-commitment) (according to order).

Clause 1.

*THE SECRETARY TO THE BOARD OF TRADE (LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH): The Amendment in the 2nd subsection of Clause 1 is one which it was indicated to the Standing Committee would be necessary. The Amendment has now been agreed upon, and the words proposed to be inserted in my name are the words which have been agreed. They are words which bring the phraseology of this Bill into harmony with the County Palatine of Lancaster Act which was passed during this Session.

Amendment moved, in page 1, line 13, to leave out the words "unless the registered office of the," and insert the words, "or in the case of a."—(The Lord Balfour of Burleigh.)

Agreed to.

Clause 3.

*LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH: The Amendment here is also one which was indicated as being desirable in the Standing Committee, and is really for the purpose of improving the phraseology. It is suggested that this will remove objections which were then taken to the large powers of transfer from one Court to another, which might be exercised by an individual Court. I call the attention of the noble and learned Lord The Earl of Harrowby opposite to the phraseology of this Amendment, and I hope it will meet all the objections which were taken in Standing Committee. I move, in the first place, in this Clause, at page 2, line 33, leave out ("any proceedings in") and after ("company") insert ("or any proceedings therein"); also leave out from ("by any Judge") in line 35, to ("conditions") in line 38, both inclusive; lines 38 and 39, leave out ("by the like authority.")

Amendments agreed to.

Another Amendment moved, after line 41, to insert—

"The powers of transfer given by the foregoing provisions of this section may subject to, and in accordance with, general rules, be exercised in accordance by the Lord Chancellor or by any Judge of the High Court having jurisdiction under this Act, or as regards any case within the jurisdiction of any other Court by the Judge of that Court."—(The Lord Balfour of Burleigh.)

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: Before the noble Lord puts that, I would call his attention to the fact that he has hardly carried out what I have no doubt he intended. The effect of that is that if a County Court Judge does not like to carry on a proceeding he may order it to be transferred to the next County Court. I am quite sure the noble Lord does not mean that.

*LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH: It is to be "in accordance with general rules." It is subject to that. The intention is to bring them all within the rules.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: But it does not do so. It is not only—

"By the Lord Chancellor, or any Judge having jurisdiction under this Act;" but

"As regards any case within the jurisdiction of any other Court, by the Judge of that Court."

That may be the County Court. I only call attention to it that at the next stage of the Bill we may frame words that will do.

*LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH: Then I will withdraw that Amendment at the present time.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Clause 7.

*LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH: The Amendment on this clause is at page 4, line 37, after "company" to leave out "by the Court." This is the first of a series of Amendments to leave out the words in various clauses, "by the Court" and "by the order of the Court." These Amendments are rendered necessary if the decision which was come to in the Standing Committee be adhered to, to strike out Sub-section 2 of what was then Section 29. The Amendment of the noble and learned Lord opposite raises a question whether that sub-section should not be put in in a different form. In fact, it proposes to put it in in a form in which it was introduced into the other House of Parliament. If the House accept that Amendment then all the series of Amendments standing in my name to leave out the words "by the Court" and "by the order of the Court," in the various clauses of the Bill, will become unnecessary. But the position of matters, as noble Lords who were on the Committee are aware, is that in the House of Commons it was altered very materially by inserting a negative which governed the whole sub-section. Those words "by the Court" and "by the order of the Court" were devised to cover both the case of companies which are wound up under the supervision of the Court and those definitely wound up by order of the Court. The Bill, as brought into the other House of Parliament, proposed to make the procedure subject to those provisions, both in cases under the actual order of the Court and under supervision. The effect of the decision of the Standing Committee the other day was to leave it doubtful whether companies which were being wound up only under the supervision of the Court were intended to be included in certain provisions of this Bill. The Amendment of the noble and learned Lord opposite would put that beyond all doubt, and would include for this purpose companies being wound up under the supervision of the Court as well as those being wound up directly by order of the Court. If his Amendment is not accepted then there would be an ambiguity by leaving in, in other clauses of the Bill, those words. Under these circumstances, I think it would be desirable that my noble and learned Friend should state the reasons which had induced him to put down the Amendment which stands in his name, and then, from the feeling of the House, we shall be able to judge whether it is advisable or not that I should press these Amendments.

Amendment moved, in page 4, line 37, after the word "company," to leave out the words "by the Court."—(The Lord Balfour of Burleigh.)

*THE EARL OF SELBORNE: I am ready to take that course; and I will state my reasons very briefly for moving the Amendment of which I have given notice. But before doing so, I may, perhaps, mention that if the House should look favourably upon the Amendment, I should be quite disposed to make a little alteration in the phraseology of it. Perhaps it may be thought the words here are a little too wide, because I find in the Act some provisions which are not applicable where there are liquidators of a Company; and if it should come to my moving the Amendment, therefore, I would propose to move it in this form—

"For the purpose of such provisions of this Act as are applicable to a Company of which liquidators have been duly appointed and subject to general rules."

My reason for moving the Amendment is this: I think there are valuable provisions in this Bill which would be as applicable when the Company is being wound up under the supervision of the Court as to any other case. Perhaps I ought to explain to those who may not know exactly what is meant by the company being wound up under the supervision of the Court. There are three modes in which a company may be wound up. One is a purely voluntary liquidation which, upon proper application to the Court, may be superseded or controlled by the Court, but while it is going on the Court does not interfere at all. The other ordinary form is to wind up compulsorily, in which case the Court regulates the whole operation. But between those two comes the particular case which this Amendment is intended to meet. An application may be made to the Court that a liquidation which is voluntary may be changed into one under the authority of the Court. If the Court thinks fit upon that application, it may make an order in either of two forms, either to take over the matter itself (a case with which we are not at present concerned), or that the voluntary winding-up shall continue under the supervision of the Court. Now, it is necessary to understand the effect of that as defined by the 151st section of the Companies' Act of 1862. That section is to this effect: That the liquidator of such a company, when that order is made, may subject to any restrictions which may be imposed by the Court exercise the same powers as if it were altogether voluntary. But the section goes on thus—

"But save, as aforesaid, the order shall for all purposes be deemed to be an order of the Court for winding up the company by the Court and shall confer full authority on the Court to exercise all power which it might have exercised if an order had been made for winding up the company altogether by the Court."

In substance, therefore, the Court has full control over that class of cases, but except as far as the Court may think fit to intervene, they may be conducted in the same manner as if they were voluntary. Now, bearing in mind that scheme of the Act of 1862, I cannot help thinking that the clauses of this Bill which are applicable to that state of things may with great advantage be applied to it. To give reasons at length is not necessary, but I will only mention shortly three clauses which I think the House will at once perceive may be quite as usefully applied in these cases of supervision as in cases of winding up under the Act. The 8th clause of this Bill requires as soon as may be a Report to be made to the Court of the Capital, assets and liabilities of the company being wound up, and if it has failed, the cause of its failure; and it contains consequential provisions as to proceedings which may be taken against promoters, directors, or others, if it appears to the Court that there has been misconduct. Then to take another clause of this Bill, the 11th clause, that requires that subject to certain authority balances in the hands of liquidators shall be paid into the Bank of England. I cannot help thinking that such a provision is equally applicable to companies under supervision. Then to take one more; the 15th Clause requires that when the winding-up has not been completed within one year, yearly Reports of the proceedings and position of the winding-up shall be made to the Court. If possible, that seems to me to be a provision which is even more necessary in the case of supervision than in the case of winding-up by the Court itself; because in the latter case the authority of the Court would have been invoked from time to time in the ordinary course of things, and the Court may be taken to have a knowledge of the state of the proceedings; whereas in these cases of supervision, except so far as the Court does exercise its power and authority, the thing goes on out of Court, and that is a case in which I think it is eminently important there should be forthcoming periodical reports. I cannot help thinking it is possible that one reason why in the other House this change was made in the Bill, which I wish should be re-considered, may have been that on the face of the Bill there are some few provisions which would not be applicable to the case; and, in order to meet that, I propose to alter the words of the Amendment in the manner which I mentioned at the beginning. I do not know what course my noble Friend thinks it best should be taken, but I cannot, in point of form, move my Amendment on Clause 30 until all his which come before it has been disposed of. If my noble Friend thinks the House will approve of the principle of my Amendment, perhaps he will propose not to move his now, reserving to himself, of course, power to do so if he should think it necessary at a later stage of the Bill.

LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH: I shall be glad to accept the principle of the Amendment indicated by the noble Earl. In fact, it was in the Bill, as originally introduced in another place. It was, however, there altered contrary to the wish of the Government, and the clause, struck out in Standing Committee of this House, inserted. But, as I pointed out before, that has caused an ambiguity, which must be met in some way or other. If the legal Members of the House approve of the suggestion made by the noble and learned Lord, especially as now altered by him, I, on behalf of the Government, should be glad to accept it, and to see that it is replaced in the Bill, subject, of course, to any objections which may be brought forward hereafter. Under those circumstances, I propose not to move these Amendments which stand in my name.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Clause 8.

LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH: This sub-section 1 propose not to put in as Sub-section 9, but as Sub-section 10, after the present Sub-section 9. The object of it is that it shall take the place of a sub-section which has been struck out in Standing Committee, it having been pointed out by the noble and learned Lord opposite that that sub-section gave too general powers of delegation which were generally objected to in Standing Committee. It was agreed, therefore, that that sub-section should be struck out and a sub-section inserted specifying to whom the powers to be delegated should be granted. This, I hope, will be the view of the noble and learned Lord, but if not, I should be glad to accept any amendment of it on the same lines that he can suggest. I propose to move it, putting the Judges of County Courts before the Official References and other officers of the Supreme Court.

Amendment moved in page 7, at the end, to insert—

"(9.) The powers of the court under this section may, subject to and in accordance with general rules, be exercised by any officer of the Supreme Court being an official referee, master, registrar, or chief clerk, or by any judge of county courts, or by any district registrar of the High Court named for the purpose by the Lord Chancellor, or by any registrar of a palatine court."—(The Lord Balfour of Burleigh).

LORD HERSCHELL: This is undoubtedly a great improvement from my point of view in comparison with previous proposals, but there are one or two points here which I do not feel quite sure about. I do not know why the noble Lord has not inserted the Registrars of the Bankruptcy Court, who are in the habit of taking examinations in strictly analogous cases. If it is because they are too busy, my noble Friend has, it seems to me, inserted a class of officials who are far more busy still, that is the chief clerks. I have great doubts about the expediency of inserting the chief clerks, having regard to the ordinary character of their duties, and in addition to that, I think it is likely to cause serious delays in the Court of Chancery, because they are the officers belonging to the different Chancery Courts who have to deal with the details of matters pending in those Courts. If you occupy them in duties of this description, their time may be so much occupied that it would be difficult for them to perform their ordinary duties. There is no class of officers, interference with whose ordinary duties may delay or put a stop to so many proceedings as the chief clerks, because they have before them a number of suits at different stages, and if you take them away from their ordinary duties you may interfere to a greater extent with business than by taking other officers. I should have preferred very much that the Registrars of the Bankruptcy Court should have been inserted rather than the chief clerks.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I think my noble and learned Friend is in error in supposing that the Registrars in Bankruptcy are not included. The Officers of the Supreme Court named are "an Official Referee, Master, Registrar, or Chief Clerk," and the word "registrar" would, therefore, include those in Bankruptcy.

LORD HERSCHELL: But there are Registrars in Chancery also, and having regard to the fact that they perform very different duties, I doubt whether they would be proper persons. I thought they might be the Registrars intended.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: All I meant to point out was that Registrars in Bankruptcy would be included, because they are not only "officers of the Court," but actually "Registrars."

LORD HERSCHELL: I think it had better be made clear that Registrars in Bankruptcy are intended. I certainly do not think that Registrars in Chancery would be suitable for this purpose. Then with regard to District Registrars. Many of the District Registrars are solicitors practising in their Districts, and I think they would in general, certainly, be very unsuitable persons for this work. I see it is to be confined to such District Registrars only as are designated by the Lord Chancellor; and probably if that limitation were always to be borne in mind, that objection might be obviated.

LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH: I certainly believe that the Registrars in Bankruptcy would be included under this definition; but if not, we are willing to make it clear. And if, as the noble and learned Lord thinks the Chief Clerks are too much occupied, I shall be willing to accept an Amendment deleting that class of officials.

THE EARL OF SELBORNE: I cannot help thinking that of the London Registrars the only Registrars who ought to be placed in this position are the Registrars of the Bankruptcy Court. To use those words would be a very simple way of amending that. Then with regard to the Chief Clerks. I hesitate to agree with my noble and learned Friend for this reason; that the Bill provides that the Judges in the Chancery Division may have a portion of this jurisdiction assigned to them; and if they have they will naturally discharge it with that assistance from their Chief Clerks which they now have. I cannot help thinking that the Chief Clerks would be perfectly competent persons to do this duty; and that in some circumstances, in regard to proceedings in the Chancery Division it might be inconvenient not to be able to do the work with their assistance. The whole matter will be subject to general rules, and I should myself incline to the opinion that you had better leave the Chief Clerks in.

LORD HERSCHELL: I would move after the word "Registrar" to insert the words "in Bankruptcy."

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: Then I think the grammar of this Amendment will require a little alteration, otherwise it would primarily mean that the District Registrars are to be named by the Lord Chancellor or by any Registrar of the County Palatine Court. I think that will have to be looked into.

LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH: That will be put right at a later stage.

LORD HERSCHELL: If you put in the words "Registrar of a Palatine Court" before "District Registrar of the High Court" that would do, and they would naturally come there, as he is a higher functionary.

Amendment moved to the proposed Amendment after the word "Registrar," in line 4, to insert the words "in Bankruptcy."—(The Lord Herschell.)

Agreed to.

Amended, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 26.

LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH: The purport of this Amendment was indicated to the Standing Committee, and it was approved of. The words have been subsequently agreed upon by the Lord Chancellor and by the authorities of the County Palatine Court of Lancaster; and I move accordingly, at page 15, at the end of the clause, to insert—

"(5.) All rules made and directions given by the Lord Chancellor under the foregoing provisions of this section shall be adopted by the authority for the time being empowered to make rules for regulating the practice or procedure in the chancery court of the County Palatine of Lancaster, but as so adopted shall have effect with the substitution of the words 'vico-chancellor' for the word 'judge,' and the word 'registrar' for the words 'chief clerk.'"

Agreed to.

LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH: After Clause 29 there is a new clause in my name, which tells its own tale. It is necessary to have a new clause of this kind, because there is no clause which covers the ground, and it is necessary to have a ready means of dealing with certificates or documents issued by the Board of Trade.

Moved to insert after Clause 29—

"(1.) All documents purporting to be orders or certificates made or issued by the Board of Trade, and to be sealed with the seal of the Board, or to be signed by a secretary or assistant secretary of the board, or any person authorised in that behalf by the president of the board, shall be received in evidence and deemed to be such orders or certificates without further proof unless the contrary is shown.

(2.) A certificate signed by the President of the Board of Trade that any order made, certificate issued, or act done, is the order, certificate, or act of the Board of Trade, shall be conclusive evidence of the fact so certified."

Agreed to.

Clause 30.

THE EARL OF SELBORNE: I will now move the clause of which I have already spoken, as altered in the way proposed.

Moved, after Sub-section 1, to add as a new sub-section—

"(2.) For the purposes of such provisions of this Act as are applicable to a company of which liquidators have been duly appointed and subject to general rules, a company shall be deemed to be wound up by order of the Court, if the order is to continue a winding up under the supervision of the court."

Agreed to.

Report of Amendments to be received on Tuesday next; and Bill to be printed as amended. (No. 229.)

HOUSING OF THE WORKING CLASSES BILL.—(No. 220.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Viscount CROSS): My Lords, it is not my intention to take up very much of their Lordships' time in moving the Second Reading of this Bill, because the subject must be quite familiar to all your Lordships. In order to show what the necessity for this Bill is it may be useful, perhaps, just shortly to touch upon the history of the legislation upon this subject. Many years ago the late Lord Shaftesbury, who was the pioneer in this branch of legislation, succeeded in passing the Labouring Classes Dwellings Act, under which not much was done for a long period. More recently, in 1868, the late Mr. Torrens brought forward a measure to enable Vestries and District Boards to deal with healthy houses in their different localities, the provisions of which have been recently very strongly put in force, to the great advantage of the country and of the Metropolis itself. It was my duty in 1875 to re-consider this question. The former Acts, both Mr. Torrens's and Lord Shaftesbury's, only applied to small localities and to individual houses. Shortly before 1875 I had had an opportunity of seeing what had been done in the City of Glasgow, and I was very much struck with the Act which they had there, and which enabled them to deal not simply with individual houses, but with large unhealthy areas; and coming back to London, and finding that such areas existing very extensively in this country I introduced the Act of 1875, which eventually became law, and which enabled the Metropolitan Board of Works to take possession of large areas, if they were found to be in a certain condition, for the purpose of pulling down houses which were unfit for human habitation, and of building suitable working class dwellings upon their sites. At the time that measure was, I remember, described in two words by a noble friend of mine as "communism and confiscation." I certainly am not in the least ashamed of that Act, nor do I think it deserved the character which those two words attributed to it, because its object was to get rid of those unhealthy areas covered with insanitary houses, incourts, and alleys, which by reason of the want of light, air, ventilation, proper conveniences, or from other causes were unfit for human habitation, and where fevers and diseases were constantly generated, causing loss of health not only to the inhabitants of the courts and alleys themselves, but also to the other parts of the cities or boroughs in which they were found. There was another fact which pressed very strongly upon me and the Government of the day at the time; and that was, that it was not in the power of owners or of occupiers who lived in those courts and alleys to remedy the defects existing, because there were so many owners and so many people concerned that it was absolutely not in the power of any them acting individually to put matters straight. The result was, that that Act was passed, and all those Acts have been considerably amended from time to time. It was found necessary to pass another Act in 1879 in order to defeat the mischievous practice which had grown up among the owners of those unhealthy, insanitary houses. The moment they found they were scheduled, and that the matter was coming before Parliament, they immediately put them in the best repair they could, not for the purpose of making them more healthy, but for the purpose of extracting larger compensation from the public than they would otherwise have been able to get. A Committee of the House of Commons sat in 1881-2, of which I happened to be Chairman, which re-considered those Acts, and further Amendments were made; and the House will remember that later on, in 1885, a Royal Commission sat to consider the whole subject, upon which His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales sat as a member and took the greatest interest in its proceedings. That was done at the instance of my noble Friend the present Prime Minister. The result has been that there have been a great number of Acts passed; and we think the time has come when those Acts ought to be consolidated, so that they may be made intelligible to the ordinary reader, who will not be obliged to hunt up a dozen Acts of Parliament in order to find out what the law is upon the subject, but that the law shall be placed in one single plain Act of Parliament. Perhaps, before I point out a few Amendments which have been made in the law and allude to the Bill at present lying on your Lordships' Table, I might be allowed, as a matter of interest, to state a few figures to show what has been done under the Act at present existing, because they have been by no means allowed to lie dormant. A great deal has been done under a great many of them. I will take Mr. Torrens's Act first. There was a Return moved for last year, 1889, to show how much had been done under this Act; and be it remembered that this Act of Mr. Torrens related to such houses as were dangerous to health so as to be unfit for human habitation. That was a very good description of them; and when we look at the number of houses which have been put in order, we find they amount to no less than 1,633. So that, as far as one can see, these Acts of Mr. Torrens's have done very good work, when we find there were 1,633 houses dealt with under them which were absolutely unfit for human habitation at the time they were taken in hand by the Local Authorities. Under the Act which I had the honour of passing afterwards a good deal has been done also. This measure, as I have stated, embraced large areas, and no less than 23 areas in London have been dealt with under these Acts. The persons displaced numbered 28,850, and the persons who can be rehoused on the ground which has been re-built upon number 30,715. The areas dealt with by the Metropolitan Board—there have been one or two schemes since, but during the period that the Metropolitan Board was in existence the areas dealt with included over 4,000 houses, and, besides that, there were 16 acres of land also dealt with, but the number of houses on those 16 acres I am not acquainted with. Those figures show that those Acts have done a considerable amount of good.

Viscount Cross

There is no doubt whatever that the proceedings under these Acts have been taken at a considerable cost to the rate-payers. The net cost, I believe, of the 23 schemes which were passed by the Metropolitan Board of Works after the sale of the land which they were obliged to take has amounted to very nearly £1,500,000. But you have had 30,000 people properly housed for that money, and you have done a great deal more than that—you have stamped out the sources of fever and disease which were polluting many parts of this Metropolis, both in Westminster and in East London, in almost every one of the large districts which were the sources of disease, and from which disease spread into other parts of the City to the enormous disadvantage and danger of the inhabitants. I should not like to weary your Lordships with any lengthened extracts to show the effect of what has been done by taking these large areas; but perhaps your Lordships will allow me to read a few short sentences from one of the Reports which have been made to me by several Medical Officers of Health. I do not propose to refer to them all, though I have them all here. I am now going to read from the Report made to me the other day by the Medical Officer of Health for the St. Giles's district. Your Lordships probably know well that St. Giles's district was one of the most unhealthy places in the whole of London. I will take one block which was dealt with, called Great Wild Street, and the adjoining streets and courts in the neighbourhood of Drury Lane. The condition of that area when taken in hand by the authorities is thus described by the Medical Officer—

"When I inspected the houses in this area in 1875 the squalor of the neighbourhood was plainly visible. The courts and passages were very narrow and close together; the houses built back to back with very small yards, and in many no yards at all; consequently, the sanitary arrangements were in the basement or under the stairs; the ventilation was most defective, and rendered the air impure and noxious."

The Report states that the death rate, which, of course, is one of the greatest tests of the health of a district, was between 50 and 60 per 1,000, being double the rate for the whole of the St. Giles's district. That is an enormous death rate to exist in any portion of any City.—

"The infantile mortality was very great. It was a veritable fever den, for typhus, the most malignant and fatal form of fever, was scarcely ever absent from the locality. As a proof of the improved condition of the health of the people in the buildings now erected on the same area, the death rate for 1889, instead of being between 50 and 60 per 1,000, fell to 17·7 per 1,000, and no case of typhus fever has been reported since the old houses were demolished."

That is a result, at all events, worth attaining, and shows that you must not measure the matter simply by the cost to the ratepayers of the removal of the old houses on such an area, and the building of new dwellings. The only other scheme to which I will call the attention of your Lordships is also in St. Giles's district, close to Drury Lane, the Shelton Street area. The Report states that—

"If anything, the houses in this neighbourhood were more faulty and worn out than those described in the two other areas; the rooms, passages, staircases, were small and dark, and the impure air which did reach them came from well-like back yards, where the water-closets and other arrangements were situated. The fatality in this area was alarming, the death-rate of one street (Shelton Street) being more than 60·0 per 1,000 and a birth-rate of 29 per 1,000. The infantile mortality was 30·4 per 1,000, and the zymotic death-rate equalled 12·9 per 1,000, against 4·3 per 1,000 for the whole of St. Giles's district."

That has also been reduced to about 17 per 1,000. Then he goes on to say—

"I have no hesitation in stating that, in my opinion, the clearing away of these insanitary houses and the re-housing of the people in improved model dwellings have been of the greatest possible benefit not only to this district but to London generally. In conclusion, I will refer you to the Lancet of March 26, 1887, which states, in reference to the clearing away of fever dens under the operations of the Artisans' Dwellings Act, 1875—"To the steps already taken by the Medical Officer of Health and the St. Giles Board of Works is greatly due the freedom from typhus fever which London now enjoys. In past years St. Giles was again and again the centre from which this disease spread to other parts of the Metropolis, and the money spent in improvements of the districts has already made ample return in leading to the disappearance of this serious cause of mortality."

That means, of course, the disappearance of a serious cause of mortality for the whole of London. Now, that is only a sample of what has occurred in other districts as well; but I think I have said enough to show that it is worth while for Parliament to see how they can improve these Acts which have already done so much good, and how, by consolidating them, we can simplify proceedings under them so as to make everything more plain and open than before. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Poor Law Board has given great and unceasing attention to this subject, and I think the course he has pursued in the other House of Parliament was a very wise one. He brought forward an Amending Bill to amend all the defects which the Government thought existed in the Acts as he found them, and then he brought forward also a Consolidation Bill. Those two Bills were referred to the Standing Committee; and after they had approved of the Amendments, or had altered them as they thought best, they were then incorporated in the Consolidation Bill, which is the only one that comes up before your Lordships' House. If I persuade your Lordships to read this Bill a second time, as I hope I shall do, I shall then propose to refer the Consolidation Bill to the Standing Committee on Law, and I will present to them the Amending Bill. It was presented to the House of Commons in the first instance so that they might see what Amendments were proposed in the Consolidation Bill instead of having to wade through a mass of pages to hunt them up for themselves. The Amendments proposed are not very numerous; and the first Amendment to which I would allude is the Amendment in those Acts which bear my own name. There has always been great difficulty in persuading the arbitrators not to give too much compensation, and I will only take one instance. If you find a place which is absolutely unfit for human habitation, and which cannot be made fit for human habitation, what is the value of the houses for that purpose to the owner, and what compensation ought to be given to him for it? Of course, it cannot be allowed to stay as it is. The houses would be immediately shut up under the existing law. They could not be used by the owner for the purpose of habitation, and the value of that property, therefore, seems to be the value of the land—very valuable, no doubt, because of its situation, and the owners seem to me entitled to get that—and the value of the materials which are upon the place at what they would realise to sell. That, I think, is about the only Amendment of the Acts of 1875. As to Torrens's Acts, they are several. In the first place, it is made distinctly the duty of the Local Authority and officials to at once close all dwellings which are found unfit for human habitation. That seems to me to be a step quite in the right direction. An order may also be made for the demolition of houses if they are found to be absolutely dangerous and unfit for human habitation, or if they are found to be so obstructive to the light and air that the neighbouring courts and alleys cannot possibly get that light and air and ventilation which they ought to have, without the removal of the obstructive building, on payment of due compensation, but not otherwise. Then I think it is quite right that such buildings should be removed, for the public safety, upon full compensation, of course, being paid to the owners of the houses. It was found there was considerable difficulty, as there were two sets of Acts, in saying under which set of Acts a particular area ought to be dealt with. The Metropolitan Board of Works was always saying that areas in question were too small to be dealt with under the Acts bearing my name, and the Local Bodies were always saying that the areas were too large to be dealt with under Mr. Torrens's Acts—and, therefore, between the two stools a suggested improvement fell to the ground, and was not carried out. I think in the last amendment of the law, made in 1885, a clause was introduced giving power to the Home Secretary to receive evidence upon the point, and to decide which Authority should proceed in order to make the improvement required. But it has appeared to my right hon. Friend, and, as I think, wisely, that there ought to be an intermediate proceeding as regards those places which are too large to be dealt with as individual houses, and too small to be dealt with as an unhealthy area; and, therefore, he has proposed a scheme by which, under a more economical system, larger areas can be dealt with, and the health of the district preserved as it ought to be. I do not think I ought to take up more of your Lordships' time in asking you to give a second reading to this Bill. I am quite certain your Lordships will agree with me that you cannot have a more important subject to deal with than that, seeing that you ensure the means of housing properly the working classes of this country. If you were to propose that the State should provide dwellings for them, that, I agree, would be subject to the charge of Communism; but there is no Communism in the State, saying that places shall not continue to exist which are let for human habitation, and which are unfit for human habitation; there is no Communism in saying that these unhealthy areas which produce disease, not only in the districts where they exist, but elsewhere, shall not be allowed to continue; there is no Communism in saying that the working man has yet to be, not provided with a wholesome dwelling for himself and his family, but placed in a position in which he can provide himself and family with decent and wholesome accommodation. It is simply then for the purpose of enabling such dwellings with proper sanitary arrangements to be obtained, not only in London, but throughout the country, that I am so anxious this Bill should go forward. When I had the honour of introducing my former Bill in 1875, I ventured to call the attention of the House of Commons to one of the earliest of God's laws—"Let there be light." Light has been let in upon many of these places; light has been let in for thousands of people who could not get it before, and I have to appeal now to your Lordships' House, as I appealed then to the House of Commons—let there be more light. I hope your Lordships will read this Bill a second time.

Bill read 2^a (according to order), and committed to the Standing Committee for Bills relating to Law, &c.

ARMY (GRENADEIR GUARDS).

LORD SANDHURST (In rising to call attention to the late occurrences in connection with the 2nd Battalion, Grenadier Guards; and to move for papers) said: My Lords, I should not have been so anxious to call attention to the deplorable cases which are referred to in my notice had we been able to get from those who are in office, more information upon the subject. I am well aware that, up to this time, no question has been asked in your Lordships' House, but I think it would have been of public advantage if, in another place, where questions have been asked, some statements on the general circumstances had been made. The only source of information that we have is an article in the Times newspaper of July 22nd, and various statements in other newspapers, more or less vague in their character, and, apparently, without authority, but uncontradicted. There are, however, three points which are tolerably clear, and upon which we may be quite certain. One is that, lamentably enough, there has been an émeute of some description, though of what description is not quite clear, in the 2nd Battalion Grenadier Guards; the second point, on which we are quite certain, is that the regiment has been banished—sent to the Bermudas; and the third point, upon which there is equally no doubt, I fear, is that Courts Martials have taken place, at which sentences have been given ranging between two years' imprisonment, with hard labour, and 18 months', with hard labour. Now, as to the first of these points. What I want to know is what was the description of this mutiny, and whether the whole of the battalion was concerned in it, or whether it was limited to a very small number of the men of that regiment? What was this mutiny which has involved these heavy consequences? I cannot see why there should be any mystery about it. The circumstance was known all over Europe by noon, with the exception of one individual, the Secretary of State for War, who answered about 6 p.m. in the Commons that he had no information. I pass from that, however; he might have been overwhelmed with business. There has been a Court of Inquiry, we are led to believe, formed of distinguished officers, and I should like to be told what course that Court of Inquiry pursued; whether the full statement of the case of the Commanding Officer was gone into or not, and whether the Commanding Officer had every opportunity of being heard before that Court of Inquiry? I should also like to know whether the non-commissioned officers' case was also thoroughly gone into, and whether there remains no shadow of doubt that the non-commissioned officers of that battalion are free from suspicion which might have brought them to trial before a Court Martial? Because it seems almost impossible to believe that the men of this battalion could be in a state bordering on mutiny, and finally breaking out into open mutiny, and that the non-commissioned officers who live with them, and who in the Guards are to a great extent responsible for them, could be absolutely ignorant of these occurrences. Did they know nothing of the intended action of the men? Besides, if the non-commissioned officers did not know anything about it, there were plenty of other people who did, for I am informed it was the common rumour in the streets, and that there were no less than five reporters endeavouring to fight their way into the barracks half-an-hour before the meeting commenced. As I said before, unless the Board of Inquiry was satisfied beyond the shadow of doubt that there was no ground for suspicion against these non-commissioned officers I think some of those men ought to be arraigned to take their trial. I want to know whether a survey of their conduct was included in the deliberations of the Court of Inquiry, and whether it was considered so satisfactory as to allow them to escape suspicion and Court-Martial. Then the next thing I want to know is whether the case of the Commanding Officer was thoroughly gone into. I will say at once that I hold no brief for Colonel Maitland. I have not seen him for months, and I have not communicated with him. But there is one particular point upon which I should be glad to be allowed to say one word, and to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether it is correct, as is commonly rumoured, that this gallant officer, when the Court of Inquiry was sitting, or after it had sat, either wrote or spoke to the illustrious Duke of the Commander-in-Chief, or to the General commanding, to the effect that if his battalion was either not dragged before the public or was spared from being banished, he was willing to resign his command and be the scapegoat—that he would enter into no correspondence or take any steps whatever with the view of putting himself right before the public, and that he would sacrifice himself. Well, I do not say whether it was a right course that was pursued—whether it was right to refuse to accept such a resignation, or to accept it; but I do think that when an officer has been for 31 years in a regiment, and has ended by commanding it, that it was a noble proposition to sacrifice himself entirely, so that the reputation of his regiment may be spared; and I hope that, if the facts are as I state them, the noble Lord the Under Secretary for War will inform us that such is the case. Before leaving Colonel Maitland, I would ask why he has been forced to resign? I may be told it is owing to the fact that his regiment mutinied. Well, let us follow that a little to the logical conclusion. Every time that men mutiny in a battalion or in a regiment, is the commanding officer to be forced to resign? Because, if that is so, I do not think that the office of commanding officer of any regiment would be worth one day's purchase under such conditions. But, then, again, if this mutiny is not the cause of Colonel Maitland's resigning, there must be some charge against Colonel Maitland of which we at present are ignorant, and I should like definitely to ask the Under Secretary for War whether he, as the head of the administrative part of the Army in this House, has any charges to make against Colonel Maitland; and I would further ask the illustrious Duke the Commander-in-Chief whether he has any charges to make against him. If not—if Colonel Maitland's character, beyond the circumstance of the mutiny, is as clear as I believe it to be—I hope, with that sense of candour and honesty which the case demands, it will be so stated by the high officials who represent the War Office and the Army. There is one thing which I should like to remark with regard to Colonel Maitland and this mutinous battalion. Five days before the mutiny occurred the battalion was inspected by the General Officer Commanding, and I am told that he highly complimented Colonel Maitland on the appearance and condition of his men, and that when, as is customary, the men were asked whether they had any complaints to make, they shouted with one voice that they had no complaints at all.

Lord Sandhurst

Well, then, how does the story go on? We can presume that the Authorities at this Court of Inquiry came to the conclusion that the Commanding Officer must resign or be superseded; that the battalion must leave this country, and that there must be courts-martial held. I have dealt very briefly, and in perhaps rather a lame way, with the Commanding Officer, and I would now call attention for one moment to the sending of the regiment abroad. But, apart from that, I am told that between the time when the mutiny took place and the time the regiment left the country, this regiment of actual mutineers went on guard for what are termed "the West End duties," that is, at the Royal palaces, Government buildings, and elsewhere. But I have always understood that employing a man or a regiment on a duty is condoning the offence. I only mention that fact to show that these proceedings have not been as regular from one end to the other as one could have wished them to be. Well, then, the whole battalion is sent away. But only a portion of this battalion was in the barracks where this mutiny took place. At Wellington Barracks there were only four companies, and two more companies were at Kensington Barracks, two miles off. I should like to know very much whether, in the opinion of the Authorities, those other two companies are implicated in this mutiny, and why, if they were not implicated in this mutiny, they have been banished with the rest of the battalion? Were any men from them tried by Court Martial? Then the next point is that you are sending this battalion abroad as a punishment, you are practically only sending them on a routine duty which has to be performed by every other regiment in the Service, except the Guards, in turn; so that any other regiment, when told off for foreign duty, might very well retort that, "after all said and done, it is rather hard to be sent abroad on what is called 'punishment duty' for another regiment, though it is considered quite good enough for us as ordinary duty." That appears to me to be a pretty compliment for the high Authorities of the Army to pay to the regiments of the line and the rest of the Service. I do not know whether there is precedent for this extraordinary step; but this punishment—if punishment foreign service really is—is cheerfully undertaken by the rest of the Army, and, what is more, cheerfully acquiesced in by the men, who will most likely prefer life in the Bermudas to sentry duty in London. Then, as regards the time-expired men. Is that going to lead you into no difficulties? Before very long there will, no doubt, be a certain number of men due on the expiration of their period to be sent home. I believe it is possible to extend their service for a year. We know not how long this punishment is to last, but if these men are due to come home before the expiration of the punishment time, which they will owe to the good luck of having been enlisted a little before their fellows, it does appear to me that will be the most happy-go-lucky kind of justice possible. Such an extraordinary mode of inflicting punishment I never had the misfortune to meet with before. I now come to the Court Martial. You must remember that in these deplorable proceedings you have practically broken your Commanding Officer. We may, therefore, presume that the mutiny is regarded as having been his fault. But what is to happen to the private soldier? Steps must, of course, be taken to vindicate the discipline of the Army; and so you have put back one man from each company, according to the reports we have seen, who are tried by a District Court Martial; and to get at those who are most culpable, I presume you follow the plan of taking the senior soldier from each company. The notion that you can get at the most culpable and guilty men by that process seems to me a species of reasoning which I do not think will bear investigation. And when you have got this man from each company have you really found out that he is guilty? I should like to see the whole proceedings of this Court Martial. I should like to see who the witnesses were, or who it was who got these men condemned to two years' imprisonment. If you have contented yourselves with punishing these men because they were the senior soldiers, another consideration arises. I know it used to be the case that it was always the younger soldiers who were the most insubordinate, and for the obvious reason that they are less accustomed to restraint, and less brought under military discipline; but at any rate the men who have suffered in this case apparently are the oldest soldiers, the men who have served longest in the regiment. I cannot commend the idea, and to talk of the justice of the Plan would, to my mind, be waste of time. Then there is one other point, these men were tried by an inferior Court, a District Court Martial, instead of a General Court Martial. The substitution of a District Court Martial may very likely have been looked upon as an act of clemency by the Authorities at the War Office. I have have no doubt that is the case. But there is one great danger in turning these men over to the inferior Court: that the officers who form an inferior Court—I am not now alluding to this particular Court, I will take any Court Martial—are just as likely as not where they have a bad case of insubordination before them to sentence the men to the maximum punishment in the power of that Court. And for this reason, they say to themselves, "It is lucky for the man that he is before us; he might have been tried before a general Court, and then he would have had a much heavier sentence." So that there was danger in it on that head. Well, now, what actually occurred? Four of these men received sentences of two years' imprisonment with hard labour, one of them being sentenced to be discharged with ignominy, and two others received sentences of 18 months' imprisonment with hard labour. Two years is the maximum sentence. And this is after you have declared the Commanding Officer to be guilty by causing him to resign—breaking him—and have punished the whole battalion by sending them abroad! That seems to me such a method of procedure as to be almost incredible. Now, as to this sentence of two years' imprisonment. There are a great many eminent legal authorities in this House, and I venture to think there is hardly a Judge upon the Bench in this country, or a noble and learned Lord in this House who would not condemn those sentences as being excessive. But if a very excessive sentence is passed upon anybody in the Courts of this country there is the Press to take notice of it. It is true that in the case of a Court Martial the confirming officer has the option of remitting the sentence or not; but there is none of that great pressure for the protection of men so dealt with brought to bear upon the Military Authorities, which is brought to bear upon the Civil Authorities in the country. Well, I cannot congratulate the Government or the War Office Authorities, or whoever is responsible in this matter for the action which has been taken. You have broken the Commanding Officer, although by passing these very severe sentences of imprisonment you tell us that the men were guilty. On the other hand, you have given very heavy sentences to the men, although you tell us that the Commanding Officer was guilty, and has, therefore, been forced to resign. That leads us to suppose that it is his fault, and that the men were badly used. In addition to that, you have sent the whole battalion away for a certain period of time for a holiday! I hope very much that if the Royal Commission which was asked for some time ago by my noble and learned Friend behind me (Lord Herschell) into punishments is ever given him, it will include the sentences of Naval and Military Courts Martial. I hope very much I shall be able to extract from Her Majesty's Government some information which will expunge from my mind, at any rate, the idea, and I must say I think it is an idea which affects the public mind, that there has been grievous mismanagement in this case and great injustice done both to the Commanding Officer and to the men.

Moved,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for Papers relating to the late occurrences in connection with the 2nd Battalion, Grenadier Guards." — (The Lord Sandhurst.)

LORD DORCHESTER: As one of the oldest Guardsmen in this House, I trust your Lordships will bear with me while I say a few words upon this grave question. I do not propose to follow the noble Lord who has just spoken into all the details of the question whether the Civil and Military Administration should be fused together. It rather appears to me that there has been too much of the civilian element mixed up with the Military Administration of the Army. It appears to me that if we had had fewer civilian Secretaries of War and one or two more military officers engaged in the administration, as is customary in Germany, in France, and in every other military nation that I know of, the Service might be better administered, although it might entail a little longer term than at present. England is the only great country which has a voluntarily enlisted Army, and I have it upon the testimony of one of the most illustrious warriors who have lived within the last 50 years, one who is now dead, and who was the head of a princely house, that short periods of service are inconsistent with the voluntary principle of enlistment. In that matter I remember I was scouted at by a noble and gallant Friend of mine who used to adorn the Cross Benches, but who is now seldom seen in this House. I have known the 2nd Battalion of Grenadier Guards for 49 years. I served with them in Canada in 1841. I have known them, when under very gallant commanders, who afterwards became distinguished generals in the Service, and I have never heard one word of complaint of them, whether on board ship, in camp, under great and heavy suffering from starvation, from cold, and from want of necessities arising from the maladministration of the civilian bodies connected with the Army. I have never heard one word of complaint from them beyond the grumbling of some soldier who had, perhaps, imbibed more freely than he should. I never heard a word of insubordination except from one or two madmen during the long period of my service that could at all compare with what occurred a fortnight ago within a few hundred yards of this House. As I was walking down to this House at 4 o'clock in the afternoon on that day, and saw "Mutiny among the Grenadiers" announced in the evening papers, I could hardly believe my eyes. I would not have believed it could have occurred, nor do I believe it could have occurred under the old system of reliable non-commissioned officers. Under the old system of non-commissioned officers the biggest blackguards were kept under control. I have experienced it. I never heard one word during the 14 months that I served in the Crimea, with General Sir Frederick Stephenson and my noble Friend on the opposite side of the House, lying out in the snow, and living upon two ship's biscuits, three slices of salt pork, and five potatoes a day, for I well remember it, and I am accurate in the particulars. I never heard one word approaching to what happened on this occasion, nor do I believe, as I have said, that anything of the kind could have occurred. But as to what is to be said in defence of the officers. Much has been said about them. In no regiments in Her Majesty's Service is there better touch or a better feeling than I believe always used to exist, and, I believe, does now exist, between the officers and men of the Guards. The officers join with the men in their sports, and entertain them. The noble Viscount on the Ministerial Benches has given us to-day a vivid description of the wretched habitations of the poorer classes in London; but I do not believe that the worst of those tenements were as bad as the lodgings which the married soldier's means alone enabled him to secure for his wife and children. A lodging-house was built 42 years ago by the Brigade of Guards for the married men, to which the illustrious Duke, I believe, contributed. That building was erected by contributions from the officers, and was acquired by Government during the Crimean War. Again, in order to raise the tone and improve the moral condition of the men, the officers of the Brigade of Guards and their friends raised a very large sum to erect a palatial club for the non-commissioned officers and men of the Guards, and it is now the residence of one of the most eminent men in this country—Cardinal Manning. Now, so much in repudiation of the notion of the officers of the Guards not being in touch with their men, of which we have heard a great deal. At rowing, cricket, and athletic sports I have invariably seen the men of the regiment and the officers upon the most friendly terms possible, and quite as friendly as they should be. But we read in every newspaper, and I suppose the newspapers are read by your Lordships, statements to the contrary, and suggestions that if some of the officers were as they ought to be housed in barracks that would improve their relations with the men. I fail to see that at all, though I am quite sure that the officers of the Guards would accept it as the very greatest boon possible if they could be lodged in barracks instead of paying for lodgings about St. James Street and other places in the neighbourhood. But what do those gentlemen know about the matter who write so freely in every newspaper without giving their names, and notably in a newspaper which takes its name from a street not very far from St. James Street—I may say that I do not allude to the St. James's Gazette—about officers living in barracks. Have those gentlemen ever travelled abroad? Do they know anything of the armies in foreign countries? I believe they know very little about army matters at all. In no army that I am aware of—I may be wrong, and if so, I speak subject to reproof—do officers live in barracks. They may do so in some regiments in Germany, and in some of the Russian Guard Regiments, but in France, Italy, Spain, and, I believe, generally in Germany, the officers always live in private quarters. They have not even a mess. When the late Emperor Napoleon tried to establish a mess system among the French as English officers have, it was with great difficulty he succeeded, and notably on one point, that was the score of expense. Well, so much for the officers not having been in touch with their men because they live within two or three hundred yards of them, and not actually within the barrack gates. But there are always officers within the barrack gates; there always used to be, and I know there is always a great desire on the part of young officers now, who are much more hardly worked than they used to be, to obtain free quarters, for a reason which affects their pockets, and, as we know, young officers may very well make that a consideration. I only hope we shall hear no more balderdash from the Press about officers not living in barracks. That has nothing at all to do with the matter. All I can say is that I have commanded one of the most, I will use the term, "rowdy" lots possible, and I do not dislike the rowdy soldier. There are, of course, rowdy soldiers in this country, because the men are enlisted from the lowest class; and I believe there is no reformatory equal to the British Army for quieting down some of the blackguards, such as I have had the honour to command, and making decent soldiers of them. They soon begin to act properly for their own sake. I remember on one occasion I was riding round the outposts at Inkermann, and as I passed along I said to one of the greatest blackguards I ever had the honour to command, "Mind, you must keep a good look-out here;" and his reply was, "You may depend upon it, Colonel, we shall do that for our own sake." And I felt we were, perhaps, safer in that quarter than if we had had a better-conducted man. To these few words, and with many apologies to your Lordships for having detained you so long in defence of those with whom I served for so many years, I will only add that I trust justice will be done to the battalion, that due punishment may be meted out, and that the Commanding Officer may not be made the scapegoat for his men.

*THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE: May I be permitted to interpose for a moment? I hope this discussion will not be further prolonged. I trust your Lordships will feel that it is utterly impossible for any man to maintain discipline in the Army if such matters as these are to be discussed publicly in Parliament. If my noble Friend or any other noble Lord has not confidence in those who have discipline to maintain in the Service they would have a perfect right to attack their conduct; but as long as they have the perfect confidence they profess in the authorities, I am bound to say they must have that trust in them which will enable the authorities to carry out what they believe to be essential, absolutely essential for the interests and well-being of Her Majesty's Service, and for the well-being of the Army, which they must wish to see efficient in all its details. It is all very well for people to talk about mutiny, but I do not call this occurrence mutiny. It was, no doubt, an act of gross insubordination that was committed by these men, and if that gross act of insubordination was not to be dealt with in the way that we thought best, most just, and most thorough, in order to restore entire discipline and obedience amongst those who had forgotten themselves, I say it would be utterly impossible for either myself or any officer who has the honour to be at the head of the Army to conduct the duties of that position in a manner which would be justifiable to those whom he commanded, or to the country which he was desirous to serve conscientiously and to the best of his ability. My Lords, I trust that this discussion may not be prolonged, and I must say that I do most deeply regret that any noble Lord should have started it. I am sorry for it, because the noble Lord is a friend of mine, and I wish, if he had anything to say in this matter, he had come and said it to me confidentially, in order that if anything was wrong it might have been put right, instead of bringing the matter before the public in a discussion which I can only think will lead to mischief instead of to good.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (EARL BROWLOW): My Lords, I cannot help expressing my surprise that the noble Lord, who has himself served in the Brigade of Guards and who has had some experience as Under Secretary of State for War, should have thought it desirable to bring this subject forward for discussion in your Lordships' House. Deprecating discussion on the matter, as I do most strongly, I will reply as briefly as possible to the points the noble Lord has mentioned, and I will take them in order. The first question was whether the case of the non-commissioned officers had been investigated. My answer to that is that their case was investigated; and I would ask the noble Lord to remember that these non-commissioned officers were at the time of the outbreak on parade, they were not with the disaffected men in their rooms. Another point which the noble Lord raises is this. He asks why the six senior soldiers were selected to be tried by Court Martial. My answer is, they were not selected to be tried by Court Martial. The reason that they were tried was that in accordance with the custom well-known in Her Majesty's Army, in the absence of non-commissioned officers the oldest soldier is technically, I may say, in command. These old soldiers were in the barrack-rooms when the non-commissioned officers were where the old soldiers ought to have been—namely, on parade—and therefore they brought upon themselves a trial by Court Martial. Another point raised by the noble Lord was as to whether the case of the commanding officer was gone into. Undoubtedly it was. Colonel Maitland has had every opportunity of making his defence before the Court of Inquiry, and the result has been that he has been allowed to resign his command, but I cannot admit, for one moment, that the commanding officer has been in any way made the scapegoat for the regiment. Another question asked by the noble Lord is whether the other companies of the regiment stationed at Kensington were implicated in the mutiny. My answer is in the negative. I believe those are all the points which the noble Lord has raised, and I have endeavoured to give him as brief and as concise an answer as possible. The noble Lord, in his Motion, moved for Papers. The only Papers I know of are the proceedings before the Court of Inquiry and the Court Martial, and it is not considered it would be for the good of the Public Service that those Papers should be laid upon the Table.

LORD SANDHURST: Of course, I will not press the Motion for Papers; but I must say I am extremely sorry to hear no word either from the noble Earl or the illustrious Duke the Commander-in-Chief as to whether they have any charge to make against, or can, on the other hand, say anything generous of, Colonel Maitland. I think it is a great pity that something has not been said upon the point, but I will not discuss the matter further.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

ELECTIONS (SCOTLAND) (CORRUPT AND ILLEGAL PRACTICES) BILL.

COMMITTEE OF SELECTION FOR STANDING COMMITTEES.

Report from, That the Committee have added to the Standing Committee for Bills relating to Law, &c., the Lord Lyttelton, the Lord Ribblesdale, the Lord Kinnaid, the Lord Rothschild, and the Lord Hillingdon for the consideration of the Directors Liability Bill, and the Lord Balfour for the consideration of the Bankruptcy Bill, read, and ordered to lie on the Table.

House adjourned at twenty minutes past Six o'clock, to Monday next, a quarter before Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 25th July, 1890.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

COMMERCIAL UNION ASSURANCE COMPANY BILL.

(3.10.) MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin): As this is a Bill in which I have a personal interest, I beg to move that the Chairman of the Standing Orders Committee shall act as Chairman.

Question, "That the Chairman of the Standing Orders Committee be Chairman of the Committee upon the Commercial Union Assurance Company Bill," put and agreed to.

CLYDE NAVIGATION BILL [LORDS]— (by Order.)

Order for Third Reading read.

*(3.15.) MR. J. WILSON (Lanark, Govan): In moving the Motion which stands in my name upon the Paper, I desire briefly to explain to the House the reasons which induce me to do so. As Member for the Govan Division of the County of Lanark, I naturally take a deep interest in everything that concerns the interests of my constituents. Besides being myself a resident, I am a large employer of labour in the parish of Govan. The present Bill proposes no new scheme of dockworks, but the promoters, who are the Clyde Navigation Trustees, propose to abandon certain powers which were declared by Parliament in 1883 to be for the public benefit. In that year the Trustees acquired land for the purpose of erecting docks. Now, the River Clyde runs from east to west, and the main road between Glasgow and Govan follows the River Clyde, and almost runs parallel with it until it reaches Renfrew. The road runs on the south side of the river, and the proposed docks are also on the south side. The Local Authorities and the people of Govan do not object to the docks as docks; but what they do object to is that this Bill, if passed, will cut in two a main artery and a turnpike road which has been from time immemorial a public highway. The land acquired for docks is in Govan; but if the proposals of this Bill are accepted, they will practically cut the burgh of Govan into two halves, and leave those on the west side of the docks out of touch with the other part of the burgh on the east side. Parliament in 1883, in conferring additional powers upon the Clyde Navigation Trust, stipulated that the existing turnpike road should be maintained, and that it should form a point of continuity by means of two swing bridges. The object of the present Bill is to do away with the road and the two swing bridges. It must not be forgotten that in 1883 Parliament recognised the importance of this road, and required the Trustees to make a solid road for the purpose of serving the large amount of traffic that is carried over it. The Govan road is one of the best, one of the widest, and one of the most important roads which go into the City of Glasgow. It is computed that on the average some 13,000 persons travel upon it daily, in addition to vehicles. The plea of the promoters is that there is difficulty in passing the swinging bridges by vessels using the dock, but I maintain that it is no difficult matter to cant a vessel so as to pass a swing bridge, and the Harbour Master of Glasgow told the Committee that the canting of a vessel in the river was a mere bagatelle. The cost of constructing the two swing bridges and their upkeep is estimated at £125,000; and the Clyde Trustees, if the present Bill is carried, propose to put that sum into their own pockets as well as to absorb the public property on the roadway which runs through the centre of the proposed docks, without giving the community anything in return. There can be no difficulty, so far as shipbuilding is concerned. The longest steamer is the City of Rome, and that vessel was in the Clyde in 1883, before this Bill passed, and experienced no difficulty in using the river. Indeed, it was clearly demonstrated to the Committee by nautical engineers and other experts that there could be no difficulty in taking out the very largest vessels afloat—even vessels 600 feet long. That view was supported by Sir Frederick Bramwell, the eminent engineer, who is thoroughly conversant with the Clyde navigation as well as with the docks of London. In answer to Mr. Pember, the counsel for the Local Authorities of the Corporation of Govan, Sir Frederick stated that, although in these days he was hardly astonished at anything, he did think that it would be a piece of the greatest hardship to do away with the swing bridges and compel the public to travel a long distance round. Nor were the Committee unanimous in passing the Preamble of the Bill. I believe that they had the greatest difficulty in making up their minds upon the subject; and I fear that in the decision which they ultimately arrived at, they overlooked the main point which was in the minds of the Local Authorities. The question is one which concerns the public, and pre-eminently the working classes. Those of the working classes who are employed in the West End, but live in the East End, will be required, if this Bill passes, to go round the docks in order to reach their work some 1,400 yards, or, taking 300 days as constituting the working year, to travel something like 300 miles per annum unnecessarily. The Local Authorities have no personal advantage to gain in opposing the Bill; their only object is to preserve the rights of the public. Under these circumstances, I beg to move the Resolution of which I have given notice.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out the words, "now read the third time," in order to add the words "re-committed to the former Committee, with an Instruction to the Committee to provide that the line authorised by the Act of 1883 with regard to the portion of the road passing through the centre of the docks be adhered to, with this alteration, that one swing bridge instead of two swing bridges be constructed."

—(Mr. John Wilson, Lanark.)

(3.30.) MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox): This matter has already been determined before two Select Committees, one of the House of Lords and the other of the House of Commons, and the points raised by my hon. Friend have been carefully considered. In one place the inquiry lasted four days, and in the other six. In these circumstances, it is quite unprecedented to ask this House to go into matters of evidence and detail with a view to overturning the decisions of the Committees of both Houses of Parliament. The promoters of the Bill are acting in the public interest. My hon. Friend said the Trustees would save £125,000, but who would have to pay it? Acting in the interests of their constituents, the ratepayers, the promoters desire to carry out the scheme at the least possible expense. With regard to the swing bridges, the plans contained in the present Bill are essentially different to those contained in the Bill of 1883, and it was in order to get rid of these bridges that the old scheme was abandoned. The advantage to Govan from this Bill will be very great indeed, as the assessment of the new docks will prove an additional source of revenue. The new road will lead through the centre of the extended burgh, whereas the present only runs along the riverside.

ROYAL ASSENT.

Message to attend the Lords Commissioners;—

The House went;—and being returned;—

MR. SPEAKER reported the Royal Assent to the Bills mentioned on page 841.

MR. CALDWELL: There is only one other point in the speech of my hon. Friend to which I will call attention. I venture to say that very little inconvenience will be caused to the working classes. It will not take them more than 260 yards out of their way from Govan to Glasgow, and it should also be borne in mind that there is a very efficient service of penny steamers running up the Clyde from Govan to Glasgow—a distance of three or four miles—so that those who wish to travel from one place to the other have every convenience. In addition to that, we find that the working classes in Govan are a migratory population, and if a man finds he is put to any inconvenience by having to go a little out of his way, he can easily shift his home. On the other hand, it is, of course, impossible to shift the River Clyde. So far as the working classes are concerned, there is no outcry against this scheme. If it inconveniences a few of the people the scheme will convenience the many, and I therefore submit that there is no reason for traversing the decision of the Committee.

*(4.0.) SIR J. KENNAWAY (Devon. Honiton): As Chairman of the Committee of this House which considered this Bill, I may, perhaps, be allowed to say a few words on the arguments of my hon. Friend the Member for Govan. The question put before the Committee was a very simple one, and was not complicated by any side issues. It was whether the Commissioners of the Clyde should be allowed to meet the demands of the shipping of that port according to the only plan that they thought useful and practicable, or whether, in the interests of the working classes, it was desirable so to curtail the plan as to practically spoil it. Now, the Clyde Commissioners are a Public Body, and have no private interests to serve in this matter. They have done great service to the Port of Glasgow. In 21 years the increase of their revenue has been from £143,000 to £335,000. They have long felt that they wanted a new dock, and have purchased 100 acres of land for nearly £500,000, in order that the dock might be constructed. The Committee came to the conclusion that, on the whole, the balance of advantage was in favour of the scheme of the Clyde Trustees, though they quite acknowledge the hardships of the working man in having, from one point, to make a détour of 800 yards. They took into consideration the fact that great benefit would accrue to the people of Govan by the expenditure among them of £1,500,000. It was, no doubt, a serious thing to divert an old-established road; but the question is, whether such inconveniences as that are outweighed by the stronger claims of the whole shipping interests of the Clyde. The great majority of the Committee felt, without hesitation, that it was unnecessary to call upon the counsel for the Clyde Trustees to continue his observations; and the same thing happened in the House of Lords. I think it will be greatly regretted if, after Committees of both Houses have passed the Bill, the House should reject it.

(4.6.) DR. CLARK (Caithness): If I had entertained any doubt before, the two speeches I have heard in favour of the Bill would have proved quite sufficient to determine the course I ought to take. The speech of my hon. Friend the Member for the St. Rollox Division was not of the character I should have expected from him. I do not know whether he is ignorant of the facts of the case, or whether he is trying to throw dust into the eyes of Members of this House; but he must know that the ratepayers have nothing to do with this matter, and that the cost of the works will not be defrayed by them. It will have to be paid out of the shipping dues. My hon. Friend apparently was anxious that the House should not realise what is the real point at issue between the Corporation of Glasgow and the Burgh of Govan. The question is whether you are going to have a bridge to connect the two sides of the dock. The proposition of the Corporation of Glasgow is a very wise one. It is simply a question of keeping in existence a road that has been established 400 or 500 years. I am sure it would cost less money to build the bridge than it cost to oppose the proposition. If they had been wise the Clyde Trustees would have assented to the scheme. My hon. Friend has suggested that this is not so serious a matter for the working classes, as they can migrate to other houses if they choose; but why should the value of property be thus depreciated? This is evidently a question of the classes against the masses, and the latter will go to the wall. I hope the House will insist on having a bridge erected, for I have heard no reasons advanced why there should not be one.

Sir J. Kennaway

(4.14.) MR. GILES (Southampton): I cannot understand what advantage would be gained by the re-committal of the Bill. The Committee would only have before it the evidence on which they have already decided it. In 1883 Parliament passed a Bill which did away with the direct Govan road, and a new road was made 237 yards longer. If the diversion proposed in this Bill be compared with the road of 1883, it will be found that the extra distance will be 269 yards, instead of 800 yards as contended by hon. Gentlemen opposite. As an engineer, I do not hesitate to say that the present plan is infinitely superior to that of 1883. I would have done all I could to get rid of even the one swing bridge. I can only say that the necessities of Glasgow and of Govan are such as to render it expedient to have a dock to accommodate the larger class of steamers; and I think the Clyde Trustees have adopted very proper designs. It is not a question of money. The Commissioners are going to spend £1,500,000 in order to increase the dock accommodation on the Clyde, and surely it would be foolish to throw over the scheme simply because some working men will have to walk two or three hundred yards further than before. Supposing there was a swing bridge, and it happened to be open just as the men were going to work, they would be delayed and probably lose a quarter of a day's work. With this uncertainty, would it not be better that they should be compelled to go even a quarter of a mile out of their way, for they would then know what time to start in order to reach the works in time? I hope that the House will not upset the Bill.

(4.17.) The House divided:—Ayes 165; Noes 81.—(Div. List, No. 200.)

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read the third time, and passed, with Amendments.

QUESTIONS.

MATCHES SUPPLIED TO THE HOUSE.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he can inform the House under what head, in the recent Return "Contracts with Foreigners," appear the proportion of matches supplied to the House of Commons marked "Manufactured in Sweden," but in boxes otherwise scarcely distinguishable from those in which the products of London labour are sold by Bryant & May, Limited; and, further, if the goods supplied by Government contractors in the United Kingdom are examined, with a view of preventing foreign-made articles being introduced into a consignment?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): The matches marked "Manufactured in Sweden" do not appear in the Return referred to by my hon. Friend, because the contract for them is made with an English firm, Messrs. R. S. Mendey, of 106, Fenchurch Street. I understand that they are manufactured by Messrs. Bryant & May, at the "Lion" Factory in Sweden. I apprehend that all goods supplied by contractors are examined to see that they are according to sample or specification.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT: Does the specification not require that British goods shall be supplied?

MR. JACKSON: No, Sir; I believe not; it merely requires that the matches shall be supplied by the firm.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT: I beg to give notice that I shall move that they be labelled.

IRELAND—EVICTIONS ON THE MASSEREENE ESTATE.

MR. BLANE (Armagh, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in the case of the four evictions which were carried out last week on the Massereene Estate, County Louth, by bailiffs in the absence of the Sheriff, the bailiffs had their appointment from the Sheriff in writing to carry out those decrees; and if it is true that Constable Brady, of the police hut Monasterboice, reported that a shot fired by an emergency man named James Parks grazed the side of his cap; and, if so, will the authorities order an investigation?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I understand that the bailiffs referred to were regularly appointed Sheriff's bailiffs. The facts are not accurately stated in the second paragraph. The person mentioned is not an emergency man, but a new tenant. No complaint appears to have been made that the shot grazed the constable's cap, and the District Inspector who has inquired into the case is of opinion that there would be no ground for such an allegation.

MR. BLANE: Is it true that a shot was fired at the man named Morgan?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, I have received no report of that kind.

LEEWARD ISLANDS.

SIR WALTER FOSTER (Derby, Ilkeston): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether his attention has been called to the present unsatisfactory state of the Government Medical Service in the Island of St. Christopher (colony of the Leeward Islands), whereby in four medical districts (Nos. 3, 4, 5, and 6) covering an extent of nearly 50 square miles, with an estimated population of over 20,000, there are only two medical officers; whether he is aware that the last quarterly Report of the Analyser of Vital Statistics stated that the high death-rate of the island was to be attributed to the large number of deaths of infants of the labouring classes, and that at least one death of a poor woman in childbirth had occurred from want of medical attendance?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): It is true that there were till lately only two medical men to four districts in the Island of St. Christopher, but there were three other medical officers in the island. One of the two districts had been left vacant for some years, because the Royal Commission which visited the island in 1883 had reported that the medical staff was larger than was necessary, and because St. Kitts has more doctors in proportion to its size and facility of travelling than perhaps any other West Indian island. However, in response to urgent local representations, the Secretary of State has already taken steps to appoint a new medical officer to the vacant district. The hon. Member's quotation from the Analyser of Vital Statistics is practically correct, though in the same Report it is stated that the general death-rate was probably lower than in any previous year of the century. I may add that the Report assigns special causes for the great infant mortality quite distinct from any want of medical attendance, to which no reference is made.

HORSE BREEDING.

MR. ALFRED PEASE (York): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether the Government can now announce their intention to carry out the recommendations of the Royal Commission on Horse Breeding in their Third Report, with regard to raising the amount disposable for Queen's premiums and the encouragement of horse breeding from £5,000 to £10,000, and the advisability of preparing Returns containing reliable information as to the number and description of horses in the United Kingdom?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): My attention has been already directed to this subject, but I am afraid that the Returns recommended by the Commission would involve considerable difficulty. The matter, however, is being considered, and I hope to be able to make some improvement, at all events, in the existing system before the next Returns are issued. With regard to the first part of the question, the experiment of devoting the sum in question to Queen's premiums instead of Queen's plates has been exceedingly successful, and personally I should be very glad to see it raised from £5,000 to £10,000, but that is a matter for the consideration of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

RAINE'S BEQUEST.

MR. W. P. SINCLAIR (Falkirk, &c.): On behalf of my hon. Friend (Mr. T. W. Russell), I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether a Petition has been presented to His Excellency, objecting to the scheme of the Endowed Schools Commission in regard to the Raine's Bequest in County Derry; and when the scheme will be presented to the House?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: A Petition of the nature referred to has been presented to the Lord Lieutenant. The scheme was accordingly laid before Parliament yesterday.

Baron H. de Worms

RUNCORN GUARDIANS.

MR. BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board, with reference to the irregularities at the late election of Guardians of the Poor for the township of Runcorn, whether he is aware that the clerk's office is at Frodsham, a distance of eight miles from Runcorn, so that qualified electors who may not receive Voting Papers have either to walk that distance or make a railway journey to obtain them; whether he is also aware that the counting of the votes takes place at Dutton Workhouse, which is still further from Runcorn, and not accessible by railway, so that it is practically impossible for anyone neglected by the distributor or collector of Voting Papers to record his vote; and, whether, in view of the fact that the township of Runcorn contains more than half the population of the Union, and that contested elections in the other townships are almost unknown, he will direct that Voting Papers should be procurable at the overseers' township office at Runcorn, and that the counting of the votes should take place there?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I am aware that the office of clerk to the Guardians of the Runcorn Union is at Frodsham, and that the Dutton Workhouse, where the counting of the votes in the election of Guardians takes place, is still further from Runcorn. I find that, according to the Census of 1881, the population of the township of Runcorn was considerably less than half that of the Union. A contested election took place in another township during the present year. The regulations applicable to the election of Guardians require that the counting of the votes shall take place at the Board-room of the Guardians, but it rests with the Returning Officer to fix the place at which Voting Papers may be procured by persons who have not received them. The Local Government Board will communicate with the Returning Officer, with a view to considering whether any alteration should be made in the places where Voting Papers may be procurable, and where the counting of the votes shall take place.

WARD'S NIGHT SIGNALLING.

ADMIRAL MAYNE (Pembroke, Haverfordwest): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if he can state the date at which the system of an American gentleman, named Ward, of night signalling for use in the Naval Service was proposed, and when it was rejected; whether experiments were carried on at the expense of, and, if so, at what cost to the Admiralty; and what sum was paid to Mr. Ward on the rejection of his system as compensation for his failure?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): Mr. Ward's system of night signals was submitted to the Admiralty in 1859, and, after various practical experiments with these signals, it was decided in 1864 that they were not adapted for use in the Naval Service. The action of the Admiralty was confined to permitting the signals to be tested in one of the dockyards, and on board ship. The only payment made to Mr. Ward was £100 in 1866.

*ADMIRAL MAYNE: Will the expenses be covered?

*LORD G. HAMILTON: I believe so. There is no very accurate record.

THE TOWN CLERK OF SALFORD

MR. SEYMOUR KEAY (Elgin and Nairn): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to the examination in bankruptcy of Thomas Harrop, an auctioneer at Mexbro', at Sheffield, on 16th May last, and to the serious allegations then made respecting Mr. Samuel Brown, the Town Clerk of Salford, in regard to his pecuniary dealings with the bankrupt; whether he has observed that the Official Receiver stated on that occasion that he must insist on Mr. Samuel Brown being examined, but that, nevertheless, at the adjourned examination on 12th June, he refused to summon him for examination, although an offer was made by a creditor to pay the expenses for so doing; and whether there is any process by which the said Samuel Brown can be brought to account in respect of his dealings with the bankrupt?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): I am informed that, in the case referred to, it is alleged that Mr.

Brown received moneys from the bankrupt, which he ought to refund, but which he refuses to refund, on the ground that he has a counter claim against the bankrupt's estate. The Official Receiver was superseded by the appointment of a Trustee at the first meeting of creditors, and it is no part of his duty, under such circumstances, to undertake proceedings for recovery of moneys alleged to be due to the estate. That duty now devolves upon the Trustee, who has ample powers under the Bankruptcy Act both for examining the parties concerned and for obtaining the judgment of the Court upon any question involved.

PERMANENT PENSIONS.

MR. SEYMOUR KEAY: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the Law Officers of the Crown have been recently consulted, and have recorded the grounds on which they "consider to be permanent in character" the payment of £965 hitherto made yearly to the Duke of St. Albans as Master Surveyor and Keeper of the Hawks; that to the Duke of Hamilton of £45 10s. yearly as Keeper of the Palace and Gardens of Holyrood; and that to the Marquess of Downshire of £54 3s. 4d. as Constable of the Fort of Hillsborough; and whether he will communicate such grounds to the House; whether he will give the names of the persons to whom the sums of £50 and £37 15s. 4d. are paid yearly, as Deputy Keeper and Porter of Holyrood; also the names of the present recipients of £162 10s. yearly as Warders of the Fort of Hillsborough; whether he will explain what "real and substantial saving to the Nation" is gained, as per recommendation of the Select Committee of 1887, by the Treasury disbursing 26,945 years' purchase to Lords Exmouth and Rodney; and whether he will give an approximate date at which any "obligation of an onerous kind" ceased to attach to the offices of Constable of the Fort of Hillsborough and Master Surveyor and Keeper of the Hawks?

MR. HANBURY (Preston): Before the right hon. Gentleman answers that question, will he state how much of the sum of £965 is for the employment of persons who are not employed, and for the keep of birds which are not kept?

MR. JACKSON: Perhaps my hon. Friend the Member for Preston will be good enough to put his question on the Paper. With regard to the question of the Member opposite, I have to say that the Law Officers of the Crown have been recently consulted on the permanency in character of all the existing perpetual pensions, allowances, &c., with the exception of the payment to the Marquess of Downshire as Constable of the Fort of Hillsborough, which case has been on two previous occasions referred to the Law Advisers of the day. The opinions given by the Law Officers, who had all the original grants before them, have been to the effect that all the payments in question, including allowances, are legally and permanently binding; but it would be contrary to practice to make public the grounds (if any be recorded) on which these legal opinions are based. The names of the Deputy Keeper and Porter of Holyrood are Mr. James Auldjo Jamieson and Robert Morrison respectively. The payment in respect of the Warders of the Fort of Hillsborough is made direct to the Marquess of Downshire, and, therefore, the names of the present recipients of the pay are not known to the Treasury; but I can obtain them if the hon. Member desires to have them. The amount of Government securities yielding annual dividends equal to the amount of each of the perpetual pensions of Lord Rodney and Lord Exmouth, which is the true measure of the cost to the taxpayer of such pensions, would, at the present price of Consols, be £75,000, whereas, under the present proposal, each of the grantees will receive a capital sum of £53,890—that is, less than the equivalent in Consols by £21,110 in each case, or less by 28 per cent. The Treasury are not in a position to give an approximate date at which any obligation of an onerous kind ceased to attach to the offices of the Constable of the Fort of Hillsborough and the Keeper of the Hawks; nor probably could this information be given by the annuitants themselves, unless their family records happen to be unusually complete.

MR. SEYMOUR KEAY: Arising out of that answer will the right hon. Gentleman kindly say how it is that the Treasury have advised that the payment of £162 10s. should be continued yearly during the lifetime, or until the resignation, of persons of whose identity they were unaware?

MR. JACKSON: The hon. Gentleman will be good enough to give notice of that question.

SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I should like to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether, in regard to these payments, the Treasury have confined themselves to the legal aspects of the question, and not considered the equity of the case as regards the taxpayers of the present generation?

MR. JACKSON: The hon. Gentleman must give notice of the question.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): Are we to understand from the right hon. Gentleman's reply as to the verdict or opinion given by the Law Officers, that those payments are to be considered permanent in character in the sense that Parliament has no power to put an end to them; and, if so, what becomes of the supposed omnipotence of the British Parliament?

MR. JACKSON: Perhaps the hon. Member will put his question down on the Paper.

COMPOSITIONS FOR SHIPS' BOTTOMS.

SIR WILLIAM PLOWDEN (Wolverhampton, W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether Commander Pitt, R.N., beyond his Naval experience and training, has had any technical training to qualify him to watch the results of compositions applied to the bottoms of Her Majesty's ships; apart from the Chairman (Admiral Colomb) were two out of the three members of the Admiralty Committee on Compositions experts, and was the third member (Commander Pitt) simply nominated as a Naval Officer; why was this Committee dissolved; are the two experts who were members of the Committee still in the Service, and is the necessary precaution taken to consult them before Commander Pitt's Reports and recommendations are approved; is Commander Pitt on full pay of his rank, what do his travelling and other allowances amount to per annum, and in what Votes in the Navy Estimates do these items respectively appear; is Commander Pitt now employed in a civilian capacity; and, if so, is not Treasury sanction indispensable; does he take the place of the expert officers at the dockyards in reporting upon compositions; and how long will he be retained in his present special employment?

LORD G. HAMILTON: Commander Pitt, from constant study of compositions used afloat, has as wide a knowledge of the results of all known compositions as any man in the country. A chemist and a Naval constructor were on the Admiralty Committee on Compositions, and it was dissolved because it was no longer necessary to continue it. The members of the late Committee are still in the Service, and, if necessary, can be consulted. Commander Pitt is on half-pay, but he receives the difference between his full and half-pay—10s. a day—for the days actually employed, with subsistence allowance to cover the expense of living away from home. The payments, including travelling expenses, average £25 a month, or £300 per annum in all. He is not employed as a civilian. Provision is made under Vote 11 of the Navy Estimates for the expense of Committees and for the employment of officers on special Service connected with the Navy at large. For charges to these heads, so long as the provision is not exhausted, the sanction of the Treasury is not required. Commander Pitt, by his services and labours, has largely increased the efficiency of compositions in use in the Navy by reporting against the more costly and less durable compositions, and has thus incurred the hostility of the agents of the disused compositions.

MAGISTRATES FOR TYRONE.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.): I wish to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that a Memorial, extensively signed by the clergy of all denominations, a number of County Magistrates, and the principal merchants and farmers, without distinction, of Dromore and district, County Tyrone, was recently presented to Colonel Lowry, Vice Lieutenant of the County Tyrone, pointing out the necessity for the appointment of a Catholic Magistrate for the district, the overwhelming majority of the population of which are Catholics, while the proportion of Catholic Justices are two to nine non-Catholics, and praying that Mr. John M'Loughlan, a Catholic gentleman and independent farmer of the locality, and a member of the Local Board of Guardians, should be appointed to the Commission of the Peace; whether he can say if the prayer of the Memorial was refused, and, if so, on what grounds; whether this is the second Memorial in favour of two Catholics refused within a few months; whether the Lord Chancellor will take any steps to appoint eligible Catholics to the Commission of the Peace; whether any complaints have reached the Lord Lieutenant respecting the conduct of Mr. Alexander, a Justice of the Peace of the Dromore district, and allegations that Mr. Alexander attended meetings of the Orange Society, at which, in Mr. Alexander's presence, and without any expression of dissent or disapprobation from him, violent speeches, inciting to breaches of the peace, were delivered; and whether the attention of the Lord Chancellor will be called to these complaints against Mr. Alexander?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: With regard to the inquiries in the first two paragraphs, I beg to refer the hon. Member to my reply to a question put on this subject by the hon. Member for Mid Tyrone on 24th June. I am not aware whether a second Memorial was refused; but I am informed the Vice Lieutenant has recently recommended to the Lord Chancellor a Roman Catholic for the Dromore District, and the Lord Chancellor has signed the warrant for his appointment to the Magistracy. No complaints have reached the Lord Lieutenant or the Lord Chancellor of Ireland in regard to the gentleman mentioned in the fifth paragraph.

SHADOWING.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland if he has yet received the depositions in the case of Mr. David Kent, who was charged with "shadowing" District Inspector Ball at Fermoy Fair; whether he has received any further information to show that Mr. M'Causland, concerning whom it is alleged that Mr. Kent went towards him "for the purpose of preventing the sale of his lambs," had no lambs nor anything else for sale at the fair that day; and if further inquiry will be made into the case?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): I hope I shall be able to answer the hon. Member's question on Monday.

MR. FLYNN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the report of the trial of David Kent on a charge of obstructing District Inspector Ball of Fermoy, from which it appears that the Magistrates said that there was "No evidence to convict, we therefore dismiss the case, but defendant is to give an undertaking not to interfere with Inspector Ball any more;".

and that defendant thereupon, addressing the Bench, said—

"The only undertaking I would give would be that if I am not shadowed myself, and my business injuriously interfered with at the fair, that I would not shadow Mr. Ball; and if he can state under what statute or authority had the Magistrates power to ask Mr. Kent to give the undertaking above referred to?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The statements contained in the first paragraph of the question are inaccurate and misleading. The Magistrates did not discharge, but convicted, and the defendant did not give a qualified undertaking, but a distinct and absolute one, not to interfere with District Inspector Ball or the police, and, in consequence of that undertaking, the Bench ordered him to be discharged at the rising of the Court.

MR. FLYNN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he can now state why was Mr. James O'Brien, at Killeagh Fair, arrested summarily on a charge of shadowing a policeman in plain clothes, instead of being summoned in the ordinary way?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Mr. O'Brien was arrested on a charge of persistently obstructing the police. To have proceeded by summons would not have had the effect of stopping the obstruction by which the police were prevented doing their duty.

MR. CRILLY (Mayo, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he is aware that the Royal Irish Constabulary are in the habit of following Mr. Thomas B. Kelly, of Church Street, Claremorris, County Mayo, from house to house in every town he visits in pursuit of his business as a commercial traveller; that in several cases they have followed him into the houses where he has had to call, and have stood by his side while he was transacting his business, even warning shopkeepers against doing business with Mr. Kelly; and whether the police, in pursuing this course, are acting under instructions; and, if so, what are the reasons for placing Mr. Kelly under this police surveillance?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Constabulary Authorities report that, so far as can be ascertained, the police in no instance acted in the manner alleged in the question.

POTATO BLIGHT IN IRELAND.

MR. FLYNN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the reports appearing in the Irish papers of the extension of the potato blight, and the almost complete failure of that crop, in the seaboard and other districts of Cork, Kerry, Waterford, Clare, Limerick, Galway, Donegal, and other counties; and if the Government have any information to lay before the House?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The attention of the Government has been drawn, through the Press and other sources, to the indications of potato disease which have appeared in Ireland. We are carefully watching the matter, both through the agency of the Local Government and the Land Commission. Anything that can be legitimately done to mitigate any suffering caused by the potato disease shall be done.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether his attention has been drawn to the Reports made by the Inspectors of the Local Government Board on this subject. It is there stated that the prospects are alarming in the extreme. I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he will lay on the Table copies of the Reports already made by the Inspectors; and whether he will give the House an assurance that the Board will take steps to anticipate the possible famine?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, Sir. I cannot give an undertaking that the Local Government Board will anticipate any calamity that is likely to occur, but I will undertake to say that they will watch events, and anything which can be done to mitigate the suffering which may be caused shall be done. The Reports have been of an informal character, but if the hon. Gentleman wants a formal Report it shall be made.

MR. FLYNN: Will the right hon. Gentleman give instructions to the Local Government Board to give authority to the Boards of Poor Law Guardians to deal with the question of outdoor relief in a more liberal manner than hitherto?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I can give no undertaking of that kind. It would be a very grave step indeed, and I see no reason at this moment to anticipate that this will be necessary.

RATING OF LUNATIC ASYLUMS.

MR. SALT (Stafford): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he will consider how far some general rule can be laid down for the rating of lunatic asylums, in order that an intelligible and uniform system of rating such institutions may be adopted, and the expense and inconvenience of appeals may be avoided.

*MR. RITCHIE: The Local Government Board have no authority to prescribe general rules for the rating of lunatic asylums. If the Board were to attempt to lay down general principles, the rules so laid down would in no way be binding either upon the assessment committee or on the asylums to be rated. Moreover, it must be borne in mind that in connection with the assessment of a lunatic asylum the particular circumstances of each case must be considered. Under these circumstances, I do not think that it is desirable that the Board should act upon the suggestion of my hon. Friend.

THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF SCIENCE, DUBLIN.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether the statement, that of five Professors appointed to the Royal College of Science, Dublin, within the last 20 years only one has been an Irishman is correct, or whether it refers only to the Professors still holding positions in the College; whether he is aware that as many as nine appointments to Professorships in the College have been made within a period of 18 years, and that only one of the nine gentlemen appointed has been an Irishman; and whether he can give any explanation of the parallel case that, of the recent appointments made by his Department to the Science and Art Museum in Dublin, none have been given to Irishmen?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HAET DYKE, Kent, Dartford): My answer referred to the Professors now holding appointments in the Royal College of Science, to whom I understand the hon. Member alluded in his question. In regard to the nationality of the Professors who have been appointed within the last 18 years, but are since resigned or dead, I am afraid I can speak with no certainty, but it is quite possible that the hon. Member is substantially correct. Of the present superior staff of the Science and Art Museum, including the Metropolitan School of Art and Botanic Gardens, three were appointed by competitive examination, and eight by various Lords President. Of the former—those appointed by competitive examination—I believe none are Irishmen; and of the latter, those appointed by nomination, all except one are, I believe, Irishmen.

NEWFOUNDLAND.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies if the Naval officers on the coast of Newfoundland were acting under the instructions of Her Majesty's Government; if he can yet say whether it is true that Captain Sir Baldwin Walker, R.N., has taken off the embargo on Mr. Baird's lobster factory, and is to pay damages; if it is true that the statute enabling the Crown to give effect to the Treaty of Versailles on the Newfoundland coast has been repealed; and, if so, when and under what circumstances it has been repealed; and if Her Majesty's Government find themselves unable to enforce the modus vivendi?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): In answer to the first part of the hon. Member's question, I have to state that the Naval officers on the coast of Newfoundland do act under instructions from Her Majesty's Government. In reply to the second part of the question, I have to say that no such information has been received. In answer to the third part of the question, my reply is if the hon. Member refers to Act 28 Geo. III., c. 35, that Act was repealed by the Statute Law Revision Act, 1871. It has long ceased to be operative, for it only purported to give effect to the Treaty of 1783, which was terminated by the subsequent war. French fishing rights are now derived from the Treaty of 1814, which replaced them on the same footing as they stood on in 1792. An Act of 5 Geo. IV., c. 51, was afterwards passed, giving effect to any Treaties respecting Newfoundland which were then in force. This was a temporary Act, but was continued by 2 and 3 William IV., c. 79, until December 3, 1834, when it lapsed. As regards the fourth question, Her Majesty's Government do not find themselves unable to enforce the modus vivendi.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: May I further ask whether the right hon. Gentleman understands that the modus vivendi is being enforced at the present moment, and whether all the reports which have appeared in the public prints for some days past, and which are of so much importance that anything of the kind must have been reported to the Government, are unfounded?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The Secretary of State has not received any information to that effect on the question.

*SIR G. CAMPBELL: Does the right hon. Gentleman believe the modus vivendi is at this moment being enforced?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I have every reason to believe that it is, and I believe it is the subject of judicial trial.

MR. E. ROBERTSON: The right hon. Gentleman declined the other day to answer a question as to the legal authority under which the officers were acting, on the ground that legal proceedings were pending against Sir Baldwin Walker. Has he now ascertained whether these legal proceedings were concluded?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: No, Sir; I believe not.

LEEWARD ISLANDS—IMPORT DUTIES ON FOOD.

ADMIRAL FIELD (Sussex, Eastbourne): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether his attention has been called to Report 101 (Colonial), St. Kitts-Nevis, pages 9 and 10, recommending the abolition of the Import Duties on Food, and Export Duties on other articles; and whether the Secretary of State will give effect to the representations made therein by Mr. Eldridge in that respect?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: The Secretary of State has read the Report referred to, which was written in 1887. Successive Secretaries of State, before and since the date of that Report, have impressed on the Governors of the Leeward Islands the expediency of abolishing or reducing the Import Duties on Food, but it has not hitherto been found possible to provide from other sources the revenue derived from these duties. The Export Duties in St. Kitts have been almost entirely abolished since the date of the Report in question, and the remainder will expire before long.

EVICCTIONS IN THE WEST Calf ISLANDS.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Government intend to supply Mr. Marmion with a gunboat or with the boats of the Coastguard to aid him in evicting tenants on the Middle Calf or West Calf Islands, off the west coast of Cork?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think I must ask the hon. Member for further notice of this question.

MR. DILLON: I wish to point out to the right hon. Gentleman that the matter is extremely urgent, and that there is much complaint on the subject. However, I feel that I have given the right hon. Gentleman very short notice of this question, which I will repeat on Monday.

LIGHT GOLD.

SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will state what further measures he proposes to take for the purpose of calling in light gold coin?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I regret that the state of public business has not allowed me to bring in a Bill to establish a Coinage Fund and to provide for the further calling in of light gold, which I have prepared and which is in draft. The Bill is not controversial, but still I cannot deny that it is one on which it would be impossible to refuse some discussion, and therefore I have not pressed it. But I confidently hope it may be passed in the present financial year, and as its principal proposal would not have come into operation before the 1st of April, I do not think there will be any real loss of time.

EUROPEAN COMMERCIAL TREATIES.

MR. J. M. MACLEAN (Oldham): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that much dissatisfaction prevails in Lancashire regarding the constitution of the Committee on European Commercial Treaties, as there is no member of the Committee connected with the cotton industry except Sir Joseph Lee, who represents the merchants rather than the spinners and manufacturers.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: No, Sir, I am not aware that much dissatisfaction prevails in Lancashire on this subject. Sir Joseph Lee is a spinner, weaver, and printer, as well as a merchant. I have, however, received representations from Oldham to the effect that that town desires special representation on the Committee, but it is impossible to comply with such requests from individual towns. The points which gave so much trouble in 1881 were not so much on the yarn duties as on the textiles, with the various surcharges for embroidery, printing, &c.

THE BANKRUPTCY ACT.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he has received a communication from Messrs. James, of Merthyr Tydvil, alleging certain hardships pressing upon executors under the working of the 125th section of "The Bankruptcy Act, 1883;" and whether he will, during the recess, consider the advisability of some amendment of the Act in this respect?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The Board of Trade received, on the 23rd instant, a communication from Messrs. James, alleging certain hardships said to have been sustained by themselves and clients in connection with the administration of an insolvent debtor's estate, under Section 125 of the Bankruptcy Act. I am not satisfied that these allegations are well founded; but as the matters in dispute have, at the instance of the Official Receivers, been set down for hearing by the Judge of the Merthyr Tydvil Court on the 7th August next, I must decline to express any opinion upon the question raised by the hon. Member until after such hearing has taken place.

GRANTS TO COUNTY COUNCILS.

MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer to what specific local rates County Councils may apply the additional grant in aid from the Excise Duty not allocated by Parliament; whether under the Local Government (Scotland) Act, rates payable by proprietors are consolidated on an average of 10 years; whether it will be in the power of County Councils to apply the whole of the grant in aid for the reduction of the local rate falling to be paid by the landlords; and whether it is or is not possible to give any relief to householders whose rents are under £4?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): I have been asked to reply to this question. The rates which are levied by the County Councils are County General Assessment, Police, Registration of Voters, Lunacy, Militia, Sheriff Court-houses, Road, and Public Health. With the exception of the last two, these rates were all, prior to the Local Government Act of last year, paid by owners only, and under the provisions of that Act they continued to be paid by owners only up to the average of the last 10 years. Above that average they are paid equally by owners and occupiers, and the Road and Public Health Rates have always been, and continue to be, paid by owners and occupiers equally. The determination of the specific local rates levied by County Councils to which the additional grant may be applied is left entirely to the Councils themselves. It would be in the power of the County Councils to select for relief a rate which, up to the average of the last 10 years, will continue to be paid by owners only. It would, on the other hand, be equally open to a County Council to select for relief a rate payable half by owners and half by occupiers. With reference to the last paragraph, the hon. Gentleman seems to have overlooked the fact that, as regards county rates, there is no exemption of ratepayers under £4, except on the ground of individual poverty, and, accordingly, the relief from the rates will be equally beneficial to them as to all others.

SALE OF BILLS AND TELEGRAPH TRANSFERS IN INDIA.

MR. J. A. CAMPBELL (Glasgow and Aberdeen Universities), on behalf of Mr. JARVIS: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India what were the sales by the Indian Council of bills and telegraphic transfers during the months of March, April, and May, of this year, and also the sales during the corresponding months of last year?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): The sales of bills and transfers during March, April, and May this year were Rs.8,29,00,000, against Rs.6,55,48,015 in the corresponding months of 1889.

INDIAN EXCHEQUER AND THE RATE OF EXCHANGE.

MR. CALEB WRIGHT (Lancashire, S.W., Leigh): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India by what amount in sterling does the Indian Exchequer benefit by an advance in exchange of one penny per rupee per annum; and if the Indian Council is not receiving for bills at the present time 3d. per rupee more than was obtained when silver was selling at 3s. 6d. per ounce or under; and, if not, 3d. per rupee, how much is the present rate higher than the lowest rate?

SIR J. GORST: The gain produced by the rise of 1d. varies with the rate of exchange. The gain by a rise from 1s. 6d. to 1s. 7d. is Rs.1,100,000. Council bills are fetching 3d. per rupee more than when silver was at 3s. 6d. per ounce.

Mr. J. P. B. Robertson

MR. CALEB WRIGHT: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered the second part of the question.

SIR J. GORST: The answer to the second part of the question is, Yes.

IRELAND—GOREY CONSPIRACY CASE.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the attention of the Irish Government has been drawn to the charge of the Lord Chief Baron in the "Gorey Conspiracy Case" at the Wicklow Assizes, and to his Lordship's declaration of law, namely, that no person in the absence of contract was bound to deal or trade with anyone against his own will; that any attempt to press the Criminal Law, so as to force people to deal with others against their will, was against the law, and must lead to nothing but confusion; and that this principle as to individual traders was applicable to traders acting in combination, provided that such combinations were voluntary and not inspired by a malicious desire to inflict unnecessary harm; whether, since the passing of the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act of 1887, numbers of persons in Ireland have been convicted by Resident Magistrates, and sentenced to terms of imprisonment, with or without hard labour, for what the Lord Chief Baron has now declared to be lawful; whether the number of persons so convicted and imprisoned can be approximately stated; how many persons are now in prison in Ireland upon convictions contrary to the law as declared by the Lord Chief Baron; whether they will now be set at liberty; whether any compensation will be made to them; and whether the Irish Government will inform the Resident Magistrates of the state of the law?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: All the information at present at my disposal upon this subject is derived from the newspapers; but I have no antecedent grounds for doubting the substantial accuracy of the hon. Gentleman's version of a portion of the Chief Baron's charge. With regard to the latter part of the question, I have to say that no persons in Ireland have been convicted for any proceeding which the Lord Chief Baron now declares to be lawful; but that, on the contrary, it appears to me the Lord Chief Baron has, in his charge, given emphatic sanction to the views as to the law of criminal conspiracy which have been hitherto taken by Resident Magistrates, County Court Judges, and (on case stated) by the Superior Courts.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask whether it is not the fact that in the Kanturk, Killeagh, and other cases, men have been sent to prison for boycotting, against whom there was no evidence of compulsion or malice; and whether Mr. J. Fitzgibbon, who has been three times sent to prison, has been imprisoned for refusing to sell a necessary of life—namely, an ostrich feather, to the wife of a land-grabber?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I emphatically dissent from every statement made by the hon. Member, but it is impossible to re-argue the question now, at question time.

MR. DILLON: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, in the case of the two men acquitted by the jury in the Gorey case, after the charge of the Lord Chief Baron, the Government will consider the question of indemnifying the men for the great expenses to which they have been put by this groundless prosecution?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, Sir, it would be contrary to all precedent.

MR. SEXTON: Do I understand the right hon. Gentleman to say that no one is in prison now in Ireland for having refused to sell, no evidence of malice having been produced at the trial?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: My statement is that nobody is now in prison in Ireland who is not guilty of an offence described by the Lord Chief Baron as an offence against the law.

MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): The right hon. Gentleman promised to lay this very important charge upon the Table.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am in communication with the Lord Chief Baron now.

POSTAL COMMUNICATION WITH CYPRUS.

ADMIRAL FIELD (Sussex, Eastbourne): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the Secretary of State has considered the question of improved postal communication with Cyprus, in view of the earnest representation—

tations made from time to time by the merchants and residents of the island, by special petition to this House and otherwise; whether, since the subsidised mailservice has been discontinued, it takes 12 and often 13 or more days for letters to reach the island, instead of six and a half days whilst the mail contract was in force; whether complaints have reached him that the abolition of the regular mail service has had a serious effect upon the trade of the island, and with this country especially; whether he is aware that it has been proposed to remit the "light and port dues" in Larnaca and Limasol to any line of steamers running direct, and under postal contract, with a weekly mail from Egypt, in lieu of a regular subsidy; and whether he will confer with the Postmaster General on the subject, with a view to inviting tenders on this basis, and thus obtain a great service and benefit for the island at no cost to its exchequer?

BARON H. DE WORMS: The question of improved postal communication with Cyprus has, at various times, occupied the attention of Secretaries of State, but not lately, as the present arrangements are considered as satisfactory as the financial resources of the island will admit. It does take from 11 to 13 days for letters to reach the island. The time formerly occupied was usually about six and a half or seven days; but the connection with the Brindisi express sometimes failed. As regards the third paragraph of the question, no such complaints have reached the Colonial Office for a long time; and as trade and shipping Returns show an increase, it is not probable that such complaints will be made. With respect to the concluding paragraphs, we have not had any such proposals made to us by any shipowner to perform a weekly direct service on these terms. If such a proposal is made it will receive attentive consideration.

ASSAULT ON A SUPERIOR OFFICER.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether a soldier named Lee was last year a prisoner in Derry Gaol, undergoing a sentence of two years with hard labour, for having committed a violent assault upon his superior officer, by a Judge in a Court of Justice ; and whether he is confined in Derry Gaol, or whether he has been removed, and to what other prison ?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I shall be obliged if the hon. Gentleman will defer the question.

GRENADIER GUARDS.

MR. CONYBEARE: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he will lay before Parliament the defaulter sheets of the men belonging to the 2nd battalion Grenadier Guards who have been sentenced by a Court Martial to prolonged terms of imprisonment with hard labour ?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (MR. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): No, Sir; I do not think that any useful purpose would be served by their production.

MR. CONYBEARE: I did not ask whether any useful purpose would be served, but whether, for our information, the right hon. Gentleman would lay the defaulter sheets before us. I would ask him whether he is aware that the sentence of two years' imprisonment inflicted on one of the men is the same punishment as that which has been inflicted on a soldier named Lee for a violent assault on his superior officer ?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I have no information on the subject referred to. I am perfectly clear it would not be advisable to lay the defaulter sheets before the House.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): I beg to ask whether the character of the men punished has not been exceedingly good hitherto ?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: Any circumstances of that kind would, no doubt, be taken into consideration by the Court Martial.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he, as Secretary for War, knows whether the characters of the men punished were good or bad up to this time ?

MR. DILLON: May I ask whether the fact of a soldier having a good character and long service is considered as a ground for increasing the severity of his sentence ?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: No, Sir; certainly not.

Mr. Conybeare

MR. CONYBEARE: May I ask if we are to understand that conduct such as that which has been punished in this case is to be placed on a par with the much graver offence of violently assaulting a superior officer, which is visited with similar punishment ?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: No, Sir.

MINERS' DISEASE IN CORNWALL.

MR. CONYBEARE: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has yet received from Mr. Pinching his written Report on the prevalence of Miners' Disease among the miners of Cornwall; whether he will lay it upon the Table when he has got it; whether he can state upon what evidence, taken since 1888, the Government have decided to introduce legislation to deal with the question; and whether such legislative proposals are to be based upon the opinion of Mr. Pinching that, except for omission on the part of the miners, there is no danger from this form of disease, the ventilation and general arrangements of the mines being, in his opinion, all that can be desired ?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (MR. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): Yes, Sir; I have received the Report I asked for from the Inspector as to the alleged insanitary condition of the mines in Cornwall. I will send a copy to the hon. Member, but I do not propose to lay it on the Table of the House. The Government have not been moved by fresh evidence since 1888 to contemplate legislation with regard to metalliferous mines. Early in that year the Inspectors, at my request, furnished me with suggestions for improving the general efficiency of the existing Act, and, among other things, for securing better ventilation and lessening the dangers from ladder-climbing. With respect to these last two matters, I am glad to say that a greatly improved state of things now exists.

MR. CONYBEARE: I would ask the right hon. Gentleman if he will consider the propriety of granting me Return No. 6, for which I have a Motion on the Paper? I will not press for a reply now, but will repeat the question on a future occasion.

THE GOVERNMENT AND THE BISLEY RANGES.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if, having regard to the national and educational work of the National Rifle Association, to the fact that the Bisley Ranges have been lent for several weeks to the Aldershot Division for volley firing, and also to the difficulty experienced in raising from the public funds, found in other countries for like purposes by the State, Her Majesty's Government will consider the recommendation of a grant to the Association sufficient to cover the unavoidable cost of its move from Wimbledon to Bisley from the extra money at its disposal from the increased taxation on alcohol?

MR. GOSCHEN: The answers I have already given with regard to the allocation of this money will make it clear that I cannot undertake to submit to Parliament the proposal suggested by the hon. Member.

SCOTLAND AND THE LOCAL TAXATION BILL.

MR. BUCHANAN: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the amount of residue to be given to the County and Town Councils in Scotland under his Amendments to Clause 2 of the Local Taxation (Customs and Excise Duties) Bill, and what sums will be given to Edinburgh, Glasgow, Dundee, and Aberdeen under his proposal?

*MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: Perhaps the hon. Member will allow me to answer the question. The amount to be given to the County and Town Councils in Scotland under the Amendments referred to in the question will be about £49,000. The proportions payable to the four towns named will probably be respectively: Edinburgh about £4,600; Glasgow about £7,200; Dundee about £1,400; Aberdeen about £1,100.

THE STRENGTH OF THE GUARDS.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he will grant the Return as to the strength of the Guards, of which notice appears on to-day's Paper?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I am unable to grant the Return asked for by the hon. Member; but I have no objection to tell him that the number of men in the different battalions of the Guards in London was by the last Return:—1st Battalion Grenadier Guards, 789 of all ranks; 2nd Battalion Grenadier Guards, 809 of all ranks; 1st Battalion Coldstream Guards, 693 of all ranks; 1st Battalion Scots Guards, 699 of all ranks; 2nd Battalion Scots Guards, 710 of all ranks. The establishment of the bands is, in the Grenadier Guards, 60; in the Coldstream Guards and Scots Guards, 40; but, in addition to these numbers, acting bandsmen are appointed, whose numbers vary from time to time.

THE GWYLLWYS SETT STONE QUARRY.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE (Carnarvon, &c.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the Commissioners of Woods and Forests have granted a lease of the Gwyllwys Sett Stone Quarry, in the parish of Pistyll, Carnarvonshire; if so, to whom, for what term, and subject to what dead rent and royalties; whether such a lease contains any proviso for re-entry in the event of the quarry not being worked for a certain time; and if there be such a provision, whether it has been enforced?

A LORD OF THE TREASURY (Sir H. MAXWELL, Wigton): I am informed that negotiations are in progress for the grant of a lease of the quarry referred to, but no lease has been granted. The lease, if granted, will contain a provision for re-entry in the event of the quarry not being worked.

THE CENSUS.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether, in the tabulation of the statistics of the Census, he will direct that a compilation shall be made of the number of children of school age under the Elementary Education Acts?

*MR. RITCHIE: The question whether the ages of children between 10 and 15 years should be separately shown in the Census Returns, instead of the children being included in one group, was considered by the Census Committee; but they did not deem it necessary to recommend that this should be done, the views of the Registrar General's Department being distinctly opposed to the proposal.

MR. THOMAS ELLIS (Merionethshire): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that School Boards are constantly put to large expense by the making of these local inquiries in conformity with the regulations of the Education Department, and, in view of this expenditure and in the interest of public education, will he re-consider this matter, and have a separate heading for school children on the Census Paper?

*MR. RITCHIE: I have not come to any decision on the matter. The question only appeared on the Paper to-day. We have given effect to the Report of the Census Committee, but it is quite open to us to re-consider the matter in regard to school children.

RESIGNATION OF COLONEL MAITLAND.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he has observed that Colonel Maitland, of the Grenadier Guards, wrote to the papers to say that he had not resigned; if Colonel Maitland has, nevertheless, been treated as having resigned, and is retired on half-pay; and if that step is the result of an inquiry showing that Colonel Maitland is so much in fault as to justify his removal, or is a mere temporary removal, leaving the officer eligible for future employment?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: Colonel Maitland, after writing to the papers saying that he had not resigned, re-considered the matter, and voluntarily tendered his unreserved resignation, which was accepted, and, accordingly, he has been placed on half-pay.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: May I ask whether the inquiry showed that the mutiny of the Guards was due to the harsh conduct of Colonel Maitland?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I have already stated that I think it would be contrary to the interests of the Public Service to say what the inquiry showed.

THE GUARDS AND FOREIGN SERVICE.

SIR G. TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether it is the intention of the Government that the Guards shall henceforward take their turn of foreign service with the rest of the Army?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: No, Sir.

APPOINTMENTS IN THE POST OFFICE.

MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he will consider the advisability of taking the right of nomination to certain appointments in the Postal Services out of the hands of the Patronage Secretary to the Treasury, and of placing all such appointments in the hands of the Department that is responsible for the efficient administration of the Service in question?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): The question is one that is receiving the consideration of the Government, with the view of securing efficient administration.

NAVAL ADMINISTRATION.

ADMIRAL MAYNE: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he will take care that an opportunity shall be offered, before it is too late in the Session, for the discussion of that part of the Royal Commission on Naval and Military Administration which relates to the Navy, as to which, so far, no opportunity has occurred?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I hope that such an opportunity may arise; but in the present condition of business, I am not able to name any day for the discussion of the subject.

FEMALE TYPISTS IN GOVERNMENT OFFICES.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the permission given by the Treasury to Departments of the Civil Service to employ female typists is, or will be, conditional on the Department publicly announcing the intention to appoint such persons, and on its making the appointments after competitive examination of the candidates; or whether, in introducing female typists into the Service, the Government propose to recognise a return to the system of appointment by private patronage without examination by the Civil Service Commissioners, notwithstanding such a system has long since been practically abolished as regards the appointment of men?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The employment of female typists has been as yet experimental, and Departments have made their own selection of typists. There is little doubt that this form of labour will be generally adopted in the Public Service, and the Treasury will have to consider the general conditions under which female typists will be employed.

MALTESE MARRIAGE LAW.

MR. SUMMERS: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury at what date it was first made known to the Authorities in this country that the marriages of Protestants with one another and of Protestants with Roman Catholics in Malta were contrary to law, unless celebrated according to the form established by the Council of Trent?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: In 1865 by the Crown Advocate of Malta, who is now Chief Justice; but (1), as regards marriages between non-Roman Catholics under licence from the Governor or Bishops, or otherwise, he advised that they had received a degree of recognition which constituted a consuetudo abrogatoria, and were, in his opinion, valid; and (2), as regards marriages between a Roman Catholic and a non-Roman Catholic, he advised that they could only be legally celebrated by a Roman Catholic priest in accordance with the forms of the Council of Trent.

MR. SUMMERS: I would ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether his attention has been called to a letter, dated 24th June, 1890, from a gentleman signing himself "Wesleyan Minister," addressed to the Chief Secretary to the Government at Malta, complaining that he had recently been refused a licence to perform a "mixed marriage," on the ground that one of the parties was a Roman Catholic, although licence to perform such marriages had never hitherto been refused, and asking whether the Governor will continue to issue licences for the performance of mixed marriages; and what answer, if any, has been returned to this letter?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The attention of Her Majesty's Government has not been drawn to the letter in question, of which the Colonial Office have no knowledge.

GUNPOWDER LICENCES IN IRELAND.

MR. SEXTON (for Mr. T. M. HEALY): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he will explain why it is that Messrs. Felix Keirans & Co., a Catholic firm of iron-mongers, have been refused a licence to sell gunpowder by the Clones Commissioners on the ground that the firm also held a spirit licence; whether the Commissioners granted a gunpowder licence to J. C. Deiring & Co., Clones, a Protestant firm, who also hold a spirit licence; and do the police object to Messrs. Keirans getting a gunpowder licence?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The ground of refusal appears to have been not that indicated in the question, but the want of proper accommodation for storing the powder. The police have no personal objection in the matter.

MR. JUSTICE HARRISON'S CHARGE AT GALWAY ASSIZES.

MR. DILLON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland whether he is now prepared to read the statement of Mr. Justice Harrison at the recent Galway Assizes?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The statement is really a private letter addressed to myself, which perhaps the House will not object to my reading. It is in these terms—

"July 23.

"Sir,—I returned from the Galway Assizes last night. I observed in the Times' report of the proceedings in the House of Commons on Monday evening that you expressed the wish that I would send you an account of my charge at the recent Galway Assizes. I beg to state that my charge was not committed to writing, nor have I any note of it. The official documents before me showed that a great many outrages were reported from the East Riding of the County Galway, in none of which had any person been made amenable, including the following, namely:—Attempt to murder by explosives, firing at the police, firing into a dwelling-house, arson (three cases), intimidation, killing and maiming cattle, malicious injuries to property, threatening notices, &c., and I was also informed by the Police Authorities that intimidation and lawlessness prevailed to such an extent in certain districts that it was deemed expedient to resort to the course there hitherto unknown of having night patrols of police across country, in place of the ordinary patrols along the roads, with a view, if possible, to check the system of intimidation, &c., which prevailed. Under these circumstances, and feeling very strongly for the people who were the sufferers, I used at the moment the words 'Lynch law' as reported, but I did not use them in the sense imputed, namely, that lives should be taken, or as an invitation to murder certain individuals in the county, and I am quite certain that my words were not so understood. I believe that my language, though not felicitously chosen, was understood in the meaning intended to be conveyed by me—that it was surprising that the people in the district referred to had not the moral courage openly to assert themselves against the system of intimidation and outrage by which it was sought to terrorise them. This is the meaning in which my words were spoken, and in this sense I believe they were understood."

MR. DILLON: The learned Judge has not in that statement repudiated the language which I find all the Irish newspapers agree in reporting. Under these circumstances I beg to give notice to the Government that I shall put a notice on the Paper to-night impugning the conduct and language of the learned Judge, and on Monday next I shall ask the Government for an opportunity of discussing that question.

MR. SEXTON: I would ask whether there was anything in the Assize Calendar or the Police Reports which justifies a departure from the ordinary course in the Judge's charge?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think I ought to have notice of that question. No doubt with regard to a relatively large area in County Galway intimidation and outrage do prevail.

PUBLIC BUSINESS.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.): May I ask the Leader of the House of Commons what course the Government intend to take in regard to Order No. 9—the Local Taxation (Customs and Excise) Duties Bill?

MR. DILLON: Before that is answered, I would ask if the Government can give an undertaking that Order No. 4—that is the Report of Supply of 16th July—will be taken to-night at 11 o'clock?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: We take the Second Reading of the Anglo-German Agreement Bill first, and the rest of the Orders as they appear on the Paper. The Report of Supply referred to will be taken to-night if reached by 11 o'clock, which I hope will be the case, and if the House is in Committee of Supply at that hour the Government will report Progress for that purpose. The Local Taxation Bill will not be taken to-night.

MR. DILLON: I would venture to urge on the right hon. Gentleman the extreme inconvenience of the course he proposes to take. He hopes it may be possible to reach the 4th Order by 11 o'clock. Everyone knows the right hon. Gentleman can reach it if he chooses to do so. I have remained here four nights in the hope that the Order would be reached before 11 o'clock, but it never has been. I would ask for an undertaking that the Order will be taken to-night at 11 o'clock.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am not sure that I am in a position to give that undertaking. It is desired that the Anglo-German Agreement Bill may be read a second time, and at what hour the discussion on that Bill will terminate of course I cannot say.

MR. SEXTON: I desire to ask what course the Government propose to take with regard to the Juvenile Offenders Bill, which has come from the House of Lords? There are circumstances, I may say, which will render it necessary for the Irish Members to offer strenuous opposition to the application of the measure to Ireland.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: If the Irish Members desire it Ireland will be excluded from the operation of the Juvenile Offenders Bill.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): If the Second Reading of the Anglo-German Agreement Bill is taken to-night will the Committee stage be taken on Monday?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: That will be so.

POLICE (SCOTLAND) BILL.

Reported from the Select Committee, with Minutes of Evidence and an Appendix.

Report to lie upon the Table, and to be printed. [No. 324.]

Bill re-committed to a Committee of the Whole House for Monday next, and to be printed. [Bill 398.]

COAL MINES (EXPLOSIONS).

Address for—

"Return showing, with regard to Coal Mines in the United Kingdom, the number, for the last 10 years, of fatal explosions of which notice was required to be given under Section 39 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act of 1872, or under Section 35 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act of 1887, the number of lives lost, and, where such information was included in the notice, or otherwise conveyed to the Inspectors, and is still preserved, the approximate hour of the shift when the explosion occurred, in the following form:—

Name of colliery.	Date of Explosion.	Number of lives lost.	Approximate hour of shift when Explosion occurred.

—(Mr. Fenwick.)

CYPRUS (ENFORCED SALES).

Address for—

"Return showing the number of Enforced Sales of Property in the island of Cyprus for the years 1887, 1888, and 1889 (a) at the instance of the Island Government, and (b) at the instance of private parties."—(Mr. Arthur O'Connor.)

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

ANGLO-GERMAN AGREEMENT BILL
[LORDS.]—(No. 393.)

SECOND READING. [ADJOURNED DEBATE.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [24th July], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

And which Amendment was, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months,"—(Mr. Phillips),—instead thereof.

Question again proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

Debate resumed.

*(5.28.) MR. F. S. STEVENSON (Suffolk, Eye): The greater portion of the Debate last night was occupied by the discussion of a very intricate and important question relating to a constitutional innovation which the Government have brought about by the way they decided to present this measure to the House. Into the merits or demerits of that course it is not my intention to enter to-night, but this I would point out, that if the Government were right—and I do not say they were—in presenting a Bill to this House, it was their bounden duty to take what opportunity they could to enable the fullest possible discussion to be had on the measure. As there was an important constitutional question to be discussed, it was only at a comparatively late hour of the evening that it was possible for the House to address itself to the merits of the proposed arrangement with Germany. Under the circumstances, it appears to me that the course adopted by the First Lord of the Treasury last night in attempting to close the Debate on an arrangement which involves the destinies of half a continent, was very much mistaken, and one to be strongly deprecated. I trust that no such attempt will be made to-night, looking at the large number of Members who are interested in the matter. The immediate interest is, no doubt, connected with the cession of Heligoland, and on that question there are, no doubt, two questions that force themselves upon our attention. The first is, whether the consent of the inhabitants of the island has been obtained to the proposed cession. We are told the Government have made informal and confidential inquiries, but no attempt, apparently, has been made to take, directly or indirectly, the sense of the inhabitants upon the question. The opinion of observers and visitors to the island differ very greatly. One gentleman who called on the Under Secretary yesterday gave him one version, but other gentlemen have given totally different versions as to the opinions of the inhabitants. It seems to me that to hand over territory to a foreign Power without first obtaining a clear expression of opinion from the inhabitants is to establish a very bad precedent. But there is a second point connected with the cession of Heligoland as to which we are entitled to ask for some explanation. There is reason to believe, from the German military newspapers, that the first act of the German Government will be to construct upon the ceded island extensive and very strong fortifications. A very important article appeared yesterday morning in the Kreuz Zeitung. The article opened by saying that the appearance of the article had been delayed until yesterday, because they wished the Second Reading of this Bill to have been passed in the House of Commons before the publication. The information possessed by the publishers of the newspaper as to the doings of the House of Commons appeared to be very faulty. The article went on to attach the greatest importance to the proposed cession of Heligoland, and to admit that the German Press had minimised the importance of the proposed cession of Heligoland in order that the German Government might make a better bargain in South Africa. I hold that the quid pro quo obtained for our concessions is inadequate. In the event of war between Germany and some other Power Heligoland would be of vast importance to the former. Therefore, in return for the island we ought to obtain more than we shall under the Agreement. In Africa we are to have the Protectorate of Zanzibar, but that does not amount to very much. The Protectorate will only be over the islands of Zanzibar and Pemba. Formerly this country enjoyed far greater influence on the East Coast of Africa than it will have under this Agreement, for, before the Treaty of 1886, when Sir John Kirk was the keeper of the conscience of Sultan Seyyid Bargash, the influence of this country in East Africa was paramount. The events of the last few years show, what the Government no doubt will admit, that the influence of England on the East Coast of Africa is not what it was five, six, or seven years ago. It seems to me that we are getting back very much less than we actually possessed before. Before we acquire the Protectorate of Zanzibar we have to consult France. We are glad to hear that France is entering into the negotiations in a thoroughly friendly spirit, but surely it would have been more advantageous to this country if we had consulted France at the time of the negotiations with Germany than to arrange with her subsequently. Then, again, there is another point of importance connected with East and Central Africa, and that is that one result of the Agreement will be the perpetuation in Africa of the separation between the British sphere of influence in the north and the British sphere of influence in the south. It will be impossible to get from Lake Tanganyika to the Victoria Nyanza without passing through German territory. A concession from Germany which would have had the effect of preventing this undesirable state of things ought, if possible, to have been obtained. The Agreement should also be considered in its relation to the future development of Southern Africa. There will inevitably, at a no very distant date, be a large influx of British people into Cape Colony, and then it will be necessary to make a new Agreement with Germany with respect to the territories near Walfisch Bay, and we shall be unable to obtain as favourable terms as we might have obtained now. The relations of Germany with South Africa may very likely, in the course of not many years, undergo a great change in consequence of the increase of the area of the German Empire in Europe. The English framers of the Agreement do not appear to have considered what will be the effect upon the course of events in South Africa of the incorporation of the Kingdom of Holland with Germany. In that event, Germany will obtain Amsterdam and Rotterdam, 40,000 able seamen, and all the Dutch colonies, and her interest in the affairs of South Africa will be enormously increased. One would suppose that the commercial interest in Germany connected with the colonies is of so strong and potent a character as to be able to dictate to the Government what course to adopt. As a matter of fact, the German commercial interest in South Africa has been dwindling for some years past. The Report of the German Colonial Society was published a day or two ago, and I noticed from it that, during the last year, no fewer than 1,700 gentlemen have ceased to be members, owing to default in the payment of subscriptions. Her Majesty's Government should have looked ahead when making to Germany a very considerable concession in the shape of Heligoland. They ought to have obtained a more fortunate arrangement in Africa, from our own point of view. The Government have not obtained the best bargain they could have obtained. No doubt the Agreement is an honest attempt to arrive at a good understanding with Germany, but when any impartial observer looks at the details, he cannot but be struck with the fact that England has not obtained the treatment she might have been able to obtain, and which, undoubtedly, she would have obtained if she had pressed with greater emphasis the claims of the British colonists in South Africa, and if also she had laid greater stress on the importance of Heligoland to Germany, and the regret this country felt at parting with the possession. On these grounds I intend to support the proposal of the hon. Member for Mid Lanark (Mr. Philipps). There was no immediate necessity for an Agreement of this kind. If more favourable terms could have been obtained next year, next year would have done equally well for the making of the Agreement. Surely the people of England and the colonial subjects of the Queen have a right to expect that greater attention would have been paid to their interests in this matter, and that, in view of the influx of a British population into Africa in times to come, greater care would have been taken to maintain unimpaired the interest we have in that country, and to render possible the free development of their energy in that continent. On these grounds I find it necessary to support the Amendment of my hon. Friend. If the Agreement be regarded by the present Government as a final settlement, I think the condemnation it deserves is certainly more severe than any I have endeavoured to pass upon it. But I cannot believe that the Agreement is intended by the Government to be a final settlement of the difficulty. There is no pressing necessity for arriving at an understanding of this kind. The question can wait for a more adequate and a more favourable solution, and I think that, in view of the attitude the German Press is adopting now, it sees that the House of Commons has practically passed the Agreement, the Government may be fairly called upon to consider whether it is not possible to amend the Treaty by subsequent Agreements, dealing with particular parts.

*(5.53.) ADMIRAL MAYNE (Pembroke and Haverfordwest): The question has been divided into two parts, the cession of Heligoland and the advantage we have gained, or otherwise, in Africa. I have been greatly surprised at the views expressed in the House as to the little island of Heligoland. It has been said that the Germans would probably make it a powerful fortification, while one hon. Member has applied to it the title of the Gibraltar of the Baltic. I believe that the gentleman who took the island, in the days before steam, did so describe it, but I also believe that not a single person who is capable of judging would now consider such a title as anything but ludicrous. How can this little island at the entrance to a German river be compared to the gate of the Mediterranean, through which all the traffic to the East must pass? Is England prepared to fortify this island? We have it on the authority of Sir John Coode that it would cost at least £1,000,000 to make a harbour there, and at least £2,000,000 would be required to fortify it. Is any hon. Gentleman prepared seriously to propose to the House that England should fortify the place—an island at the entrance to a German river—considering the present relations between the two countries? If not a casus belli, it would at least be the nearest thing to it. The Germans may possibly fortify it to satisfy their feelings of pride and vanity, but they will never do so with the view of holding it in war against us. The possession of the island would have no bearing on a war between this country and Germany. The loss or gain of Heligoland would bring neither country to its knees. A passing ship might amuse itself with a little target practice. It would probably throw half a dozen shells into the place for a morning's entertainment, and, if the Teuton showed his usual sense, he would as promptly as possible get into his steam launch and make for the nearest port on the mainland. It would be an utterly useless risk of life for any Government to attempt to hold it in the face of a superior fleet. The island would be treated in the way that all such islands have invariably been treated in time of war. They are held by that country which has the biggest fleet in the adjacent waters. If we went to war with Germany we should hold the island if we wanted it, so long as we had a superior fleet in the vicinity, as we held Belle Isle, Houat and Hoëdié off Quiberon Bay, Diamond Rock off Martinique, and other islands during the war with France. In that way we should hold it, and in that way will the Germans or any other people hold it if they have a superior naval force. I have never heard a single officer of any rank or position say that Heligoland is of any real value to us, or that we should attempt to hold it if we went to war. We could not attempt to hold the island without a powerful fleet, and nobody could possibly take it from us if we had a superior fleet. If a difficulty arose an enemy would be able to find refuge easily in neutral waters, and the necessity of keeping a constant watch would be a source of endless trouble to us. The hon. and gallant Member quoted the words of admiration used by Mr. H. M. Stanley for Lord Salisbury when the details of the Treaty were made known, and he said that Captain Cameron, another distinguished authority, claimed the arrangement to be a moral and territorial gain to the British Government, and expressed his opinion that the House and the British public would value the opinions of those gentlemen more than those who had given contrary opinions in the House. German influence has for some time existed in Africa, and it ill becomes hon. Gentlemen opposite, whose policy in Africa has never been of the boldest, to upbraid the present Government for parting with what had really been parted with before they came into power. The whole Treaty is well summed up by the German opinion that the "Agreement is a Treaty of Peace of all the more gratifying kind because it has been preceded by no struggle, and because it secures the continuance of friendly relations between Great Britain and the German Empire for an incalculable length of time." I confidently believe that a very large majority of the House will vote for the Bill.

Admiral Mayne

(6.15.) MR. ATHERLEY-JONES (Durham, N.W.): I am prepared at once frankly to admit that I hail with great satisfaction the course which has been adopted by the Government in reducing to the form of a Bill a sanction which has hitherto been absolutely ineffective; and I am not to be deterred from giving my approval thereto by the consideration that that power is to be exercised co-equally with the other House of Parliament. The right accorded to the House of Commons of exercising an effective control over Treaty-making is entirely in accordance with the principles which obtain in all democratic and all constitutionally-governed countries. It is a curious fact that in the United States whenever a cession of territory is made the assent not only of the Senate but of the House of Representatives also is required. I turn now to those questions which, after all, are of more practical importance. In the first place, there is the question of Heligoland; with regard to that question, I am bound to say that I think the Government would have done well if they had departed from an old-established precedent, and had established another by obtaining the sanction of the inhabitants to the cession. I will ask the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs whether the Government have taken the trouble to investigate the precedents in the case? According to all eminent jurists it is not only the universal practice, but a condition of absolute necessity, that in such a case the opinion of the inhabitants should be obtained. The gallant Admiral (Admiral Mayne) has spoken of the little importance of Heligoland, but he sedulously avoided committing himself to any opinion as to what it might become as a possession of Germany. According to German experts, there is good ground for believing that, by the expenditure of £1,000,000, or more, Germany may establish Naval Dockyards in the island, which would contribute very much to enhance her maritime power. However, I am bound to admit that it is of great importance that we should cultivate friendly relations with Germany. Germany is the natural ally of England, and as has been pointed out by the hon. Member for Aberdeen (Mr. Bryce), there has been no occasion on which this country has been brought into conflict with Germany. I cannot forget that there are troubles with France looming in the not distant future in relation to a portion of the East over which we exercise Suzerain Powers. Previous to 1884 we were practically supreme in Africa, with the exception of the Portuguese possessions. Before that year Germany practically had not made any lodgment in Africa. In 1884, in the Secretaryship of Lord Derby, we made the first concession to Germany. It was contrary to the wish of the German Emperor and of Prince Bismarck that Germany embarked in the business of colonisation. In 1884 we deliberately abandoned the right of exercising a Protectorate over Swaziland, and let Germany in. In 1886, when Lord Granville was at the Colonial Office, the German Colonisation Committee, under Dr. Peters, came and allotted the land lying to the West of Zanzibar. Representations of the strongest character were made to Lord Granville by Sir J. Kirk, and by the Sultan of Zanzibar, who complained that the action of those German exploiters was an infringement of his sovereignty. The reply of Lord Granville was that we could not interfere with a friendly Power in what we believed would be a useful work of colonisation, tending to the benefit of the African people, and to the spread of civilisation throughout Africa. Therefore, Her Majesty's Government found themselves in a position which, whether rightly or wrongly, was formed for them by their predecessors, and they were bound to make an arrangement which would be for the interest of all parties. With regard to Heligoland, I hope before the final settlement that Her Majesty's Government will take the wishes of the people into consideration, as was done in the case of the cession by England to France of the islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon, on the coast of Newfoundland. Personally, I am prepared to support the policy of Her Majesty's Government on this question of the Agreement, which I am glad to find has obtained general approval.

(6.30.) MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry): I do not intend to touch upon the constitutional question. I think it is fortunate that the German Debate took place last night, because it afforded the Government an opportunity of stating their case. But the Government have avoided stating the case with respect to the Cape Colony and South Africa altogether. Several Ministers have spoken, and the Representative of the Colonial Office occasionally entered the House and walked out again. The Government appear to consider that South Africa and our greatest colony there have nothing whatever to do with the matter. Will the Government continue to maintain to the end that secrecy with regard to the opinions of the people on the spot, and is the House of Commons to be asked to pass this Bill without knowing what their fellow-subjects in South Africa think on the question? I know what men of business think, and their opinion is universally adverse to this Anglo-German Treaty. [Cries of "No!"] I wish to know whether the Government can bring forward proofs of acquiescence on the part of our South African fellow-subjects in the Agreement? Under the Agreement, all that is given is to be supplied by South Africa, with the exception of Heligoland. Our colonists complain that the great territories of South Africa are now outflanked on the West and on the North; that they are blocked; that a trade route is handed over to Germany from the West Coast right across and touching the Zambesi. They also complain that traders who are British subjects in that country are not very well treated by the Germans. We give up Heligoland, and allow the Germans to stretch their frontier, but we do not insist that the question of the delimitation of Walfisch Bay shall be contained in the Agreement; on the contrary, we leave that question an open one. I ask the Under Secretary for the Colonies to lay before the House the information which he possesses from the Cape Government, or to tell the House the purport of the communications between the Colonial Office and the Cape Government on this subject. It appears to me that the colonists will say, "We have no recognition of our claims; we are not even allowed to make a statement of our claims; the statement of our case is suppressed by the official Department which is bound to protect and to assert the claims and the rights of the colonists." I fear that if the colonists find that they cannot get a sufficient representation through the ordinary official sources they will demand some more reliable channel of communication with the Government and the House. We are in danger of giving up, for the friendship of Germany, the affection of our colonists. Unless the Government can give an assurance of a re-consideration of the Agreement as regards South Africa, or unless they can state, as I hope may be the case, with authority that the opinion of our fellow-subjects on the spot in South Africa cordially supports the Agreement, I fear that it will be impossible for me to vote for the Bill as it stands.

*(6.50.) MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.): I think the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, after hearing speeches from his hon. Friends like the speech last delivered, must be inclined to exclaim with Sheridan, "Save me from my friends." I rejoice that the attempt to closure the Debate failed, because I maintain that two days are not too many for the consideration of such an important question. Now, I cannot help asking myself what would have been said of this Treaty had it been brought forward by a Liberal Government, and concluded and signed by a Liberal Ministry. There would have been an outcry raised by hon. Gentlemen opposite, who would have said that the Liberal Government were bartering away British interests, and selling their birthright for a mess of pottage. On the other hand, I cannot help thinking that there is something high-handed in the way in which two great Powers have proceeded to divide territory as large as three first-class European States, and to which they have no more right than I have to any umbrella or any coat to which I may take a fancy in the cloak-room. The whole effect of the Agreement really resolves itself into the question whether Heligoland is worth exchanging against Zanzibar. Military opinions are divided as to the value of Heligoland to Great Britain in time of war; but if the island is of small strategic value to this country, it is admitted to be of great strategic value to Germany, and that fact ought to weigh in a consideration of the Agreement. As to Zanzibar, the concessions to Great Britain in that direction are dependent on the consent of France, and that being so, this is really a tripartite Treaty, while there are only two signatories to the actual Treaty. I should be only too glad to hear that the remaining causes of friction and difficulty with France are to be finally settled, for there is no nation with which it is more important that Great Britain should be on friendly terms. But until I can learn more certainly that this will be the effect of the Treaty under discussion, I cannot vote with the Government, though, on the other hand, I do not feel justified in voting against the Bill, for to do this would be to assume a responsibility which rests, and ought to rest, with the Executive which is in power.

*(70.) SIR R. TEMPLE (Worcester, Evesham): After the wholesale, but somewhat diffuse, criticisms which have been indulged in by the Opposition, it seems to me to be high time that a Member on the Ministerial side of the House should rise to offer some defence of the African part of the Anglo-German Treaty. The right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down seemed never to strike home, but yet tried to wound the Government in every way, and last evening the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Aberdeen, and other Members on that side of the House, who seem to think and act with him, criticised the foreign arrangements of Her Majesty's Government in a style which to us on this side of the House was truly refreshing. That right hon. Gentleman seemed, during the greater part of his speech yesterday, to imply that a more spirited foreign policy should have been adopted by Her Majesty's Government, and that they had yielded too much to Germany and to France. According to him we have given in too much to Germany in Zanzibar; to France in the Australasian Archipelago; to Germany, again, at Samoa and other places in the Southern Seas. Yet no sooner is a policy adopted, which virtually means a standing up to perhaps the most formidable of all our rivals in Eastern and Central Africa, than the right hon. Gentleman begins to carp, cavil, and criticise, to disparage, belittle, and minimise all the advantages of the Anglo-German Agreement in Africa. That being the case, I hope the House will bear with me for a few moments while I strive to give a practical summary of the benefits which that Agreement seems to confer on the British Empire in Africa. The right hon. Gentleman observes that the territories in question are recognised as within the British sphere by Germany alone. Now, I feel sure that these territories are now actually taken over by England, and that she will keep her hold upon them as against any Power in the world. Again, he seems to consider that the territories within the red line are not annexed, and that we have only got freedom or immunity from German interference. But protection and annexation in a country like East Africa virtually mean the same thing. I venture to say that in all these regions there will be one manifest consequence of protection or annexation, namely, the conservation of all the rights of the natives in the land and in the produce thereof. Let me consider for a moment, in the briefest manner, some of the advantages of this Anglo-German Treaty. First as to Zanzibar. I quite admit that up to a very recent date England was supreme in Zanzibar, and in the neighbouring Island of Pemba. I know that for the reason that when I governed Bombay the trade in Zanzibar was financed from that great centre, and that my predecessors in the Government considered themselves as virtually the masters of the island. That may be all very true—it is, indeed, to the natives of India that the prosperity of Zanzibar is attributed, and is attributable. Why, the partition between the kinsmen, the Sultans of Muscat and Zanzibar, took place under British supervision. But if we have drifted into a very uncomfortable position there I rather think it began to happen during the time that the right hon. Gentleman who spoke last was in office; at all events, without saying whose fault it was, we must admit that we have allowed Germany to slide into a very dangerous position of competition and rivalry or participation with us in the supremacy at Zanzibar. All this will be terminated, England will be the sole protector, and her former supremacy is formally restored. Then the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down spoke of our relations with France in reference to Zanzibar. Well, as regards the relations it is obvious that all the Agreement we have entered into with France is to respect the independence of the Sultan; and that we do respect in the Agreement; but nothing has been said to France about a Joint Protectorate. The result of the Agreement with Germany will be that we shall have a true supremacy, and will never permit France nor any other Power to dispute it with us. Now, what is the position of Zanzibar? It has been described by our rivals as being the key, commercially and politically, of the whole eastern coast of Africa. Outside the British Dominions it is to us the sixth most important strategic point in the world, the other five being Gibraltar, Malta, Aden, Hongkong, and Singapore. *MA. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: I pointed out the great importance of Zanzibar.

*SIR R. TEMPLE: I am not saying that the right hon. Gentleman did not do so, but I say that on that point the right hon. Gentleman's observations were below par in that part of his description, however just it may have been in other respects. When it is said that we have not obtained a quid pro quo for the cession of Heligoland, I contend that we have got an island worth to us ten thousand Heligolands.

AN HON. MEMBER: We have not got it.

*SIR R. TEMPLE: We have got it, and in the event of any general disturbance we can make it a strategic point of vantage for England. The right hon. Gentleman, I think, also asked whether there was any point on the coast opposite to Zanzibar under British control. He contended that the coast opposite was under German control. That is indeed true, for the coast there is the German "Hinterland." But I ask the House to recollect that besides Zanzibar there is the Sister Island of Pemba which does come within the red line, as also does the coast line nearly opposite the north point of that island. From that coast we have a stretch of country extending 500 miles inland to the lake region at the head of the waters of the Nile; and, geographically, this is one of the most important positions in all Africa. In that region we have got a range of snow-clad mountains and a country fit for habitation by Europeans. No doubt we shall make settlements there, as we have done in the Himalayas. Besides all this, we have kept Germany out of two places within that region, where German influence would have been very inconvenient to us—namely, Uganda and Vitu. This alone is worth the cession of many islands like Heligoland. From this region northwards we take over the whole country right up the coast opposite Aden. Turning, again, far southward, I observe that the Stevenson Road comes well within the red line, and, although the width of the strip outside of it may appear to be very narrow on a small map, on the spot it will be a very appreciable belt of British territory, which can, if need be, be made a defensible frontier for us. This is certainly one of the most important lines of communication in Southern Africa, for it connects the Lake Nyassa with the Lake Tanganyika. It is around the shores of these lakes that our missionary posts and our commercial stations are situated. In addition to this, we have got Germany out of the whole region of the Shire and that portion of the lower valley and basin of the Zambesi. Lastly, I would refer to Damaraland, in the South-West corner of the area under this Agreement. The right hon. Gentleman opposite seemed to criticise our conduct in regard to that territory; but we should remember that in 1884, whether rightly or wrongly, we allowed Germany to assume the protectorate of all that land. When the history of that matter is looked into, it will not be found that our Party on this side of the House is at all responsible for it. But, still, the thing has happened, and what are we doing by this Agreement? My right hon. Friend below me (the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs) will correct me if I am wrong, but my belief is that Germany wanted to reach eastward as far as the 23rd deg. of east longitude, and we have kept her to the 20th deg., thereby saving three degrees of longitude for British interests, and surely that is something. Then, on the whole, I would ask the House to consider what is the sum of this Agreement. According to my reckoning, on the map this Anglo-German Agreement adds one million of square miles to the British Empire. This is a sensible addition to the eight or nine millions of square miles which that Empire has in all parts of the world. This new territory is fertile and capable, under British administration, of maintaining a vast population, of which every man, woman, and child will be consumers of British manufactures. That is something as a prospect for trade. Again, the Agreement secures all the rights and privileges of those enterprising corporations and companies, who by private resources are trying to found a new dominion for us in Africa. Further, and not the least important, it secures protection for our Missionary Societies. [Cries of "Oh, oh!"] Hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway choose to sneer at missionary work. ["No, no!"]

*MR. STOREY (Sunderland): Perhaps as I was one of those who interrupted the hon. Baronet, and should not have done so, he will allow me to explain that I meant no sneer at missionary work; my ejaculation was occasioned by the enunciation of a piece of sham sentiment in support of this proposal.

*SIR R. TEMPLE: Accepting the explanation of the hon. Member, I must yet notice that the description of one of the objects of the Agreement, as being the protection of missionaries in Africa, appears to him to be as "sham sentiment." Well, that opinion of his, against which I protest, may be shared by those who sit with him below the Gangway opposite. But it will not be shared by many hon. Members who sit above the Gangway opposite, and who sympathise with the missionary cause. I repeat that one of the objects sought and attained is the protection of the pioneers of Christian civilisation. And, Sir, I need not dwell upon one great principle which has been in the minds of those who framed this Agreement; one object it will secure; it will strike at the root of the Slave Trade. This is so obvious, after the Debate we had on the subject last year, that I refrain from going into this part of the subject. Despite the interruptions of hon. Members opposite, I say it will afford a means of uprooting the Slave Trade system and stopping the traffic in human beings. I maintain, too, that it is a most important step in the furtherance of Imperial British interests in Africa. The right hon. Member for Aberdeen (Mr. Bryce) was kind enough to tell us that the Conservative Party will get no credit for this in the coming General Election; but this I know, that the present Government will get credit for this action in my own constituency, and there, and before any of the electors in this country whom my voice can reach, I shall, with confidence, describe this Anglo-German Agreement as one of the most triumphant achievements of the present Government.

(7.20.) Mr. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I hope the hon. Baronet, to whom we entertain the most friendly feelings, may gain the approbation of his constituents. He no doubt will gain the approbation of Government supporters, and therefore he may be perfectly happy without having gained, politically, our approbation by his speech. It was a surprising addition to their long series of blunders that the Government moved the Closure last night. To your restraining hand, Sir, we owe the fact of our being able to discuss this important matter to-night. It does seem to me a most extraordinary blunder, and a most untenable position for the Government to take up. They negotiate a Treaty with a Foreign Government; they insert in that Treaty a condition that it shall receive Parliamentary approval; they start a great constitutional question by their action, and then they move the Closure after two or three hours' Debate. But it would seem the Government would go infinitely beyond this; they consider Lord Salisbury so eminent a Minister that no matter what he does, whatever Bill he puts before us, we ought not to venture to discuss it; we should simply throw up our hands and thank Heaven for sending us such a wonderful Minister as Lord Salisbury. I am led to make this remark after seeing in a newspaper a report of some observations made last night by the Secretary to the Local Government Board to the electors of Warwickshire. He, speaking I presume with the full concurrence of his colleagues, said—

"The fight now going on in the House of Commons as to the Agreement with Germany was a disgrace to the British Parliament."

So it appears it has really come to this: that we are to be called disgraceful if we venture to discuss even for a few moments a great and important Treaty like this, involving the cession and annexation of territory and great constitutional points! It is always an interesting matter to consider whether the messes Ministers get into are brought about by blundering simply or by design. Certainly, after what has occurred during the Session, we may suppose that much of it has been due to ignorance. My right hon. Friend the Member for Derby, who always takes a kindly view of Ministers, suggested last night that they had fallen into this particular blunder on a great constitutional question through ignorance. But I think my right hon. Friend was too kind. I see in this a sinister design. Yes, I do. What happened on the Procedure Committee? In that Committee there was an attempt made on the part of Her Majesty's Government by a side wind to deprive the House of Commons of power over its own Bills, and an attempt to give the House of Lords a greater power over those measures. That attempt, however, was foiled by the watchful patriotism of the right hon. Member for Derby. By means of the present Bill Her Majesty's Ministers hope to be able, again by a side wind, to give the House of Lords greater power over Foreign Treaties; but again there is the right hon. Member for Derby standing in the breach and defending the Constitution from the reckless attacks of right hon. Gentlemen opposite. My hon. Friend and Colleague (Mr. Bradlaugh) generally takes a sound view in political matters; but as I listened to his speech last night, it struck me that his view was not so sound as it ordinarily is. My hon. Friend and Colleague said he should vote with the Government in this matter because in the Bill the Government have attacked one of the prerogatives of the Crown; well, but what is the Crown? The Crown is morely a figure of speech. The Crown means the centre and source of power, and what is the centre and source of power in this country? The House of Commons. The prerogative of the Crown, then, means the prerogative of the House of Commons. [Laughter.] If hon. Members who laugh will take the trouble to read constitutional writers, they will find that authorities lay this principle down: that in the nature of things the action of the Crown is taken on the advice of the Executive Ministers, who are responsible to the House of Commons; we have the
